A FIRST BOOK OF COMPOSITION

By THOMAS H. BRIGGS, Instructor in English, Teachers College, Columbia University, and ISABEL McKINNEY, Teacher of English, Eastern Illinois State Normal School.

This book presents an entirely new idea in composition teaching. Emphasis is placed not upon the forms but upon the qualities of good composition—Sincerity, Good Form, Definiteness, Interest, Unity, Variety, and Coherence.

It is intended for practical composition work in the first two years of the high school. Illustrative material has been chosen from books well within the pupil's range of reading, and is accompanied by pointed questions and specific directions for study.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A WORKING WOMAN

By ADELHEID POPP

WITH INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN EDITION BY JENKIN LLOYD JONES, LINCOLN CENTER, CHICAGO

An impressive account of the struggles of a woman who undertakes to earn her own livelihood. Will be read with interest by all who are concerned with the great problem of the woman toiler.

Dr. Jones says in his Introduction:

Here is the story of a "working woman" who has felt the bitterness of hard, unrelenting toil, and out of the agony of such a life has been brought into sympathy with the Gospel side of co-operation. By bitter tears the eyes were cleared to read the illuminating message of the great democratic movement that assumes the name "socialism" in many quarters.

That working men and women will read this book with bated breath and tearful sympathy goes without the saying. But it is a book for the employer more than for the employee, for the more favored rather than the less favored. It is a book that ought to find a place among the religious books on the centre-table of the rich.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 3, 1913.

The Week

Mr. Bryce was once heard to say that Washington is, from June to September, the worst capital in the world for residence and public business. He could scarcely have forgotten Madrid, with its proverbial "tres meses de infierno"; but there at least an occasional breeze comes from the Guadárramas, whereas Washington is without either near-by hills or bodies of cooling water. One might offer Calcutta as a rival, but the capital of India has now been transferred to Delhi. A despairing Congressman proposes that a "summer capital" be built. Apparently resigning himself to the necessity of summer sessions indefinitely, he suggests that Congress and the Executive be provided with temporary quarters somewhere in the Blue Ridge, three or four hours away. He would have the needful buildings erected, and the seat of government transferred to them at least during July and August. But one almost suspects that such a counsel could come only from a man whose head had been affected by the heat. There is no likelihood of any such plan being adopted. Relief, if any is to be had, must be found in other ways.

From October till the middle of May the Washington climate is as fine as could be wished. If it is true that Congress is to be condemned to nine months of forced labor at Washington every year, it is obvious that the nine months ought to be the ones in which the labor can best be done. But the case is, no doubt, overdrawn. The House possesses legislative machinery which can grind with celerity. In the Senate the wheels often turn aimlessly for weary weeks. It has absolutely no rule for putting an end to interminable and perhaps purely dilatory debate. It is desirable to retain the deliberative quality of the Senate and even, on just occasion, the power of obstruction. But there is no sound reason why this should be pushed to such absurd and intolerable lengths as are now permitted. The suggestion has been made of a rule that a two-thirds vote of the Senate may end discussion and bring the matter to a vote. This seems reasonable. Possibly, if the Senate is held at Washington long enough, and the weather is hot enough, it may be induced to consider a cure for its time-wasting habits.

We cannot tell the motive of the Democratic members of the Senate committee in making the particular modification on which they have agreed as to the income-tax exemption. But, like the gallant Irishman who told the lady that he didn't know her age, but whatever it was she didn't look it, we feel tempted to say that, whatever object these gentlemen had in view, they have not attained it. Certainly, if they imagined that they were removing from the bill, in any degree, the reproach of its making the exemption too high, they are entirely mistaken. The exemption is lowered to $3,000 only in the case of a man having neither wife nor children to support; it will still come to $4,000 for any married man unless his wife has an income of her own large enough to be taxable; and a man with a wife and two children enjoys an exemption of $5,000. Now the total number of single men above the age of thirty is about one-seventh of the whole number of men of those ages. Hence it is probable that the number of persons cut out from the tax by the exemptions for children will exceed the number brought under it by the reduction of the basis for men without wives or children; and it is quite certain that, if this is not the case, at all events the net increase in the number of taxable persons will not be large enough to be significant.

The case for the proposed change is no better if it be regarded from the standpoint of social rather than political purpose. The effect of this trifling change in the tax as an encouragement to the rearing of families can but be insignificant. This might be different if the exemption were a low one; if persons whose income was $1,000 were subject to the tax, for example, then the relief given by a further exemption of $1,000 for the wife and $500 for each child would be somewhat considerable. To a man with $2,000 income, the $10 a year might mean a good deal; by a man with $3,000 and a wife and two children, the lifting of a $20 tax would be felt as something of a help. But what this proposal does, as compared with the original bill, is to relieve a man with $5,000 income, and a wife and two children, of the trifling tax of $10. In the case of a larger family, it is true, the effect is greater; and very possibly this may be a good thing. But if it is, manifestly the thing to do is to begin lower down with your primary exemption, and make the difference greater. If this sort of thing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing in such a way as to bring about a result not altogether insignificant.

Gov. Goldsborough, of Maryland, has named the first coming regular election day as the time for the election of a United States Senator to fill the chair made vacant by the death of Senator Rayner and now temporarily filled by Senator Jackson, a Republican appointed by the Governor. This means, virtually without doubt, the increase of the Democratic majority in the Senate by two, for the election is almost sure to result in the substitution of a Democrat for a Republican; and this in time for the whole of the regular session of Congress. But the election is of special interest as the first to be ordered under the Seventeenth Amendment, and it will take place in a State in which the evils of the indirect method of election of Senators had long been illustrated in almost their worst form and in a most conspicuous way. It is true that the Senatorial preference primaries of recent years had gone far towards changing all this; but the days of the full-fledged old-time system are not far back in the past. Throughout the long Gorman domination, the alliance between rotten politics in the nation and flagrant misrule in the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore was complete and seemed unshakable; and no State furnished a stronger argument for the freeing of both national and State affairs from the vicious influences of the indirect method of election.

Burlingame Public Library

President Wilson's selection of Judge Gerard for the German Embassy will rouse no such enthusiasm as would the choice of a man intellectually eminent, or of high public distinction, but will generally be regarded as satisfactory. The post at Berlin is of great importance, and will become more so. The need of an Ambassador to replace Leishman was urgent even before Mr. Wilson became President, and it is to be presumed that diligent search was made for a fit man. Judge Gerard has admittedly some of the qualities required. He is cultivated, has social tact, and possesses ample means. This last fact will please the Kaiser, who has never ceased to regret the loss to Berlin of Mrs. Tower, whom he called "the Moltke of society." Such a glittering social campaign as she carried on will scarcely be imitated by the Gerards, but there is every reason to expect that the new Ambassador will be welcome in Berlin and will adequately represent his country.

Secretary McAdoo's reorganization of the customs by abolishing 113 collectorships will be approved by friends of efficient and economical administration. The simplification of the service involved may be seen in the fact that only forty-nine collectors or surveyors remain. The offices of others are now under the jurisdiction of larger ports. The chief reformation is, of course, in the "interior ports of entry," such, for example, as Albany, whose tiny trickle of half a million in revenues now goes to swell New York city's annual total of nearly 200 millions. The district of New York includes five ports besides the headquarters here; that of St. Lawrence fourteen, besides Ogdensburg. In salaries the new step will save half a million yearly. In administrative complexities it will save far more. But its chief merit is that it is a slashing attack on a number of fat political plums, and is itself not dictated by political motives. In the districts remaining the present collectors will uniformly be retained. In the appointment of the new deputy collectors the Secretary has designated officers old in the service. All this indicates governmental ideals that the late Tom Reed would find it difficult to understand. When the Maine statesman was Speaker he once protested violently that to abolish the useless customs houses that sprinkled the Maine coast would break down the government—meaning, of course, the party machine.

The story put out by the lobbyist Mulhall is of a familiar type. Just how significant are its revelations can be determined only after they have been subjected to adequate scrutiny. Some of them appear to be absurd or incredible on their face; others have a prima-facie probability, and some are supported by documentary evidence. The one thing that is most salient in the case at first sight is the folly of the head men of the National Association of Manufacturers in carrying on such operations as, even upon the most favorable view of the case, Mulhall was entrusted with, through the agency of such a man and by means of such written correspondence as has now come to light. But, so far at least as Mr. Kirby is concerned, there ought to be nothing very surprising in this. The indiscretions now revealed can hardly give evidence of greater lack of judgment than some of the public utterances by the late president of the National Association of Manufacturers. If his secret plottings were not better managed than his open appeals to public opinion, they certainly constituted no serious danger to the republic.

The Senate last week passed the Newlands bill amending the Erdman act so as to enlarge the board of arbitration for railway labor disputes from three to six, and also to provide for the appointment by the President of an official mediator, a permanent salaried officer independent of all Government bureaus. Even as it is, the Erdman act has been of vital help in averting danger of strikes of the most serious character upon at least two occasions. But upon both those occasions, the composition of the board provided for in the act—causing, as it did, the outcome of the whole dispute to seem to turn upon the vote of one man—was so strongly objected to as to render very doubtful the reference of the dispute to any arbitration at all. In the one instance, the objection came from the railways, in the other from the men. It is a particularly gratifying feature of the present move to amend the act that it appears to have the hearty support both of the companies and of the employees. It is perhaps not too favorable a view to regard this as an illustration of the broader and better spirit that has been manifesting itself in so many ways in recent years between capital and labor.

The agreement between the Attorney-General and the Union Pacific management over the disposal of the Southern Pacific stock held by the railway company, and the acceptance of their plan by the Court, bring the solution of an unusually perplexing problem. The Union Pacific had bought about $126,000,000 of that stock—about 47 per cent. of the total amount outstanding, and therefore sufficient to control the Southern Pacific absolutely. Under the Roosevelt Administration, this virtual merger of two parallel transcontinental lines was attacked as restraint of trade. The Federal Circuit Court decided that it was not such restraint, because Harriman's primary purpose, in the operation, was to get control of the Central Pacific property. That railway did not parallel Union Pacific; it was a natural connecting line from Union Pacific's main Western terminus to the Pacific Coast; but it was owned by the Southern Pacific. The Supreme Court overruled the Circuit Court's opinion; and, though declaring the acquisition of the Central Pacific property per se to be entirely legal, nevertheless pronounced the purchase of the main Southern Pacific line to be contrary to the law, and ordered Union Pacific to submit to the Circuit Court, before May 10, a satisfactory plan for disposing of its $126,000,000 Southern Pacific holdings. The date was afterward extended to July 1.

The plan accepted provides for exchanging $38,000,000 of the company's Southern Pacific holdings for a nearly equal amount of Baltimore & Ohio shares, owned by the Pennsylvania, and for the lodging of the rest with a trust company, which shall have no power to vote the stock, but may sell it at intervals, between now and 1916, to buyers not identified with Union Pacific. This is a term long enough to warrant the sellers in awaiting recovery of investment markets from their present depression. Whether, in the meantime, the project of exchanging part of the shares for another company's holdings of another railway's stock—in which each party to the exchange gave up ownership in a parallel line for ownership in a line not subject to that objection—will be carried further, remains for events to settle. The main consideration is that a dangerous possibility in a troubled financial market has been averted.

In the course of the warmed-over sermons which Col. Roosevelt prints in last week's Outlook as the latest instalment of his biography, he falls foul of certain wicked editors whom he does not name. Their chief offending was that they did not agree with his view of the exalted virtues of Boss Quay. Some curiosity has been expressed as to who these mysterious editors could have been. We think we can tell. The Colonel does not name names, but he gives certain "marks," as the logicians say, by which they can be identified. For example, "they delivered malignant judgment on a dead man," meaning Quay. Now, the Outlook of June 11, 1904, said of Quay that he thought of politics only as a "game," and that to it he "brought the audacity of a soldier of fortune and the conscience of a gambler." It continued that Quay "was as ready to sacrifice a principle as a chessplayer is to sacrifice a pawn"; that he "believed that every man had his price," and that "the only dishonesty in politics his conscience recognized was refusal to pay the price that had been promised." This, we are confident, must have been the "malignant judgment on a dead man" which made Mr. Roosevelt so indignant.

This inference is borne out by the description of the offending editors which Mr. Roosevelt gives. He declares that he knew them, and knew that they "had led lives of bodily ease and the avoidance of bodily risk." Does not this fit the editors of the Outlook to a T? There is no record that Dr. Lyman Abbott ever challenged Henry Ward Beecher to put on the gloves for six rounds, or to jump off the Brooklyn Bridge, or to swim the East River with his boots on. Who ever heard of Lawrence Abbott drinking up Esel or eating crocodiles? And Mr. Mabie, instead of rushing to Africa to shoot lions, goes off tamely to Japan to give lectures. The conclusion is irresistible that these are the "bodily ease" editors whom Mr. Roosevelt had in mind. Too high praise cannot be given him for the Roman firmness with which he exposes his own associates and employers, when truth and justice demand it.

An instructive, though temporary, phase of magazine development of recent years is called to mind by the court proceedings in the case of one defunct monthly muckraking publication which carried the art of plain thinking and high living to something like perfection; with the result that millions of dollars of stock of a value approximating the price of ice at the North Pole is now held by sorrowing investors to whom the opportunity to make this a much better place to live in, and incidentally to earn 12 per cent., proved irresistible. It was as if Peter the Hermit had supplemented his enunciation of God's will with the offer of gilt-edged first mortgage securities on choice business lots in Jerusalem when that city should be taken from the Paynim. Those were mad, glad days only a few years ago when the iniquities of Wall Street were scourged in the front pages and more than imitated in the editor's confidential chats with his readers. It was one kind of manifestation of the power of the press of which all decent members of the profession felt ashamed, and whose passing seems now like the going of a nightmare.

The Latin or Crewe oration at Oxford, delivered alternately by the public orator and the professor of poetry, is usually thought of as a dry and formal piece of pedantry. In reality, although its chief purpose is the commemoration of the founders of the University, it often touches on the events of the academic year, and so is made impressive and timely. Witticisms and even puns have been known to creep into it. This year, as pronounced by the president of Magdalen, its references to the achievements of Oxford graduates during the twelvemonth just past made it a noteworthy academic document. President Warren began by mentioning the war in the Balkans, and said that peace had again and again wavered in the balance but for one man, an Oxford and a Balliol man, the glory of the house of Grey. "Ecce iterum Edvardus alter apud Pacificos audit, et beatam regis memoriam minister secutus est." Other statesmen were mentioned, with distinguished scientists and investigators; and the speaker closed with a peroration upon polar exploration, and the work of another Oxford man, whose work was ended—Captain Scott. "Percurrisse polum membris morituris ebeu quid prodest? Ave atque vale, flos exploratorum, heros intrepide!" Such names as these would illuminate any oration, in English or Latin.

An unpleasant sort of international tu quoque, on the subject of political corruption, is making itself heard in various quarters. If an Englishman mentions the word Krupp, he instantly has Marconi hurled back at him. Hungary can throw no stone at Italy without smashing her own glass house. And all the European criminators and recriminators are taking great comfort in President Wilson's denunciation of the tariff lobby! This is not exactly done by the Italian ex-Minister, Luigi Luzzatti, writing in the Corriere della Sera, but he does take a little patriotic pride in affirming that a radical change in the tax laws, affecting many in Italy, was made by the Chamber, in the face of many protests from private interests, without any suspicion of corrupt methods having been even attempted. That there were gross official frauds in connection with the building of the Palace of Justice, Luzzatti does not in the least deny; but he asserts that it is hypocritical for foreign nations to point a finger of scorn at Italy on this account, or to intimate that the incident is typical of the state of her political morality. This, he declares, is not so black as it is painted by even some Italians. On one point he speaks with special knowledge. The Italian Treasury, over which he himself has presided, has been, he asserts, ever since the unification of the kingdom, absolutely free from so much as the suspicion of corruption. Finance Ministers have come and gone, superintending great fiscal operations, including several conversions of national bonds, yet no one has ever asserted that a centesimo stuck to the fingers of one of them. Most of them retired from office poorer than they took it.

GROPING FOR A BUDGET.

No little confusion of thought is shown in some of the comments on the defeat, in the House Democratic caucus, of a plan for making an annual budget. This was only one plan, and it was open to several forcible objections. The proposal was that a sort of general budget committee should be formed, and that it should, at the beginning of the session, determine what the amount of the annual appropriations should be. To this sum the various spending committees would then be rigidly held. The idea was, obviously, to make some approach to the practice of other countries. But this was more in form than substance. The root of the matter in England, for example, is Ministerial responsibility. The budget is framed by the Cabinet, but if it is beaten or substantially amended by the Commons, the Cabinet resigns. Nothing of the kind could be thought of in connection with a budget committee of the House of Representatives. It would have the name but neither the power nor the perils of financial control. Moreover, as Congressman Fitzgerald argued, the practical effect of such a committee, particularly at the short session of Congress, would be so to delay the preparation of appropriation bills that some of them would be in danger of failing, or of being passed virtually without scrutiny or debate.

These and other considerations influenced the majority in the caucus to oppose the plan. It would be at best but an experiment and a makeshift. It would deal only with the debit side of the ledger; and any scheme that limits itself to outlay, with no control of tax-levying and income, it would be absurd to call a complete form of budget-framing. That we have nowhere in our system any one authority, or set of authorities, to decide both what money shall be taken from the taxpayers and what shall be appropriated for carrying on the government, has often been pointed out as a standing weakness in our public finance. Radically to cure the trouble seems impossible, with our irresponsible Ministry, but there are many ways of ameliorating it. Of these, the plan just rejected was only one; from others help may be got.

The point that President Taft drove at most strongly, in his praiseworthy efforts to introduce something like order into our chaotic budget-making, was the need of preparing full and accurate estimates for Congress. This is naturally the work of the various Cabinet officers. It has, in fact, been much more carefully done in recent years. If the House would make it a rule never to exceed these estimates, it would approximate the oldest standing order of the House of Commons, that it "will receive no petition for any sum relating to public service nor proceed upon any motion for a grant or charge upon the public revenue . . . unless recommended by the Crown"—that is, nowadays, by the Ministry. But it is one thing to lead the House of Representatives to the water, and another to make it drink. There must be within that body itself some hand or hands with the power to refuse to loosen the purse-strings, or else the most earnest efforts of the Executive to make the government economical will be in vain.

The United States once had such a power of control in the House, but we have allowed it to be dissipated. We refer to the Committee on Appropriations. Both students of public finance and men versed in the actual spending of money by Congress have agreed that the break-up of the powers of that committee, which occurred in 1885, when the right to report appropriation bills was given to eight other committees of the House, was a direct incentive to extravagance, if not an efficient cause of it. Speaker Cannon was for many years Chairman of the Appropriations Committee. As such he once uttered the profound truth: "You think my business is to make appropriations, but it is not. It is to prevent their being made." It was a similar conception of duty which Samuel J. Randall cherished; and it was by the exercise of his great power as Chairman of the Appropriations Committee that he enabled his party to make a record for economy in public expenditures never since equalled. There was ample warning against depriving the committee of its sole control. Mr. Randall protested that if the appropriations were divided up among several committees, "you will enter upon a path of extravagance you cannot foresee the length of." Mr. Cannon declared that it would by itself mean the addition of $50,000,000 a year to Government expenditures; and in his farewell speech to the House last March, he referred to what he regarded as the almost fatal change, and said that in his deliberate judgment, "based upon intimate knowledge and observation, it has cost the country many, many millions of dollars in needless appropriations and expenditures." It would be easy to multiply testimony of this sort from men of long experience in both House and Senate.

Now, there are pending in the House amendments to the rules which would restore to the Committee on Appropriations its old exclusive control over the great money bills. Their acceptance will, of course, be difficult. The other committees have tasted blood and will not meekly surrender the power they have had. The cry will be raised that such great power as it is proposed to restore to the Committee on Appropriations would be dangerous. This could partly be met by the proposal to make the Committee larger, with the chairmen of other committees serving on it, and so dovetailing the business of the House. But real authority to control expenditures must be vested somewhere. The happy-go-lucky method stands condemned. Expenditures have been running wild with the reins on their neck. To some man or committee must be given the right to apply the curb-bit; and if the House does not approve the plan of a general budget committee, it might well consider going back to the old form of control through a single Appropriations Committee.

SOBERNESS AND PROGRESS.

A statement was issued the other day by a notable committee of social workers in relation to the agitation which flared up so violently two or three months ago over the relation between low wages and vice. They do not undertake to dispose of the question; indeed, the statement is rather in the nature of an expression of general attitude. But that attitude is highly significant; and, moreover, it is the attitude which has been taken by sober and wise persons generally. The committee are of the opinion that the actual form taken by the agitation has been such that "grave evils are likely to result" from it and that these have "in many cases already resulted." They do not deny—as indeed no sensible person can deny—that economic causes are in many instances an important factor in causing girls to yield to temptation, but they regard as vastly more important causes those moral, educational, and social influences, and those defects of character, which have always been held chiefly accountable for the evil. So far as formal investigations of a statistical character throw light on the subject, they support the view thus expressed broadly by the members of this committee, whose judgment was formed either on wide experience in investigation or on long-standing personal contact with the problem.

Now it may always be urged in behalf of the violent, or extravagant, or hysterical methods of reform agitation that after all it makes no practical difference whether the statements it goes upon are anywhere near the truth or not, provided only that the object aimed at is a good one. If, in order to rouse the public, it is necessary to go about shouting wildly and making extravagant assertions, why should any one seriously object? The noise of the campaign will soon be forgotten, while its substantial result will abide; to be squeamish about the means is to sacrifice the end. Now there may be some plausibility in this view. But one has not to go far in order to find fatal objections to it. In this particular instance, an objection of the most vital nature is indicated in the remarks of the committee. They speak of serious evils that have resulted from the agitation; what they had in mind is not difficult to conjecture. The agitators were so possessed with the idea that low wages are the one great cause of vice, that not a few of them deliberately encouraged and propagated the notion that comfortable wages were the only possible safeguard of a working girl's virtue; some men went so far as to declare that the want of them was in itself as great an evil as a life of shame. This monstrous view, as absurd as it is pernicious, would never have been entertained, even by the light-minded persons who took it, but for the previous undermining of their judgment through gross exaggeration and distortion of the facts.

But it is not only, and not chiefly, on account of evils which may incidentally attend it that the hysterical method of attacking public questions is to be condemned. There are few public policies so supremely essential that questions of degree are of no consequence in connection with them; few measures whose benefit is so clear and so overwhelming that all considerations of countervailing evil become insignificant or impertinent. At the present time there are many great questions of politics in which the judgment of any reasonable man must turn upon a balancing of the evils for which a remedy is proposed against the evils to which the remedy itself may expose us. In every such case, the difference between looking soberly at the facts and running wild among them is just the difference between political sanity and political insanity. If, for instance, corruption on the bench were a prevailing and incurable condition, the recall of judges might be a proposal that we ought all to go in for unreservedly; if, on the other hand, it is a rare thing, and has been becoming rarer through the growing tendency to divorce judicial elections from party politics, then the fact that the recall would tend to diminish judicial independence and to make the bench less attractive to a high type of lawyer becomes the predominant consideration. Or, again, in regard to the banking and currency bill now about to become the chief subject of Congressional discussion. It may be that we must resort to extreme measures of Government control, must confer upon a board of Presidential appointees powers such as are not exercised by any similar body in any country in the world; but if we are to arrive at a reasonable judgment in this matter, we have to begin by thinking soberly and exactly of the facts in our own and other countries, and not be carried away by vague generalities that will not bear examination.

A phrase that used to figure prominently in American political discussion was "the sober second thought." It became tiresome, and has now been long out of fashion. The need itself, however, has not, we are convinced, been outgrown. We are much quicker than in the past to adopt measures plainly dictated by considerations of the general welfare; and this, so far, is good. But there are things which in their nature demand grave and cautious consideration, and here the sober second thought must still be counted on to assert itself. As for its justification in the past, a single instance may suffice to show it in a most striking way. At the time of the great silver agitation, everything turned on the ability of great multitudes of Americans to keep their heads. If they had been carried away by the appearances of the moment; if they had thought that the experience of a few years was everything, and that the principles of sound monetary policy, taught by ages of experience, were nothing, they would have made the mad dash which was urged upon them so plausibly and which for a time the nation seemed bent upon. The firmness of a few strong men, above all of President Cleveland, stemmed the rush, and thus the indispensable thing was gained—time for the nation to find itself. In matters even more vital than that, the same need will continue to exist in all those times that try the stuff of which a republic is made.

SOME NATIONAL SHORTCOMINGS.

There are several standing confessions of weakness or guilt that we Americans make as a nation. Every great conflagration gives rise to a full crop of editorial lamentations over the enormous waste caused by fires in this country; and when there is no great conflagration, the annual figures of the fire loss suffice to remind us that we so far outtop the leading nations of Europe in this respect as to be in a class by ourselves. Our annual number of homicides is equally distinguished above that of any other country standing beside us in general civilization and humanity. There are certain classes of accidents concerning which something of the same sort is true; notably as to the number of persons killed while trespassing on railway tracks. The death of 5,449 persons in this way in the United States last year must seem astonishing to any inhabitant of Germany or England.

In recent years attention has been earnestly directed to quite another kind of shortcoming. Throughout the movement for the systematic provision of indemnity to workingmen for industrial accidents, special point has been given to the agitation by reference to the fact that we are only now beginning to do what Germany has long done in scientific ways and on a comprehensive scale. Western and Southern farmers have been bewailing for half a century the lack of credit facilities which would greatly promote the possibilities of agricultural enterprise; yet little has thus far come of the agitation, and it is only within the last year or two that the movement has acquired real body and momentum. And this has come about through insistence on the great benefits and the vast extent of agricultural credit institutions in several European countries; as a result of the impetus given by President Taft, and by various State associations and State governments, a large and representative commission is now on a tour of examination into the question in Europe, and will doubtless, upon its return, put the movement into shape for real achievement. To mention only one more instance, but one in some respects more remarkable than any of the others, the scheme of cooperative retail stores, which has had so enormous a development in England, and the idea of which has been familiar here almost as long as there, has never been able to get beyond the most rudimentary stage in this country. "The 'effete' monarchies across the water," says Mr. H. W. Lanier, in an article in the World's Work for July, "are a generation ahead of us in true democratic coöperation"; and this is undeniably a fact, at least so far as coöperative buying and selling is concerned.

As to some of these things it has been largely the fashion, in these latter years, to lay the blame on the supremacy of money, or of factors in the population that are dominated by money. If we do not guard against fires in which working people's lives are endangered as well as other nations do; if we have more mine explosions; if we are twenty years behind the times in compulsory workingmen's insurance provisions—all this is because our government has been under the thumb of capital in a greater degree than elsewhere. There may be an element of truth in this charge; but it is not the only factor in the case, and indeed we are inclined to think that it is among the least essential of the factors. Nor does that other explanation, that with us government effectiveness in these matters has been made impossible by our system of division of powers between the States and the nation, to our mind go much further. Within the past few years, we have been making rapid headway in all these things—child labor, workmen's compensation, sanitary regulation, industrial inspection—and neither the opposition of capitalistic interests nor the division of political jurisdiction has offered any formidable obstacle to the process. Given the one thing needful, the awakening of genuine and general interest in the questions, the rest has been easy.

The main cause, we are convinced, is a certain characteristic of the American temperament—what the French would call a defect of its quality. It is difficult to get Americans to take very seriously a great many things that people in other countries take very seriously indeed. Diverse as are the various matters we have instanced—and many more might be cited—there is one thing they have in common. Americans are no more indifferent about their own lives than other people, but they will walk along a railway track if it happens to be handy; they will crowd on the running-board of a trolley car rather than wait a quarter of an hour, and the only way to keep them from leaping from the dock onto a departing ferry-boat is to shut them off with gates. They are willing to take chances where other people are not, and they are not so willing to take a lot of trouble to gain comparatively small or remote benefits or to prevent comparatively rare or improbable evils, as other people are. It takes a deal of keen interest, and devotion to troublesome details, to build up a great coöperative retail-store system, and the 5 or 10 per cent. saving does not appeal strongly to the American nature. We should have had workmen's compensation laws long ago if the workmen themselves had felt very keenly about it. The very energy of the American nature, the masterful spirit of its achievement, result in a slighting of what does not present itself to the general mind as part of the main stream of activity. That proverbial good nature which causes us to suffer without a murmur a thousand little nuisances which in other countries are resented and repressed is in part a sign of our strength and our prosperity, in part a manifestation of our unwillingness to take trouble about anything outside our daily business. To good-nature, to indifference, and to a certain slothfulness in outlying matters which is perhaps the correlative of our tremendous energy in what we regard as our main business, may safely be ascribed a great part of whatever shortcomings we have exhibited as a people.

THE HEYDAY OF LIBRARIANS.

Any one who has followed the meetings of the American Library Association, which ended last Saturday, after a week's session at Kaaterskill, N. Y., must have been set reflecting seriously in several directions. The public library, with a lifetime in this country of scarcely more than sixty years, has already reached that highly specialized development which characterizes the public school The old-fashioned browsing which used to unearth many a delightful book that one wasn't looking for is largely a thing of the past. Books must be classified in reference rooms according to the divisions of knowledge which now form the plan of public instruction. This serves a purpose which should not be hastily minimized. The library is attempting to-day as never before to meet the needs of a most heterogeneous public. Particular attention is given to those who cannot readily help themselves. Experts are employed to pick out books best suited to immigrants, to ambitious farm-hands and factory workers, to children, legislators, and business men. Volumes are also lent by one community to another. No better illustration of the contrast of former conditions with modern could be found than that furnished by one who took part in the Conference. She visited a library in England where the tradition was still maintained of chaining the books to the shelves; yet the same day she saw books in trucks on the way to the provinces. So greatly has the spirit changed that the up-to-date librarian, she said, had to restrain himself from running out into the highway and chaining books to the passer-by!

With the minute organization which is now the rule in public libraries goes a sense of power and responsibility which has given even those possessed of it some pause. Mingled with much talk about highly specialized efficiency was frequently heard a note of warning lest the library should have a disintegrating effect. As President Legler put it, the public is tending towards a "rag-time" habit of mind which the library can help to correct only by installing a director and assistants with proper personalities. However detailed its system, an institution should strive to allure its readers to its best possessions in general fields of knowledge. Mr. Legler would probably not go so far as one of several outsiders whose criticism was invited by the Conference. According to this very zealous gentleman, the head of a public library should be the mayor of thoughts in his community, and above all should be personally acquainted with the interests of the young people. Find the boy and connect him with the right book, that is the first duty. But in the case at least of children the library has virtually been doing this. The space and thought given to juveniles in institutions of New York, Boston, and Chicago makes the task of parents easy and delightful. And librarians are now hoping to render other departments equally inviting. The necessity is clear, the problem is how to meet it. Much could be accomplished, it is felt, if heads and attendants had leisure for daily reading. Then we might hope for more of such outstanding figures as Winsor, and especially certain Englishmen who, while carrying on their duties in the British Museum or the Bodleian, have shown by their publications how wide-ranging were their minds.

Closely connected with this, though it received but brief discussion by the Association, is the amount of attention which any large public library should devote to scholars. What with all the thought bestowed upon those who have to be driven to the shelves, it is a question whether the natural bookman is not somewhat neglected. To compare the New York Public Library with the British Museum is not altogether fair, yet the mere physical conveniences in London might be reproduced. The scholar is not so easily distracted as the poet, but to sit at a great flat table with no division into desks, and to be obliged to walk into a distant room to consult the card catalogue, is distracting to even prosaic moods. If more warmth of personality is really desired for the public library, and if it is to be an intellectual centre, there is no better way to begin than to heed the comfort of those who by their equipment are intellectual leaders.

One other important problem which confronted the Association was that of selecting new books. The general public hardly appreciates how much is involved. Here the power exercised affects not only readers, but the very life of a large class of publications. For to the discerning it is well known that unless publishers could count on the public library patronage, they would not dare to issue certain volumes at all. Works selling at three or five dollars may be highly important, even though they cannot expect large private sales. But other works got out at these prices in attractive bindings are utterly worthless, and here librarians might do much more than they have done to keep them off the market. The case of fiction is very different. The demand for stories being what it is, librarians have no such power of veto; but they have begun to see that every best seller need not be acquired. Yet if fiction is in their province, where shall they draw the line? Mr. Robert Herrick, to whom the question was put, complicated the matter still further by insisting that "The Kreutzer Sonata" was much less harmful to young readers than, say, "The Rosary." And other writers urged great caution in instituting censorship; they would set up truth to life as the proper standard of selection. Unanimity is not to be expected from the Council, with whom the subject was left. But it would appear that some thoroughgoing policy ought to be adopted. The function of a good library should be not only to acquire but quite as much to reject; and just now fiction is sorely in need of weeding.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

A strong current in present-day American life, felt in the industrial world, and even in the most sheltered bays of education, is the growing belief in the relation between industrial efficiency and education. Vocational training is becoming a great popular demand. A complex population, called upon to defend its economic position against the world's competition, is requiring public provision for teaching its masses of artisans and technicians. The complaint is that the common schools have insisted upon preparation for life without insisting as well upon preparation for livelihood. The progress of the movement in recent years, with many in the colleges crying it down, and more in the high schools urging it on, is impressive. The first State subsidy for agricultural or trade training is younger than the century. Yet now twenty-nine States have passed laws concerning industrial education. The national Government has established vocational training in the island possessions, and the recent Page bill would have extended some features of the system over the country. Ohio and Wisconsin have virtually compelled working children to attend public trade schools, which industrial communities must support. Many large cities have carried manual-training and business schools farther than the State. And this is in the face of assertions that vocational education will not merely ruin the liberal school system, but will institute a modified class-division along European lines.

A study of the recent pamphlet of the United States Bureau of Education on "German Industrial Education" leaves no doubt of the value of the system in building up the commercial and mechanical fabric in Europe. Even in England, where education broadens very slowly from precedent to precedent, the polytechnic movement has spread, and the higher technical schools have become central schools, with a definite aim in preparing boys for office and shop. But it is in Germany that an alliance of trade guilds and educators shows the Empire's alertness to a monumental scheme of practical education. Institutions like the Charlottenburg Royal Technical High School, and the Leipzig High School of Commerce, with thousands of students from all over the world, take university rank, and combine valuable researches with the highest industrial training. The "improvement schools" of Munich, which Dr. Kerchensteiner originated for youths who entered trades at the earliest legal age, have been imitated, until there are now several thousand, attendance upon which is compulsory for hundreds of thousands of apprentices. The trade guilds have partial direction of these schools, and contracting employers must see that their boys and girls attend classes. Guild schools, state trade schools, and state commercial schools abound everywhere. Every boy must choose, according to his means and aptitudes, among the preparations offered by classical, semi-classical, liberal, technical, commercial, or trade schools, or must enter a shop with the privilege of going to improvement schools. His life thus gets its permanent direction. The plan crowns with glory the brave efforts of Fichte to start the nation in the paths of scientific experimentation and labor. It has given its point to the Kaiser's watchword that "the future of Germany is on the seas." But it emphasizes the Stand, the idea of position and plane of endeavor. And it makes a failure of the boy who chooses wrong at the outset.

Most of the demand for vocational education here is from wage-earning citizens, with children in school. Some of it is from men who, like one of the heads of the Curtis Publishing Company in Philadelphia a few days ago, complain that to find one well-trained man they must examine fifty applicants. Minimum wage laws have given it an impetus, for the State cannot force employers to pay men high wages without first guaranteeing, by its system of education, that they are worth it. Finally, the high-school teachers who translate the artisan's desire to have his children made as practically useful as possible, see in their educational reforms an economical millennium. It is in the haste and narrowness of this last attitude that there lurks danger.

Dr. Kerchensteiner's object in the improvement schools of Germany was to train citizens by connecting "a built-up readiness for service, action, and ethical devotion with an insight into the purposes of the state." That, as he remarked in a recent lecture in America, the German trade training makes for "conscientiousness, diligence, self-restraint, and devotion to a strenuous life," the character of the expanding German people testifies. The Wisconsin law of 1911, compelling the weekly instruction of apprentices in English and citizenship, is a reflection of this spirit, and there should be more of it in vocational circles.

But the most dismaying aspect of the movement is that some of its shorter-sighted promoters express a jealousy of liberal education, which they believe no working community should be forced to maintain. It has always been hard to keep alive in the business and laboring classes full faith in the finer fruits of education. The great State universities are already protesting that the genius of vocational instruction is inimical to intellectual ideals. So long as those who advocate public trade schools and technical schools urge a drastic "scrapping" in industrial communities of the older system, with its Latin and Greek, its literatures and pure mathematics, there must remain this bitterness; the result in the end would be an unnatural cleavage between endowed schools and State schools, and the closing of the higher privileges of education to all but the well-to-do. To avoid this harsh discrimination, we should not require a general hardening of occupational lines, leaving the topmost stratum of society alone to cultivate the liberal studies. It must be realized that education everywhere is primarily for life and not livelihood, and that new forms and new institutions must have plenty of time to grow, even in this impatient age.

RECENT GERMAN NOVELS AND "NOVELLEN."

The influence of psychological research upon modern German fiction and drama is assuming amazing proportions. The frequent occurrence in recent books of a profound and unexpected change in the character of men of mature years seems curiously to agree with the theory of a climacteric which was discussed in the reviews a few months ago.

The new story of Jacob Wassermann, 'Der Mann von vierzig Jahren" (Berlin: S. Fischer), is an absorbing narrative which deals with a country gentleman of irreproachable character, a happy husband and father, who suddenly conceives an irresistible desire for freedom from matrimonial ties, and with the valet of his youth starts upon a quest of adventure. After two years' absence upon an Odyssey of emotional experiences, he returns, infatuated with a singer and determined upon divorce. But his child is ill, his estate mismanaged, and the country on the eve of the war with France. He joins his battalion, is wounded, and, during the long weeks at the hospital, finds himself. Nursed back to health by his wife, he resumes his previous life, accepting the fact that it is beautiful to be, more beautiful to work—all of which is recounted with an admirable objectivity and in a style of rare charm.

"Die Hirtenflöte" in Arthur Schnitzler's remarkable volume, "Masken und Wunder" (S. Fischer), deals with a critical turning-point in the life of an elderly man of scholarly tastes who suddenly becomes aware that the young wife with whom he has so far been happy is more of a stranger to him than the stars he studies in his observatory. He sends her out into the world to be free to follow the lure of life and "realize" herself, and on her return, to-morrow or in ten years, her home and her husband shall be ready to welcome her. After futile protests the woman leaves upon her pilgrimage, drifts along the line of least resistance, has love affairs, idyllic, romantic, and tragic, and returns to the husband who rejoices that now she may know herself and he be sure of her. But she tells him that, while in her previous ignorance and dependence she had never been able to find herself, thrust into independence and temptation, she had completely lost herself—and she turns from him and disappears forever.

Thomas Mann, whose "Buddenbrooks" placed him in the foremost rank of German novelists, also handles in his latest work a fatal crisis in a man's life. But his masterly Novelle, "Der Tod in Venedig" (S. Fischer), appeals to a much smaller circle of readers than the famous novel which is now in its sixtieth edition, because its strength lies in the subtleties of its psychology and the distinction of its style. The story begins with an intimate record of the morbid moods and the paralyzed energies of a famous writer and widower of fifty, who suffers from overwork. By the sight of an uncanny stranger, whose appearance suggests a wanderer in many lands, he is suddenly roused from his indecision and goes to Venice for a rest. But Venice is hot and stuffy, there is an air of mystery about it, and his sole enjoyment is to watch the singularly beautiful boy of a Polish family stopping at the same hotel on the Lido. The reappearance of the uncanny stranger is fraught with symbolical meaning. An odor of disinfectants mingles with the ordinary atmosphere of the city: inquiries whether there is an epidemic meet with emphatic denial, but the foreign papers disappear from the reading-room. When the hero at last learns the truth, watching the fascinating child has become an obsession, and he has not the energy to leave. There is an extraordinary working up of the narrative to the day when the Polish family prepares to depart and the hero, who has watched the boy wade far out into the surf, fancies that he sees him beckon, tries to rise from his chair, and falls unconscious.

Another noteworthy story also owes its inception to the plague. The hero of Anselm Heine's "Die Erscheinung" (Berlin: Egon Fleischel) is a German engineer who on his homeward voyage from years of work on the Marshall Islands succumbs to a wave of sentiment, and, half-awake, dreams of a fair woman. Opening his eyes, he sees the object of his vision coming towards his steamer, and on leaving port discovers her among the passengers. They become acquainted and engaged, and go to Paris, where he has business at the Exposition. The lady is ill the morning after their arrival; he leaves her in the care of a chambermaid and goes about his business. When he returns at night, he goes to her room to inquire, and finds it open and empty. For fear of compromising her, he awaits the morning, asks for his companion, and is told that no lady of that name had been at the hotel. Ranting and raving, appealing to the police and the consulate, are of no avail; he is treated like a lunatic, and finally is forced to leave town. Years of research fail to find a trace of her who had come and gone like a vision, but the secret annals of the Paris police contain the clue to the mystery.

The devious paths by which people arrive at the goal of their desire or the fulfilment of their fate is the theme of "Umwege," a volume of stories by Hermann Hesse, the author of "Peter Camenzind," which is now in its sixtieth edition. They deal with no unusual types of humanity, and are told simply and convincingly. The revolt of a priest against monastic seclusion, a well-worn topic usually invested with a sickly sentimentalism, receives a distinctly new note in the story of Pater Mathias. The priest's trespass against the vows of his calling occurs also in one of the strangely fascinating stories by Carl Hauptmann, "Nächte" (Leipzig: Kurt Wolff). But the ripest work that has come so far from the pen of that interesting writer is his new novel, "Ismael Friedmann" (Kurt Wolff), in which he has reached a formal mastery barely suggested in his earlier works. The structure of this story is solid, the portrayal of the characters direct and logical. Even the style is more forcible and lucid. The hero is the son of a Jewish prince of industry and a Protestant pastor's daughter, and combines the keen analytical spirit of the father's race with the imaginative dreamy soul of the mother. He looks like the Nazarene, but he is a Nietzschean individualist. He has a disregard for the material sources of his father's wealth; he would intellectualize and spiritualize life, but he could not do without the luxury and the comfort into which he has been born and the sensuous æstheticism which has enslaved him. He has flashes of genius, and is expected some day to startle the world with a great work, but, undisciplined by necessity, he does not know what real work is. He is morbidly self-conscious, and will not yield to the desire of woman at an age when he might love spontaneously. When he returns to the sweetheart of his early youth, the only daughter of an aristocratic neighbor, she, too, has changed, become too introspective and self-centred in her isolation, and is unable to share her inner life with another. A striking contrast is furnished by the other couple in the story, Ismael's sister Isot, and his friend Johannes, who cheerfully accept the fundamental facts of life, have numerous offspring, and live as happily as any fairy-tale lovers. Although of such frequent occurrence as to be a commonplace, such inter-marriage is much discussed in Germany, since race physiologists are concerned about the purity of the Teutonic race; and the dignified handling of the problem in "Ismael Friedmann" has received very favorable comment. The book is ranked as the most remarkable novelty of the season.

That form of fiction which offers a forecast of the future without being exactly Utopian, has of late been profoundly affected by industrial progress. The perspectives opened by American achievements have proved so rich in suggestion to the Germans that they have begun to feel the poetry of matter and of sheer material power. Such a "Zukunftsroman" is Bernhard Kellermann's "Der Tunnel" (S. Fischer), which deals with the stupendous problem of a submarine tunnel connecting America and Europe. Mac Allan, the discoverer of Allanite, the diamond steel which revolutionizes the work of excavation; his wife, Maud; his friend, the architect æsthete, Hobby; Lloyd, the prince of finance, and his daughter Ethel, are living and just impersonations. There is even a suggestion of insight into their inner life, as in the chapter succeeding the death of Maud and the child, when the mask is lifted from the undemonstrative Allan, and the man who seems all brains and grit is revealed as a man of tender and profound sentiment. But the interest of the foreign readers will undoubtedly centre in the pictures of the feverish activity of New York and Tunnel City, which vibrate with the rhythmical motion of monster machines and the dramatic intensity of a life which runs along at an even more rapid pace than that of to-day. The story is altogether extraordinary.

Jacob Schaffner, the young Swiss writer whose "Konrad Pilater" and "Irrfahrten" proclaimed him a worthy successor of Gottfried Keller, has also a story of modern industrial life in his collection, "Die goldene Fratze" (S. Fischer). Its title, "Der eiserne Götze," suggests the symbolical power of the great dynamo that governs the activities of the town. The atmosphere is alive with the thump of levers and the whirr of wheels, the glint of steel, the fumes of engine fires, and the exhalations of a mass of men toiling in the sweat of their brows. The dramatis personæ stand out effectively against this background: a middle-aged foreman who, engrossed in his work and his labor union, neglects his young wife, a sister of Shaw's Candida in the rough, who in her innocent way flirts with a young mechanic of impetuous temperament and dashing manners, admitted into the house as boarder. The youth with the Garibaldi tie becomes enamored of her, and when he realizes that she has no thought of surrendering to him, sulks and harbors hatred against the husband. Strikes and sabotage enter into the action of the story, and a fist-to-fist fight between the two men on the gallery surrounding the mechanical colossus. But no touch of sensationalism spoils the well-tempered colors of this picture of modern labor.

A book of Lothringian stories inevitably suggests comparison with the work of French writers, like Maurice Barrès. But Bernd Isemann's "Lothringische Novellen" (S. Fischer) do not touch the rankling problem of the lost province. They deal with the past of a family of Lothringian farmers of peasant stock, but enjoying the economic ease which insures comfort and culture. With the true story-teller's gift, Isemann pictures their life, sowing, planting, and reaping, with a genuine joy of activity, and drinking, laughing, and loving with a robust appetite and an untroubled conscience.

Marie Vaërting is another new writer whose work merits attention. In her first book, "Haskamps Anna" (Munich: Albert Langen), she portrayed a young girl incapable of correlating the traditional sentiments of girlhood with the new idea of intellectual development. The heroine of her second book, "Max Treumanns erste Liebe" (Albert Langen), is a fair representative of the new woman in whom vague aspirations have matured into practical realities, who has grown into a personality, has found her vocation, and is esteemed for her work by her professional colleagues. The attitude of the ordinary woman of the old type towards the new variety is suggested by that of her boarding-house neighbor towards Toni, and is not without humor.

The latest work of Emmy von Egidy, "Mathias Werner" (S. Fischer), is a fair specimen of that author's dignity and distinction. In other hands the plot of the story might have become a sensational serial: she has handled it with refinement and depth. The hero who gives his name to the story is the illegitimate son of an aristocratic father and a peasant mother, neither of whom can he remember. He grows up in the care of a village schoolmaster, who would adopt him, but the stern guardian withholds his consent. The mystery of his birth hangs heavy over the youth with the sensitive Hamlet soul, who longs for a home and a purpose in life, but whose initiative is at every step restricted. During a sojourn in Rome with some college friends—chapters which give most fascinating glimpses of a group of ardent young souls—Mathias succumbs to the lure of the Roman Catholic Church; but when he decides to embrace its faith, he is disowned, left to shift for himself without means, and cannot cast anchor in the harbor he had dreamed of. The world that had known him loses sight of Mathias in the years of struggle, spiritual and material, that follow. Not until long after obtaining his majority does he find a home with the widow of his father, who had been prevented by a clause of the will from adopting him before. Absorbing as this plot may be to the ordinary fiction reader, the paramount interest of the book lies in the development of the hero's character and the portrayal of the men and women that enter into his life.

Clara Viebig, who is probably to-day the most popular of German woman novelists, has in her latest novel, "Das Eisen im Feuer" (Egon Fleischel), reconstructed the life of Berlin people during the period between the revolution of 1848 and the war of 1866. The book suggests comparison with "Die Wacht am Rhein," of which the scene was Düsseldorf. But the author has certainly not lost any of the qualities that characterized the earlier work: her firm grasp upon the realities of life, her amazing faculty of reflecting the spirit of a place and its people, and the gift of throwing upon the canvas in broad, sure strokes the living types of plain folk.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

In such a work as the Oxford English Dictionary, which is made "on historical principles," and which embodies the best work of the most eminent British scholars in English, we may be sure that it is the intention of its editors to live up to the ideal of that work by invariably verifying deliberate statements of fact. A continued use of that work, however, discloses a number of unaccountable lapses in accuracy.

For example, why is it said that the word sepal is "formed after petalum petal by substitution of the syllable of Latin separatus separate"? This etymology agrees with the statements of other dictionaries made prior to the year 1900, but it is a statement that plainly needs verification, and is easily verifiable, for it is also stated that the term was proposed by Necker in 1790. This date is not given in any of the standard English dictionaries prior to 1900, and the fact that it is given lends to the whole etymology an air of historical accuracy that is entirely assuring. It appears, however, that sepal is not from L. separatus, but was coined by Necker, in 1790, from the Greek word σκέπη, covering; for he himself states this to be the origin of the term, as is mentioned in the New International Dictionary, published in 1909, three years before the publication of this part of the Oxford work. Besides this, Benjamin Daydon Jackson, secretary of the British Linnæan Society, in his "Glossary of Botanical Terms," published in 1900, gives this same Greek word as the source of Necker's term. This glossary was known to the Oxford editors, for they quote from it their definition of the word sclereid.

This is not a unique instance of what appear to be mistakes arising from failure to verify statements of fact where verification was clearly necessary, and could readily be made. If we go back to the first section published, we find Lindley, the British botanist, cited as authority for the statement that an anonad is a plant "allied to the pineapple," though the anonads, in fact, are dicotyledonous trees of the custard-apple family, and the pineapple is a monocotyledonous herb; the two plants are not even remotely related. Besides this, Lindley, in his latest edition, at least, says nothing that would justify such a statement. Whether he does in the earliest one is a matter of indifference, so far as the definition of the word is concerned. Under anonaceous it is stated that the word is from the "New Latin anona, a pineapple," and this meaning for the New Latin word seems as unsupportable as the definition of anonad.

So under the word molasses, the comment is made that: "In the Western U. S. (according to Bartlett Dict. Americanisms, 275) it is treated as a plural." The note to this effect first appears in Bartlett in the edition of 1859, and is retained in the edition of 1877, with the addition that: "When England condescends to use this word instead of treacle, she generally makes it plural." This incorrect statement, together with the fact that none of the standard American dictionaries of English mention such a peculiarity of Western U. S. usage, and the fact that the later dictionary of Americanisms by Sylvia Clapin (which has been quoted by the Oxford work) makes no mention of it, was enough to have made it clear that reliance could not be placed upon Bartlett's unsupported statement.

Whatever be the explanation of these shortcomings, they illustrate a defect, perhaps the most serious one, of the Oxford work—the failure to make an adequate use of standard works of reference; for in each of these cases a casual reference to the appropriate reference books would have given us history instead of erroneous statements. It is a source of real distress to see in its beautiful pages, beautiful in typography as well as in learning, the repeated discrepancies which arise from this lack of sufficient verification, in vocabulary, definitions, and citations.

For instance, medical and mineralogical terms are often included though of the most trivial importance, apparently merely because there happened to be a note or memorandum of the terms, with the definitions, as given in such and such dictionaries or textbooks. But often in these cases, a cursory reference to the works referred to, or to other contemporaneous works, discloses that there are other words of more importance that are not included in the Oxford work, or that there are obvious defects in the definitions there given. Similarly, words or senses are marked "Obs." when numerous instances of their current use may be found by a moment's reference to standard reference books. For example, liquidate, in the sense of "to determine and apportion by litigation," is marked "Obs.", and the last citation given for its use is: "1798 Bay Amer. Law Rep. (1869) I. 114 Agreed to pay the debt on its being liquidated." The word, however, is, in the sense shown in this citation, very far from being obsolete. Hundreds of present-day citations for its use can readily be found in the standard law reference books, British or American.

Archbishop Trench, in his outlines of how such a dictionary of English should be made, from which the Oxford work took its conception, counselled the general omission of technical terms; and we cannot but deplore, at times, that his wise counsel was not more closely followed. A dear price is paid when invariable accuracy and harmonious proportion are sacrificed for the sake of a big vocabulary. But we may be sure that this commercial necessity is regretted by no one so much as by the editors themselves. The only question is, whether it really was a commercial necessity to overburden the editors for such a result, when a stricter line of inclusion would have left them ample time to achieve virtual infallibility, at least in matters of historical reference, and would have afforded space as well as time for a larger view of subjects for the treatment of which the editors have an unequalled opportunity, an opportunity that, perhaps, will never be duplicated.

ELECTIONS IN OREGON.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A notice in the Nation of the result of a recent election in Portland, Ore., might be of interest, since you comment so fairly upon the political phase of our national life. The city of Portland adopted a commission charter, and is, therefore, one of the largest cities trying this form of government. It is difficult to prognosticate the result of this action on the part of the electorate, but two important political facts were emphasized by the election of the Mayor and commissioners. The value of women's votes was attested and generally conceded, and the ability of the electorate to use a modernized system, the preferential system, of balloting was shown. There was no well-defined or exciting issue at stake, yet a large vote was cast, and a choice made of five men which could not have been bettered had it been made by the directors of a large corporation. The men who, under the ward system, had heretofore been uniformly successful in gaining office, as well as some who had been nominated under the old plan, were decisively beaten, and the offices were given to persons of known ability and, in the main, with no political affiliations. Our charter calls for a non-partisan ballot, with nomination by petition. Ninety candidates filed for five offices, and those elected were two Democrats, one Progressive, and two Republicans. Their party affiliation was published as a mere incident to election comment after the voting. The largest vote was received by a man closely affiliated with the labor unions, an officer, in fact, who has the general confidence of the public and whose candidacy had been by the wise provision of the charter divorced from the question of labor and capital. The defeated and undesirable candidates had made a strong campaign, the successful ones a wholesome presentation of their qualifications, as well as their records.

I may venture to state that when the present commission takes office Portland will have as its public servants a group of men that any corporation would be glad to employ. Democracy has proved less of a fizzle here than many of our commentators would allow. A municipality of two hundred and odd thousand is basking in the belief that the people have a fair ability to take care of themselves.

LIBERTY IN TEACHING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his book, "Sittlichkeit und Religion," Direktor Dr. M. Jahn writes: "We do not believe that teachers will mutilate science in so far as it has a place in the school, for the sake of the Confessions, thereby separating the school from the spirit of the time and from actual life, the very thing for which the school is to prepare." And in another place: "The Catholic Church assumes from the very beginning that a large portion of the people cannot grasp a right understanding of the dogma. For the laity there is the fides implicita, i. e., faith in the authority of the Church. . . . This view the Protestant Church has rejected."

But the Protestant denominational college and theological school in America are still to a certain extent built upon the assumption that there is a fides implicita, and expect, or even require, the teacher to mutilate science so as to make it agree with the Confessions. When Union Seminary graduates young men who have been taught to face modern theological problems, the church to which they come is stirred up and protests are raised against the institution. Dr. Mecklin, of Lafayette, resigns because the conditions of his professorship do not permit a free discussion of scientific problems. A student in theology who gives his private views in reply to his professor's question is told that he has come to study the views taught by professors, and not to think for himself. The deciding question in the choice of theological professors is almost invariably: Is he orthodox? which is taken to mean: Will he teach nothing that is not approved by the Confessions?

Unquestionably every church and every school has a right to require of its teachers what it pleases. It may be well, however, to consider the consequences. If the school training is in contradiction with the science and best thought of the day, the student will either remain out of sympathy with his fellowmen and without deep influence upon them—a fair explanation of the weakness of the church; or, learning outside of college and seminary to appreciate modern thought and science, he will be out of sympathy with his teachers and will speak of the emptiness and deadness and uselessness of theology.

Can the Protestant Church afford either alternative? When shall we in this country of the free church appreciate what a German has written of the Free Church in Germany? "It will be the task of the Free Church to prove that it, as a church built upon a Confession, also has the power in a greater degree than the state church to influence religiously those people who are estranged from religion. Only if the Lutheran Free Church is equal to this task will it have a future and become an important factor in the further development of the Lutheran Church in Germany." In America every church is in the position of the Free Church in Germany and confronts the same task. And every church which handicaps itself by training its people not to be in sympathy with modern life and thought is really helping the cause of the Roman Church, which alone can with good grace hold a doctrine of fides implicita.

BIRDS AND THE TARIFF.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Bird protectionists are much exercised about a brief and apparently harmless amendment to the clause in the new Tariff bill which would prohibit the importation of wild birds' plumage for millinery purposes. This amendment has been approved by the majority members of the Senate Finance Committee, and was reported to the Senate Democratic caucus on Saturday. It exempts the plumage of all birds killed as "game" for food, and of all birds alleged to be "pests."

Whether or not the milliners are aware of it, this concession to them and to the feather trade involves much more than appears on its surface. The purpose of the original section (which was prepared and presented by the New York Zoölogical Society, and is receiving the active support of the National Association of Audubon Societies) was to enlist the United States Government in an effort to prevent the rapid extermination of many species of beautiful and useful birds, whose plumage thoughtless or heartless women wear in their hats. The enforcement of the section as amended would, of course, turn upon the definition of the terms "game" and "pest." And the emasculating effect (if not the intent) of the amendment becomes obvious in the light of the fact that, according to the "Hand List of the Genera and Species of Birds," published by the trustees of the British Museum, the "game birds" of the world, exclusive of the United States, comprise 1,622 species, while the birds which, rightly or wrongly, are regarded as "pests" include 720 species. Therefore, the amendment would make available for the feather trade 2,342 species of birds, virtually all of which, the ornithologists insist, are fully entitled, for economic or for sentimental reasons, to preservation.

There seem to be the very best reasons for supporting this measure in its original form, and for opposing the amendment which would largely defeat its purpose. From a purely economic point of view, the opposition of the milliners and of the plumage importers is no more defensible or sensible than is the opposition of any manufacturer or merchant, some phase of whose business is affected by a particular clause of the new tariff. Birds' plumage is by no means the sine qua non of the millinery industry—that is sufficiently proved by its disappearance from women's hats when feathers are not "fashionable." And Uncle Sam will have no need of apologizing for doing what he can to protect foreign as well as native birds from slaughter promoted by a custom which is essentially barbaric. G.

ARTURO GRAF.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: All who are interested in Italian literature or in the history and customs of the Middle Ages will read with regret the notice of the death of Arturo Graf, for above thirty years professor of Neo-Latin literatures at the University of Turin, and head of the Faculty of Letters. He was both poet and professor, a combination which, though less rare in the land of Carducci than in other countries, is particularly notable when its work is so fine and useful.

Arturo Graf was born in Athens in 1848. His father was German, his mother Italian, and he spent a large part of his youth in Rumania, where he published his first volume of verse when he was fifteen years old. He travelled much; was a studeut, a merchant, a lawyer, and at one time refused a political candidacy in Piedmont, where he had made his residence. He was one of the founders of the now-famous Giornale storico della Letteratura italiana, and a frequent contributor to many other literary and even philosophical periodicals. In 1878 his literary work carned him a professorship at the University of Turin.

Roughly speaking, his work consists of about six volumes of verse, more than six volumes of learned literary studies, besides many essays, addresses, and even a novel.

His poetry belongs to the cver-gloomy school of Leopardi. But in spite of his persistent and incorrigible pessimism, he had the force, the delicacy of vision, which made it possible for him to interpret with fresh originality his own exquisite sensitiveness. The main defects of this poetry are that it lacks what we usually call "the joy of life" and "the vehemence of passion." Graf naturally indulged in what was so aptly described by the Younger Pliny as "quaedam etiam dolendi voluptas," but in a healthy, philosophic way, and in beautifully sonorous Tuscan language. Open to the external charm of the world, he was as elegant in his voicing of the sea as D'Annunzio, as fond an interpreter of music as Fogazzaro, and all too frequently as macabre in his subjects as Poe. Some of his most charming lyrics are in the volume entitled, "Poemetti drammatici" (1905).

Graf's mind naturally ran to the fanciful, and to the truest forms of the fanciful, if I may say so, that is to say to folklore and old legends. These were his delight and his life-work. He took them as subjects for his poems and for his greatest learned studies, and in his dual capacity of creator and scholar brought out works of remarkable excellence. No student of the Middle Ages ignores the importance of his "Roma nella memoria e nelle immaginazioni del Medioevo," 2 vols. (1882-83); "Attraverso il Cinquecento" (1888); and, perhaps best known of all, his "Miti, leggende e superstizioni del Medioevo," 2 vols. (1892-93). At least two of his works are of special interest to students of English literature:

"Prometeo nella poesia" (1879), and "Anglomania e l' influsso inglese in Italia nel Secolo XVIII" (1911).

Ultra-punctilious scholars have found in some of these books certain inaccuracies in the order or presentation of the material. But in all fairness, realizing the hugeness of this man's field of study, the fact that he was a poet more than a scientist, and remembering the constant charm and inspiration which come from his pages, we cannot help forgetting his small faults in our gratitude. Through an extremely refined and thoughtful personality the thousand whims and beliefs of the Dark Centuries are revealed to us with a charm and a breadth of learning that make us regret that there are not more such poet-professors able with their poetry to interpret the present and with their teaching the hidden significance of the past.

BAUDELAIRISM.

The Influence of Baudelaire in France and England. By G. Turquet-Milnes. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50 net.

The Works of George Sylvester Viereck. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. 5 vols.

In the Dark Ages, when men were still interested in the Good and the Beautiful, such French critics as held themselves in some fashion responsible for the tone of French life and literature —men like Scherer, Brunetière, and Lanson—were less concerned about Baudelaire than about Baudelairism. The master of the school, like many of his disciples, was gifted with that maleficent flow of words, that ingenuity in combining them, that sheer expressiveness, which we call literary talent. To such persons as were unable to distinguish between Weltschmerz and Katzenjammer he even seemed to possess some spiritual significance. But no critic who respected the traditional uses of noun and adjective would call Baudelaire or any of the unstrung neurotics of his tribe a "great poet." Baudelaire, as all men of sense agreed, was on the whole a nauseating spot in modern poetry, which one liked to hurry past with averted nostrils—a man significant by the extremity of his disgraceful defeat in the conflict with his times and by the ordurous nature of his revenge upon society. The only serious thing about him, as Scherer remarked, was that a self-respecting critic should have to pay any attention to him. Baudelaire became considerable, however, as the source of Baudelairism, an epidemic disease, which in France has been virulent and uncontrollable, which has to some extent altered the complexion of English poetry, and has been observed, it is said, in two or three isolated cases in America. Like other forms of pestilence, it has attacked with peculiar severity persons of depleted vitality living in unhygienic conditions—the ill-fed, the vicious, the feeble-minded, consumptives, drug-users, dipsomaniacs, and physical degenerates. It is a subject rather for sociological than for literary inquiry.

All this is the irrelevant patter of an obsolescent form of criticism. Happily, Mr. Turquet-Milnes approaches Baudelaire and the "line of his great followers" on the ground of the new, higher, "non-moral" criticism. It does not make a particle of difference to him whether the influence of Baudelaire was seraphic or crocodilian. The one point of importance for him is that the world, because of this poet and his followers, is other than it was. He assures us that he has performed the critic's part when he has listened to the "echoes of a soul (the soul of a thinker or artist) as they sound through the world." It must be said that he knows his Baudelaire, that he has pretty clearly defined the Baudelairian spirit, has traced it through a wide range of French and English writers, and has exhibited a good deal of tact in the comparison of ideas and the choice of illustrations. Though far from profound, he is tolerably precise, and he shows a French neatness and brevity in making his points. The general reader will find in this book about all that he needs to know of the singers of the gloomy violets of despair. He will derive, furthermore, from careful attention to his guide, a fresh understanding of the constituent elements of greatness in literature.

How much we owe to Baudelaire and his school becomes apparent when we recognize, as Mr. Turquet-Milnes does, that they have expressed the distinctive temper of the nineteenth century. The chief elements of this temper present in French literature before Baudelaire, and combined by him, are three: First, "The faculty of self-analysis and self-torment in love," as seen in the "Adolphe" of Benjamin Constant. Second, "Pursuit of lust, mingling with it a kind of sacrilegious pleasure (Sainte-Beuve's 'Volupté'). Pursuit of temptation at any cost, with its inevitable consequences: perversity and madness on the one hand, mysticism on the other; creation of a new language." Third, "Moral anarchy, overwhelming pessimism, and terrible solitude of the soul (A. de Vigny)." To these grandiose elements should be added the splendor of the Baudelairian blague, illustrated by the master's public reference to the time when he assassinated his father, and by his equally famous comparison of the taste of infants' brains to that of green walnuts. "I had done a deed, they said, which the ibis and the crocodile trembled at": so wrote poor De Quincey, reporting his delirium. It was a triumph of the Baudelairian movement to adopt the hints of delirium into the conduct of life and to celebrate as a pattern of sincerity the obscene prattle of the idiot in his glory. At last we are able to say: "He had a natural instinct for the gutter, but he was devoted to the Beautiful. He was an idiot, but he was a great poet."

Edmond Scherer, to whom we have already referred, made an earnest effort to attain this high, disinterested, non-moral vision of the critical progressives, but his attempts at readjustment were not entirely successful. There is, for example, just a suspicion of the old narrow, puritanical vision in this characterization of Baudelaire:

> When once in the arts you begin to pursue sensation, you want sensation at any price. After beauty, ugliness; after the shapely, the misshapen. . . . The terrible once exhausted, you arrive at the disgusting. You paint unclean objects. You linger over them; you wallow in them. But this rottenness itself grows rotten. This decomposition engenders a fouler decomposition, until finally there remains an indescribable something that no longer has a name in any language—and that is Baudelaire.

Now, it is the highest aspiration of Mr. Viereck to be recognized as the American Baudelaire, and at first blush we were not a little puzzled to understand why Mr. Turquet-Milnes had not hearkened to his "echo" and placed him among the immortals. In turning over the five volumes of Viereck's collected works, we seemed to detect many of the salient markings of the Baudelairian species: a failure of the ordinary inhibitory impulses, a blatant egotism, the paint-and-plaster exoticism of a Broadway café, persistent absorption in the more squalid forms of harlotry, and a screaming vanity. Here, too, were our old friends, Lilith, Nero, Sappho, a vampire or so, and a whole batch of sphinxes. They were a trifle weathered and down at the heels, like a theatrical troupe returning from a tour in the West—but what of that? Remembering that the true Baudelairian is always an originator, we sought amid the resounding "echoes" for that personal and individual note which distinguishes a genuine poet from all his predecessors; and we discovered everywhere a certain brassy vulgarity in the feeling and the tone and the strut, such as one might expect in an immigrant boy without traditions or breeding who found himself in this country for the first time treated as an equal, and such as we could not recall in the works of any previous poet.

Let us do justice to Mr. Viereck. It would not be entirely accurate to say that we had read every one of his poems in the works of Swinburne or Wilde or Symons or Baudelaire or Verlaine. Mr. Viereck has enjoyed some "cultural" advantages unknown to his forerunners; he has not spent some twenty years in America in vain. There is one composition here which we undertake is unique in its kind. It is called "A New England Ballad." This, as he tells us, is his reply to Puritanism, and it is a crushing one. It is a contribution. The time indicated in the ballad is a "mirthless Sabbath day." The scene is a "drab and dreary town" in Mr. Viereck's New England, where "the sleek, the oily Pharisees" dwell "in long frock coats and tall silk hats." We say Mr. Viereck's New England. The house of ill-fame on one side of the street is confronted by the Roman Catholic Church attended by the Puritans on the other. Within the church, with "windows bare like sightless eyes," stands beside a "tabernacle" a Puritan parson—"a weazened parson cursing Joy." In the midst of a Calvinistic sermon, a Roman Catholic image "upon a cross of ebony" bawls out:

Impious parson, on thy knee!
How dare ye judge your Maker? He Am I. . . .

In successive stanzas the figure on the ebony cross talks Viereck to the weazened parson till the latter is turned into a "gibbering madman." We do not see the possibility of denying that this is an original conception.

And yet, after all—shall we confess it?—we have been somewhat disappointed by Mr. Viereck's works. We are really a little concerned about where to place him. Obviously he does not belong in any sense of the word in American literature, and we begin to understand why Mr. Turquet-Milnes has not seen fit to mention him with the followers of Baudelaire. Let us get at the matter in the impressionistic fashion. To tell the truth, receptive as we were, the Neros and the vampires and the sphinxes left us cold and unmoved. We must regretfully admit that in all the five volumes there is hardly a shudder. This signal failure to produce sensation is probably due in part to the unfortunate fact that Mr. Viereck's themes were hawked about the world for so many years before they came into his hands; in part, also, to the passionless character of the poet and his puppets, who, to say nothing of love, are as devoid even of the fishiest erotic interest as the minnows in an aquarium. As a Baudelairian, Mr. Viereck is a failure. In other words, at his intensest he is only mildly disgusting. For the rest, he is only mildly soporific.

In the last analysis it is doubtless a question of style, which we are to believe is the man himself. Such of the Baudelairians as have lost the final shred of poetical substance, hope to be saved at the last day by virtue of their style. What hope is there for Mr. Viereck? Opening his "Confessions of a Barbarian" at random, we have extracted this specimen of his manner in prose:

I was often stunned and surprised abroad. I met so many people out of my own books! I had never known that they really existed. I had never met them at Martin's. They had hidden their faces from me in America. Yet, here they were. I recognized the type. They made me feel creepy.

Some one has said that there is an "antiseptic" quality in style, and we will admit that this passage has style—the style of the First Reading Book. To illustrate Mr. Viereck's poetic manner we should not take him in an "echo," but in a passage where he has had some liberty to display the native and characteristic movement of his mind. The poem to "The Unknown Goddess" will answer our purpose. This piece turns on the fact that an unknown lady yearns for Mr. Viereck's signature and commissions a clerk in a book-store to ask him for it. This is the way in which the poet unfolds the beauty of the situation:

The clerk, I say, drew me aside, and thus
He spake to me: "A lady beauteous
Your book, O Poet, deems most exquisite,
And asks you please to write your name in it."
"Who can it be?"
"That may I not reveal.
She lives in splendor; dizzy motors reel
At her command, beside an equipage,
And oh! her town-house is a queen's ménage!"

We may be mistaken about the quality of this passage. There are two lines at least, the first and the fourth, with a somewhat unusual tonal effect. And yet we feel bound to say that the passage as a whole impresses us as poetically unsatisfactory. In the case of the "New England Ballad" one forgot the insipid sauciness of the words ascribed to the divine image in a whimsical sense of wonder whether the divine mercy itself could pardon the melodramatic balderdash of the style. In the bit of prose quoted above, one forgets to attend to Mr. Viereck's surprise abroad in amused contemplation of the infantile staccato of his sentences. In the case of "The Unknown Goddess" one forgets the lady with the equipage and the ménage in the perplexing question whether that note of somewhat brassy vulgarity which is Mr. Viereck's special contribution to poetry is not, as a matter of fact, entirely destructive of poetry. Taking it all in all, we are inclined to encourage Mr. Viereck in his feeling that he had better abandon poetry for business.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Scarlet Rider. By Bertha Runkle. New York: The Century Co.

The scene is the Isle of Wight, in the time of the American Revolution. The hero is Dirck Scott, an American privateersman, who, captured by a British officer, has bashed that officer's head, jumped overboard, and landed on the Isle. He finds shelter in the dwelling of Lord Yarracombe, is discovered in hiding by the fair Miss Lettice Yarracombe, and she agrees, on general principles (what heroine could do less?), to help him escape to France. A highwayman, known as the Scarlet Rider, is harrying the near counties of England. He is a perfect gentleman of the road, who operates by the Robin Hood code, robbing only the rich and the stingy, so that Miss Lettice does not shrink from the fancy that her protégé is he. Pending his escape, he becomes a footman at Yarracombe. Then arrives the elegant cousin whom Lettice is to marry. When we say that he is none other than the officer of the bashed head, and that the Scarlet Rider is really Miss Lettice's (why not Lady Lettice's?) father, Lord Yarracombe, we have given the prospective reader quite all the hints that he will desire as to the nature of the yarn. Dirck Scott is as improbably reckless and as impossibly chivalrous as the most exacting schoolboy could wish him to be. The dialogue is cast in the accepted jargon of historical romance. There is ample store of verbal misunderstandings and unexpected encounters, love-making and sword-play. Lord Yarracombe is debonair even in murder; and the wonderful mare which assists his exploits as the Scarlet Rider is not inferior to her kind. He conveniently gets his deserts in the last chapter, and Miss Lettice is free to be carried off under the nose of the British officer who has almost won her, by our esteemed compatriot, ex-privateer and ex-footman. In short, the tale is precisely adapted for those readers of all ages who like elaborate nonsense of the "costume" variety.

The Stain. By Forrest Halsey. Chicago: F. G. Browne & Co.

The villain is a corrupt judge; the hero a district attorney; the heroine a maiden of matchless beauty and blameless intent, but an intermittent kleptomaniac. The criminal impulse, which always possesses her in moments of physical or nervous exhaustion, she believes is inherited: she is sure that her father must have been a thief, though she does not know who he was. She leaves her adopted parents because she fears to disgrace them, and is presently a stenographer in the attorney's office. He falls in love with her, and, for his sake, she feels that she must again "move on." But on the eve of her flight, which is also the eve of a great contest between the attorney and the corrupt judge, her mania seizes her, and she is arrested for shoplifting. Attorney promptly marries maiden, and defends her before corrupt judge, who turns out to be her father. The discarded mother figures humbly in the action, as well as a son of the judge's prosperous years, who also inherits the stain. But the judge is a thief on a big scale, hand in glove with the boss who rules the city and the State. He looks forward to the Governorship as the supreme prize of his crafty career. Therefore he must carry things with a strong hand: only death, sudden death, while in the act of pronouncing his verdict, keeps him from sending his daughter to prison. There is material in the story for an emotional play, with many tense moments. As a story it is well told, though too obviously constructed.

His Love Story. By Marie Van Vorst. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co.

When a handsome young French count, who is also a captain in the cavalry, meets an American Miss Julia, his love story naturally begins: hers also. If he is poor, however, his sense of honor prohibits attentions beyond a certain point. When he is ordered to the front there is nothing for him to do but to depart speechless, leaving his dog in Miss Julia's hands. Such a count's dog naturally cannot live without him, and follows him to Algiers by the next boat. Such a dog, when his master is wounded and dying in the desert, infallibly trails him and brings help. Such a Miss Julia, when news comes of the captain's death, refuses to believe the worst, and sets out for Algiers. Such a generous and devoted trio as the count, the Miss Julia, and the dog are bound to be reunited, to part no more. But in setting down these rather obvious incidents, the present chronicler has employed more skill and delicacy than would be expected from the material, has produced a pretty and graceful story—a trifle excellently done.

Love's Soldier. By Olive Christian Mackirdy. New York: Cassell & Co.

This conquering hero was a London bank clerk, who loved an American banker's daughter. His career makes strange reading. It is the kind of story in which the Scotch author of an international best-seller is regarded as the best possible expert to direct the tottering fortunes of a New York bank; in which, just when the London branch of the business needs reinforcement, the beautiful waif adopted by the literary bank clerk regains an Irish father rolling in South American wealth; in which, towards the end, the now high and mighty bank clerk refuses a seat in Parliament, but after urging will accept a dukedom, whereupon the King confidentially arranges the conferring of the title as a nice little wedding surprise for the American bride. This application of the logic of the nursery saga to the possibilities of business "romance," must have been meant as a fairy-tale for the very young office-boy—a mistaken kindness, from which a taste formed upon detective literature is sure to save him.

THE TRUE JUSTICE.

The Old Law and the New Order. By George W. Alger. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25 net.

The title does not fit all of the essays which have been brought together in this volume, but appears to have been suggested by the topics discussed in the second and fourth of the series. In these, headed, respectively, "Courts and Legislative Freedom" and "The State as Employer," Mr. Alger assumes that the old law is based upon the individualistic theory of society, whereas the new order accepts the gospel of collectivism. The old law rarely interferes with the freedom of contract, deeming the individual quite capable of making his own bargains. The new order is continually penalizing freedom of contract, upon the theory that large classes of individuals are wholly incapable of bargaining wisely or advantageously. Under the old law, the hours of labor and the rate of wages were fixed by the agreement of employer and employed. The new order insists that the state shall regulate the hours of labor, the rate of wages, the time and the medium of payment. Legislation, enacted in accordance with such demands, has been held unconstitutional, and thus annulled by courts which have tested it by the rules of the old law. Hence the criticism of courts and the fierce clamor for the recall of judges which have filled the air of late.

One who listens to these noisy attacks is apt to think that judges do little else but declare progressive legislation unconstitutional and flout litigants who bring suits founded upon the principles of the new order. If, however, he investigates matters patiently he discovers that only a small proportion of litigated cases falls within these classes. The great body of law-suits involve no questions of the new order, but raise issues which both plaintiff and defendant are quite content to have decided in accordance with the rules of the old law. Probably no tribunal enjoys a higher reputation for judicial orthodoxy than the New York Court of Appeals. Certainly none has been subjected to greater criticism by the disciples of the new order. And yet, in the latest bound volume of its reports, only four out of nearly seventy decisions involve progressive doctrines. The remainder deal with controversies for the determination of which the rules of the old law were deemed fully adequate by all the litigants.

Mr. Alger, while a progressive, in the true sense of that much-abused term, is not a clamorer against the courts nor their hostile critic. In fact, he asserts that reactionary decisions "are few and far between." He recognizes the fact that the common law, as administered by our courts, is constantly adjusting itself to new social and economic conditions. Even the most critical portions of his essays bear testimony to the willingness of courts, as a body, to weave the doctrines of the new order into the fabric of the old law, whenever they accord with the needs of society and are not under the ban of constitutional prohibitions. In his own words:

> The notion that the courts form an adamantine barrier to progress is false. They do not bow to every fitful breath of change. Some judges move more slowly than others, to be sure, in adapting the law to the settled will of the people. But to their will they do conform.

It is true that Mr. Alger expresses the opinion that most of the statutes which the courts of our time are declaring unconstitutional involve problems of an economic, social, and industrial character; while the unconstitutional statutes of a century ago presented political issues. Undoubtedly, many of Marshall's great opinions were concerned with political questions, such as the relations of the States to the Union and the exact boundaries of executive, legislative, and judicial authority. But the statutes whose judicial annulment aroused the bitterest controversies, in the early years of the republic, were enacted in response to economic, social, and industrial agitation. One of the earliest of this class, a Rhode Island law, authorized the emission of paper money, made it a criminal offence for any one to refuse to take this money at its face value in a business transaction, and provided for the trial of a criminal of this sort by special courts without a jury. John Weeden, a butcher, not only refused to receive such money at its face value, but, when prosecuted criminally, insisted that the law was unconstitutional, and, therefore, void, because it denied him the right of trial by jury. His view was sustained by the Superior Court, whose members were soon summoned before the General Assembly to explain their conduct. The judges insisted that they were answerable for misconduct only in formal proceedings of impeachment. These were not instituted; but, as the judges were elected annually by the General Assembly, that body was able to displace them a few months later by officials whose social and economic views were in accord with those prevalent in the State.

Another example is afforded by the "Stay laws" of Kentucky, which provided that unless a judgment creditor should endorse on his execution, his willingness to take the paper money of State banks at its face value, in discharge of his claim, the debtor should have two years in which to pay it without interest. A decision of the Kentucky Court of Appeals declaring the legislation void because violating the "obligation of contracts" clause of the Federal Constitution precipitated a long and bitter conflict between the adherents of the old law and the champions of the new order. During its progress an attempt was made to legislate the old court out of existence; and for a time Kentucky had two Courts of Appeal. But the old law and the old court triumphed in the State elections of 1826, while the new order was ignominiously defeated in its attempt to recall judges and judicial decisions.

Both in Kentucky and Rhode Island the statutes, annulled by the courts, were enacted in the belief that they were promotive of social justice. In each case they expressed the will of a clear majority of the people. In each case the will of the people was defeated by judges who interpreted Constitutional prohibitions according to the canons of the old law. In the Bull Moose terminology of to-day, they were reactionaries. And yet, no one can doubt that in each case it was the judge, deciding in accordance with the old law and not in accordance with the social, economic, and industrial philosophy of the moment, who deserved well of the republic. He was charged, as courts are charged to-day, with a disposition to defeat the will of the people as expressed by their chosen representatives in the Legislature. Undoubtedly, he had that disposition; but it was because he believed that his oath of office required him to defeat the popular will of the moment when it ran counter to a clearly expressed rule of either the Federal or State Constitution. Such rules were formulated for the very purpose of preventing the people from violating certain cardinal principles of justice, during periods of excitement, and of giving time for a sober second thought.

The Formation of the Alphabet. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. Studies Series III of the British School of Archæology in Egypt. London: Macmillan (and Quaritch), 1912. 5s.

Dr. Petrie here gathers together from many sources in the Mediterranean region some sixty alphabetic signs that recent discoveries have made known to us, and essays to show the process by which our present alphabet, or, rather, its Greek progenitor, took selective shape and order.

The author, for conclusive reasons, rejects the old theory of a Phœnician (and ultimate Egyptian) origin of the alphabet. We are not to think of it as a system invented by a single individual or a single tribe in a somewhat advanced stage of civilization, and then borrowed by other tribes from it:

> On the contrary, it appears that a wide body of signs had been gradually brought into use in primitive times for various purposes. These were interchanged by trade, and spread from land to land, until the less known and less useful signs were ousted by those in more general acceptance. Lastly, a couple of dozen signs triumphed; these became common property to a group of trading communities, while the local survivals of other forms were gradually extinguished in isolated seclusion.

Of the Runic alphabet, which has recently been brought under fresh notice, Dr. Flinders Petrie says that it must be viewed as "a branch of the Mediterranean alphabets much older than the formation of the Greek and Latin forms, which at a later date barred it off from further communication southward. Whatever it has in common with Greek and Latin letters, it has merely in common with other alphabets as well."

The order of the letters in the alphabet is that as read from a primitive hornbook, of which a reproduction is given. The derivative Greek form, though it lacked certain letters, and had interpolated certain others, will be more intelligible to the general reader, as nearer to the Latin, and therefore to our own form. In this Greek hornbook the letters were arranged on the main tablet in four vertical columns perpendicular to the handle. The columns were originally of six characters each, but the Greek hornbook had discarded as needless the primitive characters at the bottom of all but the first column, as well as the third character in columns two and four. The first column showed the vowels A, E, I, O, Υ, Ω; the second, the labials B, F (third wanting), Π, Φ (sixth wanting); the third, the gutturals Γ, H, K, Q, X (sixth wanting); the fourth, the dentals Δ, Θ (third wanting), T, Ψ (sixth wanting). Then three later "liquids," Λ, M, N, were added in a single horizontal line on the flat handle of the hornbook, thus being opposite the middle of the columns on the tablet, and perpendicular to their direction. And, finally, the Greek, for its own needs, interpolated a few other signs, Z between the second and third columns opposite F and H, respectively; P and S together between the third and fourth columns opposite Q and T, respectively, and Ξ at the very extremity of the handle, next beyond N. Thus the hornbook was complete. But in learning the letters one naturally read them, not in the vertical columns, but in horizontal ranks, from left to right (Λ M N Ξ falling into line in the middle, after K), and thus the alphabetical order was established, which, with the few changes that belong to the history of the Latin tongue, and with the later differentiations of I and J, and of U and V, and the addition in its logical place of W, we still follow. Some problems, however, it is plain to see, are here unanswered, and the author acknowledges the patent fact.

The original home of the primitive hornbook, which was the immediate ancestor of that which we have described, Dr. Flinders Petrie is inclined to find in northern Syria, chiefly on account of the disregard of sibilants in the primitive system, and the use of aphabetic signs as numeral symbols, both of which characteristics are peculiar to that region.

Notes

Among the announcements of Henry Holt & Co. are "The Mastery of Grief," by Bolton Hall, and Miss Marjorie Patterson's "Dust of the Road," a novel of English theatrical life.

An authorized edition of the complete works of Arthur Schnitzler is in preparation by Richard Badger. Three volumes are already in the press for immediate publication, and the others will follow in rapid succession.

"The Inhumanity of Socialism" is the title finally chosen by Edward F. Adams for a book which Paul Elder & Co. will shortly publish.

In "The Story of California," announced by McClurg, Henry K. Norton begins with the summer of 1542 when Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo first set foot on the shore of San Diego Bay.

"The Poems of Sir Thomas Wiat," edited by A. K. Forwell from the MSS, with variants, commentary, and facsimile reproductions, will be issued in the autumn by the University of London Press.

Sir Sidney Lee has been called by London University to fill the chair in English.

The Oxford Church Bible Commentary, it is announced, is to give a completely new translation of the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the more important books of the Apocrypha. "The Book of Wisdom" (Macmillan), by the Rev. A. T. S. Goodrick, gives in considerable detail the apparatus for the criticism of this interesting Apocryphal work. The opinions of former commentators are examined, questions of date, design, and unity are discussed at length, and the views of the editor are embodied in footnotes, additional notes, and appendices. There are great differences among critics concerning the exegesis of the work, and Mr. Goodrick's conclusions will not all be generally accepted, but the volume supplies much information, it is written in a good spirit, and it will prove useful both to specialists and to the general reader.

In Petermann's Mitteilungen for May is the conclusion of the ethnographic description of the Balkan peoples by Professor Cvijic of Belgrade, in which he dwells especially upon their wanderings and assimilation and on the influence of Islamism. Dr. T. Herzog gives an account, with illustrations, of the Bolivian Cordillera, and in the military department Prof. A. Marcuse, of Berlin, discusses the difficult problem of the navigation of an airship in a dense mist. Interesting, as showing the wide range of educational facilities in Germany, is the list of subjects to be studied by the pupils of seventeen high schools in the summer semester of this year, ranging from African religions and the history of the United States to the fundamental principles of business.

"Burdett's Hospitals and Charities" for 1913 comes to us from the London publisher, the Scientific Press Limited. The usual voluminous information is given, for this country as well as for Great Britain and her colonies. The work well deserves its sub-title, "The Year Book of Philanthropy and the Hospital Annual." The author, Sir Henry Burdett, repeats his plea that the fiscal year for all hospitals should end December 31, so that comparison of resources might be made easier.

Francis McCullagh's lurid account of "Italy's War for a Desert," published in London last year and reviewed by us July 4, 1912, has now been brought out in this country by F. G. Browne & Company, of Chicago.

Noel Buxton's "With the Bulgarian Staff" (Macmillan) is a record of hospital work with the armies of Thrace. As a representative of the English Red Cross contingent and as an old friend of Macedonian freedom for which he has done valuable service through the Balkan Committee, Mr. Buxton enjoyed the privilege of riding with the Bulgarian General Staff in the wake of the victorious armies from Kirk-Kilisseh to Tchatalja. He is sufficiently explicit in depicting the heavy cost of war in loss of life and human suffering, but his hospital sketches, while inevitably painful, make no attempt at horror for its own sake. His tone shows the moderation that comes from true sympathy and knowledge; he is savage only when he speaks of Turkish rule. There he can see nothing but a record of massacre, plunder, and general bestiality. Conceding that the Balkan war was necessary, he is still an opponent of war. The war was necessary because one swift operation to rid the Balkans of a régime which by the slower processes of massacre was exacting a higher death toll than war exacts, had become inevitable. And yet the war could have been avoided if the Powers had done their duty, even as late as five years ago, by establishing self-government in Macedonia. With the familiar argument that war is a training school of national character and the field for the display of the manly virtues, he has no sympathy. How was it, he asks, that the Bulgarian people during centuries of subjection retained the manhood which spoke out so emphatically when the need arose? Of the actual course of the war it is Mr. Buxton's opinion that the Turkish downfall came not at Lule Burgas nor even at Kirk-Kilisseh, but in the very first days' fighting. Even before Kirk-Kilisseh there was a battle fought near the Bulgarian frontier of which the world knows almost nothing. The more one reads of Bulgarian operations in Thrace the more it is apparent that only a very partial knowledge of what really happened has reached us through the newspaper correspondents.

In two ways, at least, the title of B. Granville Barker's "The Passing of the Turkish Empire in Europe" (Lippincott) is misleading. The book does not deal with the late war in the Balkans, to which there is only the very slightest reference. Neither is it a methodical history of the Ottoman Empire up to recent events. What Mr. Barker has written is a lengthy travel book in which personal experiences and description are supplemented in the approved style by historical reminiscence. Of the latter there is altogether too much, especially as the historical narrative follows no systematic course, but leaps backward and forward through the ages in a highly disconcerting manner. When one has overcome the prejudice created by a mischosen title and a pretentious manner, the reader will find much entertaining matter in Mr. Barker's account of Turkish scenes and character. His pictures, for the most part pen-and-ink sketches of his own, are exceptionally good.

The club topsail, or, as the English say, jackyard topsail-jackyarder, is a kite in no wise entitled to the pride of good ancestry, according to R. Heckstall Smith and Capt. Du Boulay, authors of "The Complete Yachtsman" (Outing Publishing Company). It was born, not of the needs of the sailorman, but was "devised, or rather popularized, by racing men in America when the sail plan was measured in such a manner that one could get an additional bit of untaxed sail if the topsail extended beyond the gaff. . . . It was originally, thus, something of a rule-cheater." Whether the authors speak advisedly as to American responsibility or not is quite beyond our province to decide; at all events, it is a very useful stretch of canvas, and is used by the English and Germans, as by us. The assertion that cruising men, however, should fight shy of it is very well taken; they should. As for the rest, the book is complete, and justifies its title; it is the most comprehensive, most accurate yachting symposium yet placed between covers. Nothing is neglected, nothing overlooked. There are chapters on rudimentary work in sailing which convey valuable information to all beginners, together with chapters on more advanced points which will interest a yachtsman, however well versed in the sport he may be. The manner of building a boat is set forth in ample detail, as well as the handling of it when built. Motor-boating, its rules, and its general aspects receive adequate attention. In short, this is a volume to which the youngster setting forth in his first catboat, as well as the tried yachtsman, may give his days and nights with great benefit.

A number of excellent qualities and one serious defect are made manifest in the first two volumes of "The Everyman Encyclopædia" (Dutton), an undertaking which is to be completed in twelve volumes. Selling at the regular Everyman price of thirty-five cents per volume, it is altogether one of the most accessible works of reference on the market. There are probably half a million words to the volume. The contents have obviously been planned with an eye to the needs of the ordinary reader. Titles like Abbreviations, Academies, and other lists to which one frequently turns for a missing name or word are exceptionally full. The useful arts are well represented, as for example, Bookbinding with 5 pages. Science and technology show well condensed articles on Astronomy, 10 pages; Biology, 12 pages; Aeronautics, 6 pages; Accumulator, 1,500 words, etc. Particular attention is given to Law. But here is where serious objection may be raised. The law is all British law and the encyclopædia as a whole a British work with insufficient concession to an American public. In a long article on Army there are two pages devoted to the history of the British army, but the United States is nowhere mentioned. American biography suffers very badly. To John Adams are devoted just 110 words, of which 40 are bibliography. This is considerably less than the space given to Abbas Pasha, of Egypt, or the late Chief Rabbi Adler. If the Encyclopædia is to have a sale in this country commensurate with its general merits a fair amount of revision is necessary.

In "Highways and Byways of the Rocky Mountains" and "Highways and Byways of the Great Lakes" (Macmillan), Clifton Johnson makes two valuable additions to a series of sectional guide-books which now covers all but the New England and Middle Atlantic States. The chief purpose of the series being to treat of country life, especially of the picturesque and the typically rustic, it will be seen that the present volumes exploit fields peculiarly rich in incident and color. Page after page is filled with pleasantly garrulous conversation with farmers, rivermen, miners, and woodsmen from Pennsylvania to New Mexico, and with descriptions of peregrinations through wonderful stretches of scenery. There are interludes in both volumes, too, of more formal exposition, as in the chapters devoted to the copper country, the Straits of Mackinac, an Illinois valley, the Texas oil fields, Pueblo life in New Mexico, and life in a Mormon village. The numerous illustrations, like much of the text, are mere snapshots of wayside experiences. The notes appended to each chapter give information concerning automobile routes and many facts and suggestions to tourists in general.

"Oblivion has scattered her poppy effectively enough over the name of Aurelian Townshend, who is now but a shadowy figure dimly discerned in the background of that bustling London of the early Stuarts and the Civil Wars. Yet in his day he walked with wits and poets, and, for certain touches of rareness here and there in his song, it becomes an act of piety to piece together what is known of him into a more complete account than has before been attempted, and to let it stand as a preface to this belated gathering of his scanty harvest." So Mr. E. K. Chambers opens the introduction to his edition of "Aurelian Townshend's Poems and Masks," in the Tudor and Stuart Library printed at the Clarendon Press from type made in the old matrices. The "act of piety" Mr. Chambers has made also a work of fine scholarship. Townshend, indeed, after all the editor's research, remains but a dim figure, but his family connections have been untangled and a surer individuality has been given him. As for the handful of poems, of certain and doubtful authorship, their ingathering has meant a considerable turning over of old song-books and manuscript anthologies. They add a little to that body of Stuart poetry, constantly growing by the accretion of reprints, which as a whole is curiously amateurish in style, but is set off by occasional flashes of poignant beauty. About the best thing of Townshend's is his "Pure Simple Love," but this is too long to quote. As a fair specimen of his craft we choose the little "Youth and Beauty," taken from the "Ayres and Dialogues" (1653) of H. Lawes, and already reprinted by W. Beloe in his "Anecdotes of Literature" (1812):

Thou art so fair, and yong withall,
Thou kindl'st yong desires in me,
Restoreing life to leaves that fall,
And sight to Eyes that hardly see
Halfe those fresh Beauties bloom in thee.

Those, under sev'rall Hearbs and Flowr's
Disguis'd, were all Medea gave
When she recal'd Times flying howrs,
And aged Æson from his grave,
For Beauty can both kill and save.

Youth it enflames, but age it cheers,
I would go back, but not return
To twenty, but to twice those yeers;
Not blaze, but ever constant burn,
For fear my Cradle prove my Urn.

A book from the Clarendon Press, similar in general appearance to the Tudor and Stuart Library, but printed in modern types, is the "Trecentale Bodleianum," which, as the sub-title explains, is "a memorial volume for the three hundredth anniversary of the public funeral of Sir Thomas Bodley, March 29, 1613." It contains Bodley's autobiography, the first draft of his statutes for the Library, extracts from his will relating to the Library, two funeral orations in Latin, besides other pertinent matter.

Any book on government which expressed appreciation for courtesies extended by "Mr. Charles F. Murphy, head of the Tammany organization in New York city," and by other authorities only less notable, ought to be a sure guide to the subject; and, indeed, the material in Prof. P. Orman Ray's "Introduction to Political Parties and Practical Politics" (Scribner) is well selected. It is also written in a clear, brisk, textbook style. Exception will be taken by many students in this field to the author's rosy view of direct legislation as a remedy for the evils of our legislative system. In this part of his book he almost becomes an advocate, backing up his opinions with quotations from other writers who think as he does, instead of presenting the considerations on both sides, giving the results of the experiment as far as it has had certain results, and leaving the matter there. A more sweeping criticism is that of his arrangement. Superficially, a four-fold division into "Present-Day National Parties," "Nominating Methods," "Campaigns and Elections," and "The Party in Power" may seem logical, as following the chronological order of political events in the life of a party. But the consequences of this distribution of material are not entirely happy. The student is nearly three-fourths of the way through the book before he comes upon Machines and Bosses, this chapter having been placed in Part IV. Yet how much of an understanding of the subject of Part II, "Nominating Methods," or of Part III, "Campaigns and Elections," will he have without it? Especially commendable is its attention to the forms of the ballot and to the comparatively neglected topic of the politics of legislative bodies.

The composite character of English speech is strikingly illustrated by the double section of the "Oxford English Dictionary" Sniggle-Sorrow, prepared by W. A. Craigie (Frowde). Among the 3084 words listed there are numerous snippy English monosyllabies in Sn—such as snore, snort, snuff; Dutch snow, a small sailing vessel; Scandinavian snipe and snub; Gaelic sonsy, happy epithet for a lass; French sojourn and soirée, of which the first record is from Lady Granville's Letters, 1820; Italian solo and soprano; Latin socialism, soliloquy, and solitary; Greek solecism and sophist; Oriental sofa and sophy. The ancient anarchy in spelling into which some of us are again so merrily plunging is recalled by the word soldier, which has appeared in at least seventy different forms. Dilettante Walpole gets the credit for introducing in 1760 the rich romantic adjective sombre, indispensable in characterizing the reflections of the Byronic and pre-Byronic heroes. To the Romanticists and to Scott in particular is due the revival of sooth, which seems almost abruptly to have lapsed from use in the middle of the seventeenth century. The sense development of the verb soothe offers a peculiar surprise to any one who has associated soothing too closely with a certain sovereign syrup for ululant infants. Soothe is good old Anglo-Saxon for verify, and, indeed, is used in that sense as late as the sixteenth century, e. g., "being inquisitive of these matters, I could find no one of them soothed by such persons upon whose relation I am disposed to venture." Soothe, however, moves towards its modern meaning when Warner writes in 1596, "Amen, I sooth'd no lye," and Lane in 1616, "to heere what lies they soothe." The next step is indicated in Massinger, 1623, "Sooth me in all I say. There's a main end in it." And so by little and little soothe suffers its declension from verifying to corroborating, to backing up, to encouraging, to praising, to pacifying, and to drugging.

Another interesting sense-history is that of the word snob, a term of obscure origin, in its earliest use, in 1781, meaning a shoemaker or cobbler. In its second stage it is Cambridge slang for "any one not a gownsman, a townsman"—the equivalent of "mucker" in Cambridge, Mass. Next in 1831 it is generalized to include any persons "belonging to the ordinary or lower classes of society." The classical English sense is fixed by Thackeray's "Book of Snobs," 1848, where it means "one who meanly or vulgarly admires and seeks to imitate, or associate with, those of superior rank or wealth; one who wishes to be regarded as a person of social importance." Now, there is a distinction between the English and the American use of snob, which is neither defined nor illustrated in the Oxford nor in our own Webster's Dictionary—a distinction due to the influence of aristocratic as compared with democratic traditions. In an American University town, for example, snob is not applied by gownsmen to townsmen, but by townsmen to gownsmen. In American social circles it may occasionally be applied to vulgar "climbers," but it is much more likely to be applied by "climbers" to inaccessible members of the "inner circle"; a snob is not one who seeks to associate with those of superior rank or wealth or intelligence, but one who keeps aloof from those of inferior rank or wealth. In other words, an English snob is a man who falls short of the perfect aristocrat through a taint of democratic vulgarity, whereas an American snob is a man who falls short of the perfect democrat through a taint of aristocratic exclusiveness.

The purpose of "Home Life in Russia" (Macmillan), by A. S. Rappoport, is, apparently, to give a casual reader an impression of the manners, customs, and ways of thought that distinguish the Russian people from their western neighbors. In this the book resembles the "Russian Life in Town and Country" of F. H. E. Palmer, to which, however, it is by no means equal in merit. Though Dr. Rappoport gives excellent and entertaining information, he sometimes presents it in a form unintelligible to persons not previously acquainted with Russian affairs; thus he continually uses the terms Great Russian and Little Russian, but never explains their meaning. His incoherent style, and in particular his continual neglect of paragraph structure, make reading wearisome. Important mistakes occur; for example, the Carnival discussed on pages 37-39 is the same festival as the Butter Week of pages 52-56. This Butter Week does not precede Easter, as is stated on pages 52, 53, but Lent; this odd slip leads the author to repeat a description of a popular custom of which he has already written (p. 38). The statistics of attendance at the Russian universities are given for the year 1901 (p. 204), though later figures are readily ascertainable. The system of transliterating Russian words is more German than English, and is made worse by frequent misprints; "les monshires c'est tout" (p. 7) is evidently meant for "les moushiks [muzhiks] c'est tout." The best feature of the volume is its admirable illustrations, prepared from photographs either of actual scenes or of paintings by Russian artists.

"History as Past Ethics" (Ginn), by P. V. N. Myers, is intended to complete "the series of historical text books which I began more than twenty years ago." The sub-title is "An Introduction to the History of Morals"; and the book conveys briefly what the author conceives to be the chief characteristics of the ethical and moral ideals of various Oriental peoples, of the Greeks and Romans, and of Christian Europe in the different stages of its history. Mr. Myers has read many books, and presents in clear and simple language much information which, as information, it would not be amiss for high-school pupils to acquire in connection with their courses in history. But besides presenting this information, he has made an attempt to illustrate by means of it a theory of moral progress which in turn becomes the basis for a philosophy of history. The theoretical part cannot be accounted original, nor very convincing; it is, indeed, not quite consistent, a circumstance which seems to arise from the fact that Mr. Myers has taken, for his purpose, ideas from many sources which do not always fit neatly together. He maintains, for example, that neither intellectual advance, as Buckle thought, nor economic conditions, as Marx would have us believe, nor religion, as churchmen insist, is the directing force in history; moral progress, on the contrary, constitutes "the very essence of the historic movement." But then it turns out that moral progress is itself dependent precisely upon intellectual advance, economic conditions, religion, and so on. This is much like saying that history is determined by moral progress, and moral progress by history. Well, it is not given to all to bend the bow of Ulysses! In spite of his theorizing, Mr. Myers's book will doubtless have its uses.

Anson Phelps Stokes, who for nearly half a century had been prominent in the mercantile and financial life of New York city, died on Saturday, aged seventy-five. He was the author of "Joint-Metallism," which went through five editions, and of two books of travel, "Cruising in the West Indies" and "Cruising in the Caribbean with a Camera."

In Beaver World. By Enos A. Mills. With illustrations from photographs by the Author. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.75.

Except a few good notes in magazine articles, chiefly valuable for their photographic illustrations, nothing of much account has been published about the beaver since the classic book by Lewis H. Morgan, issued in 1865. Mr. Mills has made his home since boyhood in the Rocky Mountains, winter and summer, yet has found time to ramble all over the continent, everywhere giving "studious attention" to the beaver. "At any time during the past twenty-five years," he explains, "I could go from my cabin on the slope of Long's Peak, Colorado, to a number of colonies within fifteen minutes. . . . One autumn my entire time was spent in making observations and watching the activities of beaver in fourteen colonies. Sixty-four days in succession I visited these colonies, three of them twice daily. These daily investigations enabled me to see the preparations for winter from beginning to end. They also enabled me to understand details which with infrequent visits I could not even have discovered."

Knowing these prefatory statements to be true, the reader will expect much novelty and minuteness of information, and he will not be disappointed. Moreover, he will be pleased to find the story told in terse, straightforward English, brightened by sympathetic sentiment, yet free from rhapsody or flighty hypothesis. There is some repetition, because several of the chapters have been previously used as separate articles; but an excellent index corrects this fault of orderly book-making.

The text of the book, so to speak, is the history of a colony of beavers which existed high up on Long's Peak, as mentioned. Their work and play, how they obtained food, were housed, and solved the problem of winter; how they repaired accidents and invented new ways of doing things to meet emergencies; and how, incidentally, they served the world by checking floods and storing water, are related with interesting details and exhibited in photographs. Interwoven with this are notes of comparative observations made elsewhere, sometimes corroborative, often at variance, manifesting the individuality of colonies as well as of single workers in adaptation to varying circumstances.

The form and material of the beaver's house are familiar, but several widely accepted statements in regard to its structure seem less certain in the light of Mr. Mills's experience. The construction of a typical "lodge" in the Rocky Mountains is thus outlined:

> Most beaver houses stand in a pond, though a number are built on the shore and partly in the water, and still others on the bank a few feet away from the water. . . . Houses that are built in a pond usually stand in three or four feet of water. The foundation is laid on the bottom of the pond, of the size intended for the house, and built up a solid mass to a few inches above water-level, . . . forming the floor of the low-vaulted room which is enclosed by the thick house-walls. In building the house the beaver provides a temporary support for the combined roof and walls by piling in the centre of the floor a two-foot mound of mud. Over this is placed a somewhat flattened teepee- or cone-shaped frame of sticks and small poles. These stand on the outer part of the foundation and lean inward with upper ends meeting against and above the temporary support. The beaver then cover this framework with two or three feet of mud, brush, and turf, and thus make the walls and the roof of the house. When the outer part of the house is completed, they dig an inclined passageway from the bottom of the pond up through the foundation, into the irregular space left between the supporting pile of mud and the walls. And of this space they shape a room, by clawing out the temporary support and gnawing off the intruding sticks. This represents the most highly developed type of beaver house.

The reviewer does not know where else he could find so detailed an account of beaver architecture as this; and many other revelations of the work and psychology of the animal are equally original in statement.

Prof. Charles K. Leith is bringing out, through Holt, a small volume on structural geology.

The little manual, "Elementary Geography of North and Central America and the West Indies," by F. D. Herbertson, is Volume V in the Oxford series (Frowde). It is a very condensed description, but is readable and well illustrated.

Recent anxiety over the national meat supply makes timely the appearance of "Sheep Farming," written chiefly by the late John A. Craig, and published in Macmillan's Rural Science series. When legislators propose to prohibit the killing of calves for veal, in order to conserve the beef supply, and when statisticians are calculating the diminution in the numbers of market lambs, all books which point the way to the raising of meat on our farms are of especial value. "Sheep Farming," recognizing that the days of the open range are going, if not gone, encourages and explains the keeping of sheep on the ordinary homestead farm. The book, three chapters of which are by H. P. Miller, thoroughly discusses farm equipment, the choice of breeds, the formation and management of a flock, and the preparation of sheep for exhibition. The illustrations are very satisfactory, especially the series showing a sheep-shearing expert at work.

Drama and Music

"In the Vanguard" (Macmillan), a three-act play by Mrs. Katrina Trask, is animated by such high purpose and contains so much sound philosophy that it is a pity its enthusiasm was not tempered by discretion —by a little clearer recognition of the fact that this perverse and headstrong world is not yet ripe for government by Utopian principles. With a little larger admixture of worldly wisdom it might have been made much more effective. The theme of it is the folly, wickednesss, and wastefulness of war, and it is fortified by all the usual arguments, most of which, in theory at least, are entirely impregnable. To discuss them would be to provoke a futile controversy. Mrs. Trask's hero resigns a lucrative legal position and turns soldier for the sake of the heroine, Elsa, who vows that she will only wed a hero. In war he distinguishes himself greatly, winning glory and rapid promotion, but after a bloody battle he comes across a dying enemy, smitten with remorseful despair, who succeeds in convincing him that each individual combatant must share the collective responsibility for all the lives destroyed in conflict, and that he himself is therefore many thousands of times a murderer. So he throws up his commission, and his hopes in love, preferring to endure contumely rather than engage further in impious bloodshed. But, fortunately for him, a rich humanitarian, a believer in the philosophy and morals of Christ, although a bitter opponent of much clerical teaching and dogma, has, in the meanwhile, shown Elsa the superiority of spiritual to merely physical courage, and she is ready to welcome the returned soldier. Thus virtue triumphs after all, and is made supremely comfortable by the wealthy benefactor, who finds the young man a profitable and honorable job. It is a pretty, sentimental story, written in places with no little vigor and eloquence, but it is not well suited, either in expression or form, for stage representation.

Gabriele d'Annunzio's new play, "La Pisanelle, ou la Mort parfumée," was produced a fortnight ago at the Châtelet Théâtre in Paris. The action, we read in a notice in the London Times, takes place in Cyprus, when young Huguet de Lusignan ruled over an accursed island. According to prophecy, it would be delivered from pestilence by the advent of a saint who would come in rags and in bonds on the poop of a corsair's felucca. Presently there runs into the port of Famagusta a felucca laden with the booty of a sea raid, and when the curtain goes up after the prologue, sea rovers are shown lustily disputing the ownership of La Pisanelle, a courtesan of Pisa, whose strange beauty inflames the hearts of all. She is put up at auction, and the King's uncle, the Prince of Tyre, claims her as his property. While he is extolling her loveliness, Huguet de Lusignan, the melancholy mad young King, rides through the market-place, and to him La Pisanelle, bound as had been foretold on the poop of the corsair's craft, appears as the ragged saint at whose hands the stricken isl-and awaits deliverance. To the Prince of Tyre, however, she appears in a more seeular light, and the King, in order to prevent her falling into his hands, slays him and flees from his Court. The King's mother, anxious to free her son from the spells and magic of La Pisanelle, who, it is whispered, may be Venus herself, invites her to a great entertainment at the Court. There, while she dances, slaves surround her with heavy-scented blossoms, and she meets her perfumed death.

The play, whieh is based mainly upon old Greek legends, is written in French blank verse modelled upon that of Honoré d'Urfé, with alternate lines of ten and six feet. There are some passages of subtle and rhythmic grace, and the subject of the play has enabled d'Annunzio to weave an intricate poetic pattern in which are mingled the romantic mysticism and the robust humor of the age. The play, however, suffers from the very wealth of the legend and the times which inspired it. The opportunity for scenic display is great, and there is some romantic music by Hildebrande da Palma.

"Scandinavian Violin Masters" is the title of a collection of pieces for violin and piano, published by Nikolay Hansen. It includes Grieg's "Ave Maris Stella," a Berceuse by Gode, Sinding's "Bird in the Grove," with pieces by Malling, Halvorsen, and others.

Mascagni was the conductor of the Verdi Centenary Festival given in Florence a few weeks ago. Under his direction the local orchestra and choral association united with soloists in the performance of selections from Verdi's early operas—"I Lombardi," "Ernani," "Nabucco," and "Traviata." Mascagni was received with enthusiasm when he appeared at the desk. That he is not a great conductor any more than he is a great composer did not seem to make much difference on this occasion. He is famous—that was enough. He also made what is said to have been his first public speech.

If Oscar Hammerstein has really engaged the famous Italian tenor, Anselmi, besides Melba, Maurice Renaud, and Leopoldo Mugnone, whom some regard as an even greater conductor than Toscanini, he will have the nucleus for a fine opera company at his new theatre that is now building. It has been said that Toscanini is like Bonci, whose finished art appeals primarily to the musically initiated, while Mugnone is "the Caruso of operatic leaders," whose conducting appeals to the masses.

The latest product of Max Reger's busy pen is a "Roman Song of Triumph," for men's chorus and orchestra. It is his opus 126. It was performed in Berlin a few weeks ago at the Tonkünstlerfest. The text, as the critic of the Börsen-Courier remarks, offers opportunity for little besides decorative music, and this tempted Reger to indulge in excessive sonority:

> An uninterrupted fortissimo lasting some minutes no longer has the effect of a kind of musical expression, but simply degenerates into noise, all the more because, in this case, there is no characteristic musical invention. An exception may be found in the middle part, where the prisoners of war are referred to; it contains the only bars of music in the whole piece, and here Reger has succeeded in conveying the expression of grief through the use of discords.

When Paderewski's "Manru" was produced in New York, he specially brought over for the title rôle the Polish tenor, Alexander Bandrowski, who died a few weeks ago at Cracow, aged fifty-three. In Poland he was famed as a Wagner singer.

For a single sheet of paper, on which Richard Wagner had written a few words, together with six bars from "Siegfried," the sum of 450 marks was paid at an auction in Berlin the other day. The original manuscript of the eighth scene of the first act of "Tannhäuser" brought 550 marks. At the same auction seven minuets written by Mozart when he was thirteen years old were sold for 2,375 marks, while Weber's first grand sonata for piano was knocked down for 3,100 marks. About $200 ($25 marks) was paid for a letter by Gluck in which he wrote to a friend that he had no use for praise by the French, "for they are as changeable as the weathercock."

A novel feature is to be introduced in the public library of Los Angeles—a music room equipped with pianos on which patrons of the general library can try over any of the music on hand to ascertain if they can play it or care to buy it. Later, according to the Tribune of that city, phonograph and graphophone records will be provided for making selections before purchasing a set of new records. The room is to be made sound-proof, so that readers in other parts of the library may not be disturbed.

Chopin's complete letters have at last been made accessible in a German translation, by Bernhard Scharlitt, published by Breitkopf & Härtel. The editor calls attention to the fact that some of Chopin's letters were incorrectly reproduced in the German version of Karasowski's biography, and that these errors were copied by Niecks. The present volume includes a number of letters not previously issued in book form; new light is thrown on the relations with George Sand and the causes of their separation. The correspondence begins with the composer's boyhood and continues to shortly before his death, with a break of five years at the time when he first went to Paris. The keynote of the letters is a strong predilection for Poland, although Chopin's father was a Frenchman.

When the veteran Saint-Saëns visited America, a few years ago, it was noted with surprise with what vigor and freshness the septuagenarian played his own piano pieces and others. The same comment was made recently, in London, at the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the day when, as a boy of three, he took his first music lesson. At Covent Garden, in the evening, there was a performance of his opera, "Samson et Dalila," and this was preceded by an afternoon concert at which he played and Beecham conducted his C minor symphony. A feature of this concert was an overture to a comic opera composed when Saint-Saëns was nineteen, and heard on this occasion for the first time.

Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture. By Thomas Graham Jackson, R.A. Cambridge University Press. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. Two volumes. With 165 plates and 146 illustrations in the text. $12.50 net.

It is a pleasure to review a work to which such sincere and almost unqualified approval can be given as is due to these two handsome volumes. The author, already widely known in the United States by an admirable work on Dalmatia, the Quarnero, and Istria, is not only an accomplished scholar and writer, but also a practicing architect of high reputation. He is the designer of a considerable volume of notable work, which comprises many ecclesiastical and university buildings, besides the recent remarkable achievement of the underpinning and consolidation of the fabric of Winchester Cathedral, which was threatened with ruin by the settling of the old foundations. He is probably the most distinguished representative of that group of English architects who successfully combine practical experience in the profession with the highest culture of the universities and the sound scholarship which these inculcate: a class which has but few representatives in the ranks of the American profession, in which the pressure of our driving and hurried practice leaves so little leisure for study and productive scholarship.

Mr. Jackson treats each of the various phases of early mediæval architecture with equal sympathy and appreciation, and supplements the observation of the student of historical documents with the observation of the trained architect and designer of buildings. His extensive travels have enabled him, in his analysis and discussion of the monuments, to speak in almost every case from personal inspection of and acquaintance with the building. His breadth of view is illustrated by the generous and intelligent appreciation which, unlike many of his fellow-mediævalists in England and America, he bestows upon Roman architecture. He acknowledges the greatness and beauty of its masterpieces, declares it to be the real parent of all the mediæval and modern styles, and defends it boldly and convincingly against the aspersions of narrow-minded critics (Vol. I, pp. 7-12).

The survey undertaken in these volumes covers the Roman sources of Christian architecture and the history of the mediæval styles in Europe from the decline of Rome to the beginnings of Gothic architecture. It includes, therefore, an account of the beginnings of Christian architecture, of the early basilican churches, the Syrian and provincial transitions to the domed Byzantine style; an admirable discussion of Byzantine architecture in Constantinople, Venice, Ravenna, and Salonica; chapters on the Lombard and Tuscan Romanesque churches of Italy and the German Romanesque architecture; and a series of chapters, occupying the greater part of the second volume, on Romanesque architecture in France and England; closing with an excellent analytical résumé of Byzantine and Romanesque architecture in general. The historical movements, the causes, antecedents, and accompaniments of each characteristic development are adequately traced. The analytical description of particular buildings includes most of the more notable examples of each style, and of many which, though less familiar than these to the ordinary student, are important or interesting as links in the chain of historic and artistic development. The brevity of the notice accorded to some even of the more important monuments—such, for example, as the cathedral and baptistery at Pisa—and the almost total absence of reference to a number of the important churches of Italy—San Zenone at Verona, for example—though they suggest haste or impatience, are more probably due to deliberate intention; and are in any case compensated for by the fulness and the high quality of the accounts of Hagia Sophia, St. Mark's, the Abbey of Vézelay, and other monuments of really first-rate importance in the historical developments which the author is seeking to trace. The accounts of the Byzantine monuments of Salonica and of a number of the minor churches of Constantinople which the Turks have preserved as mosques, are particularly valuable. Very interesting also is Mr. Jackson's report to the Commissioners of the Evkaf (religious properties) of the Ottoman Empire on the present condition of Hagia Sophia. The Greek and Russian Byzantine churches are not discussed, presumably as lying outside the main current of architectural development selected.

In his treatment of French and English Romanesque architecture, to which 209 pages of the second volume are devoted, Mr. Jackson establishes a most impartial division of the space, assigning 125 pages to the French section, against 84 to the English. Such generous recognition of the real relative importance of the two architectures from the historical and technical point of view, is not common with English writers. In spite of this reserve in the treatment of the English developments, Mr. Jackson's account of both the Saxon and Anglo-Norman styles and monuments leaves little to be desired. One might well have pardoned, not to say desired, a rather more extended notice of the cathedrals of Ely, Peterboro, and Norwich, of Waltham, St. Alban's, and Southwell abbeys (the last now Southwell Cathedral), and of old "St. Bart's" in London; but here, as in other cases already referred to, the author was probably following a set design.

It is noticeable that Mr. Jackson omits all reference to the important investigations and discoveries of Professor Goodyear relative to designed irregularities and optical refinements in mediæval buildings. Even in the case of Pisa Cathedral, he contents himself with remarking very briefly the vitalizing effect of those minor irregularities signalized by Ruskin in his "Seven Lamps of Architecture."

There are a few photographic views, but most of the illustrations are from drawings, chiefly by the author. These, as well as those by his son and by other artists, are without exception well chosen and truly illustrative. There are four reproductions of water-colors by the author, of Byzantine interiors at Salonica, Ravenna, and Parenzo, and of the cloister of Le Puy, which are worthy of especial praise; they are exquisite in color and sufficiently detailed to be instructive without sacrifice of artistic expressiveness.

The books are handsomely made, and the proofs have evidently been read with exceptional care. A somewhat detailed scrutiny has brought to light only two trifling errors of typography, besides the two mentioned in the errata. An elaborate chronological table adds materially to the value of the work for reference, and there is a fully detailed index. The two volumes must surely take their place among the standard classics of every architectural library.

The "Reminiscences of Augustus Saint Gaudens" have been edited and amplified by his son, Homer Saint Gaudens; and the work will be issued in the autumn by the Century Co. in two large volumes, with many illustrations showing Saint Gaudens's work, and persons and places associated with his life and career.

Messrs. Dickinson, of London, will publish in the autumn "Samuel Cooper and the Miniature Painters of the Seventeenth Century," by J. J. Foster.

Dr. Ernst Steinmann, who is well known for his studies of the Sistine Chapel and the Medici tombs, is about to publish by subscription a handsome volume on portraits and other pictorial material concerning Michelangelo. Some seventy contemporary portraits will be reproduced from Dominic Anderson's negatives. "Die Portraitdarstellungen des Michelangelo" is open to subscription at Klinkhardt & Biermann's, Leipzig, at £5 sterling, subject to increase after issue.

For those contemplating such a pilgrimage "An English Cathedral" (Crowell), by Kate F. Kimball, will be found a convenient and not overburdened guide.

Finance

THE BANKING BILL AT WASHINGTON.

The two points in the new banking and currency bill which have impressed themselves most definitely on the financial mind are the refusal of the drafters of the bill to provide for a representation of experienced professional bankers on the national supervisory board of the new system, and the inflationist bent of the original currency proposals. It is never easy for financial markets to determine what to do about an inflation argument; because currency inflation automatically drives up prices, even when the longer consequences of such an undertaking are sure to be unfortunate. The Stock Exchange was in doubt what to do, even when the Windom plan of 1890 was proposed—a scheme of currency inflation, with a political connection to it, that had most deplorable results. Other people than the Wall Street constituency have to take the front of the stage, when serious discussion over the possibility of inflation in a currency measure has begun. They will be in evidence when the public hearings begin before the Congressional committees, and practical men of affairs give their judgment on the practical working of the plan.

As for the argument based on undue political centralization, the central board, made up of Cabinet officers and politically-appointed outsiders, undoubtedly creates many serious possibilities. With the powers of that board defined as they were in the bill published a week ago, the experiment would have been most dangerous. The changes made last week, however—especially that which leaves the fixing of the rediscount rate in the hands of the regional banks—to some extent modify this conclusion, and it will be still more modified if a further lopping-off of unreasonable and improper powers as now proposed, is effected by amendment in the House

It is further to be observed that, if the central board is meant in good faith, as its authors profess it to be meant, for a supervisory Federal commission, and if its functions are restricted to those appropriate to that office, the predominance of commissioners other than trained bankers need not be disturbing. The president of the Bank of France came from the customs service; the governors of the Bank of England are mostly wholesale merchants. If, indeed, the board were to be filled by fanatical Western legislators or by Eastern political hacks, mischief of the most serious sort might be ahead. But that is at least no visible probability; in fact, the terms of the bill do not actually exclude the appointment even of four bankers to the board. All that it says is that there must at least be one. The really vital question at issue is, not how the Federal board shall be made up, but whether improper powers, and the opportunity for mischievous intermeddling, are conferred upon it.

A few words may be timely as to the original proposals, the changes made last week, why they were made, and why other changes ought to be insisted on. There is a more or less prevalent impression that the purpose at Washington is to insist that the bill be enacted as it stands, and without material amendment. But no one will find, either in President Wilson's address to Congress or in the several explanatory statements given out in connection with the bill, any evidence of such purpose. Even Mr. Bryan, in his published comment of last week, admits that "whatever defects it may have will be brought out by discussion and cured by amendment."

The "regional reserve bank" plan has met with general commendation, and, in the main, correctly so. It has been described as the application of home rule in banking to the great geographical divisions of the country. That this authority would have to be hedged about with proper restriction and supervision under national auspices, no one has ever doubted. But to such supervision there are reasonable limits, and one of them is such interference as would deprive the regional reserve bank of its natural powers and functions, and therefore of its usefulness, as the central institution of its district.

The duty of discounting or rediscounting paper infers the function of fixing the rate at which the capital shall be loaned. If the bill had contemplated a national reserve institution, to rediscount paper for the whole United States—as the Aldrich plan proposed—it would have been the business of that institution to establish the rediscount rate for all parts of the country. That plan the present bill repudiates, and with good enough reason. But, after conferring on the regional central banks the duties and responsibilities of rediscounting commercial paper for the institutions in their several constituencies, it forthwith deprived them of all power of deciding what their discount rate shall be. The Federal board, under the original provisions of the bill, was "to establish each week" a rate "which shall be mandatory upon each Federal reserve bank and for each class of paper."

It was difficult to see, in that separation of powers, anything short of absurdity. When to such a stipulation there was added the provision that the national board is to "have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for rediscount," the principle of regional independence is reduced to the merest shadow. It was as if another Home Rule bill were to confer on an Irish Parliament the power of local legislation, and were then to provide that all the bills proposed and passed in that Parliament should originate at Westminster, and should not be changed. The conferrees at Washington were not so blind as to fail to see that by such a provision, the measure would defeat its own purposes.

One can imagine a system under which, should the general interests of all the districts so require, the national board might recommend to a regional bank a change in its official rate. It is conceivable that, under certain circumstances and with due formalities and reservations, such a change might be required—though the wisdom even of that would be debatable. But to have one body of directors lend the money, and another, a thousand miles away, fix the lending rate, is a strange proposal. Such a plan would in effect mean either a central bank masquerading as a supervisory commission for regional reserve banks, or else would mean a system of regional reserve banks with their natural powers usurped at Washington. The proper and just distribution of powers, as between the "regional reserve banks" and the national supervisory board, is yet to be effected. It is not completed, even when the drafters of the bill have now placed the fixing of the bank rate with the district institutions, subject to review by the central board. It is absolutely essential to determine what the scope of that "review" shall be.

When the other provision of the original bill is considered—in connection with the $500,000,000 authorized Treasury notes, secured by banking assets and superimposed, so far as they are actually taken out, on all the other currency now in circulation—that the national board is to fix in its discretion the tax upon such notes, any one in the least conversant with the history of finance must know that an enormous and excessively hazardous authority would be conferred.

The proposed new note-issue offered no solution of the problem of an elastic currency. It would merely have expanded the total circulating medium beyond the highest total ever reached before, with the prospect of return to the present volume if the Federal board saw fit to impose a sufficiently high tax. In no case was actual automatic contraction of the currency provided for. If the board were not to have recourse to such powers, or if it were not to use them prudently, it would at least have to be admitted that the machinery of currency inflation was in working order.

The plan as revised last week extends the scope of the note-issue machinery, so that 5 per cent. of the existing bank-note circulation shall be extinguished every year, and shall be replaced by the new "Treasury notes." But the mischievous power of a discretionary tax by the Federal board remains, and the whole note-issue plan is surrounded by such obscurity and uncertainty that the root-and-branch revision of the clauses referring to it is imperative.

Hitchcock's Rhetoric and the Study of Literature

By ALFRED M. HITCHCOCK, Head of the English Department in the Hartford Public High School. vi+410 pp. 12mo. $1.00.

A manual for the last two years of the high-school course, intended to supplement the author's Practice Books. Part I contains a compact rhetoric with a vocabulary of rhetorical and critical terms. A condensed manual of composition deals with the four forms of discourse, exposition and argument being given the prominence appropriate for Junior and Senior work. Part II takes up the study of masterpieces and surveys the entire field of pure literature. Part III gives a condensed summary by periods of English literature—such a survey as is called for in the new college requirements. The Appendix includes questions on a number of the more commonly studied masterpieces.

Science Series. 8vo. $1.75 net; by mail, $1.90

From widely scattered sources—travels, ethnography, folk-lore, studies in the evolution of the law, morals, etc., and personal observation—the author has collected evidence on such problems as the economic basis of family life, the position of the wife, promiscuity, group-marriage, divorce, sex taboos, procreation myths, the couvade; primitive, moral, and vocational instruction; initiations, puberty ceremonies, etc. The fact that much of primitive education was genuine social education is strongly emphasized.

Elementary Psychology

Suggestions for the Interpretation of Human Life

By D. E. PHILLIPS, Head of the Department of Psychology and Education in the University of Denver.

An interesting treatment of psychology connected as a science with life and conduct. Among the chapters that touch on problems of contemporary interest are Suggestion and Mental Healing, Magic and Spiritualism, Relation of Psychology to Evolution, Problems of Heredity and Environment, Social Psychology, and Psychology in Literature and Art.

Feeling, instinct, imitation, habit, etc., are presented simply and treated as the springs of human conduct and the basis for explaining the more formal and technical part of psychology.

While the book is admirably adapted for an introductory course in high schools, normal schools, and colleges, it also provides interesting material for teachers and reading circles or for the general reader.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of The Nation, 1865-1906

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait.

Price, $1.50 net postpaid.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 10, 1913.

The Week

President Wilson's address at Gettysburg sustained the reputation which he has now securely won for being a master of phrase and of apt eloquence. But the finished and appealing form of his speech should not make its readers forget the felicity and moving quality of its substance. With perfect tact and ease he avoided any comparison with Lincoln's winged words; and he also kept clear of labored discourse upon the specific issues of present-day politics. He sought, rather, with sound judgment and deep feeling, to bring out the high summons to patriotic endeavor which the thronging memories of the occasion are so fitted to inspire. And he left it beyond all question that it was not the devices and resources of the skilled orator, but the sincere purpose and hopeful determination of the chief of state, that were finding utterance. This is the true reason for the praise which his address is receiving from all sides. He had to face an ordeal from which any President and any speaker might well shrink, but he met it with a success that must make the country proud.

The action of the Senate Democratic caucus Monday afternoon, in the matter of obtaining party unity on the tariff bill, was eminently wise. Individual declaration of intention to vote for the bill as finally approved by the caucus was obtained from all the members present, except the two Senators from Louisiana; and it is perfectly understood that the two Democratic Senators who were absent, Hitchcock of Nebraska and Culberson of Texas, will stand with the party on the question. In addition to procuring these personal declarations, which give adequate assurance of the loyalty of a number of Senators sufficient to prevent any alteration that could be regarded as affecting any vital feature of the bill, the caucus passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the tariff bill agreed to by this conference in its amended form is declared to be a party measure, and we urge its undivided support as a duty by Democratic Senators without amendment. Provided, however, that the conference or the Finance Committee may, after reference or otherwise, propose amendments to the bill.

It is evident, both from the language of this resolution and from its antecedent history, that what is here intended is to give just the amount of latitude necessary to satisfy the demands of Senators unwilling to shut the door to reasonable criticism and amendment, while making the united action of all members in every essential point a matter of party honor.

In choosing Mr. Frederic C. Penfield as Ambassador to Vienna, President Wilson has selected a man of excellent diplomatic experience. He was an admirable consul-general and diplomatic agent at Cairo under Mr. Cleveland, and has to his credit a valuable book on Egypt. Through marriage, he is possessed of large means, and his being a Catholic makes him the more welcome at the most Catholic court in Europe. And yet for all this, and with due regard to his pleasing personality, there is one great drawback to this appointment—Mr. Penfield's large contribution to the funds used by Mr. McCombs in his pre-convention campaign, and to the regular party funds after Wilson's nomination. The time must come when such contributions will disqualify anybody from receiving high office at the hands of the one who profited, even if indirectly, thereby. The case is, of course, different from that of J. J. Van Alen, who contributed $55,000 to the Cleveland campaign fund, on the direct promise of the Italian Ambassadorship; and yet, at bottom, the same principle underlies both.

If anybody expects to make capital of the story about the Secretary of Labor having been confined in jail for a day, nineteen years ago, upon a charge of conspiracy in connection with mining-labor troubles, he is pretty sure to be disappointed. Secretary Wilson has done well, however, in promptly making a circumstantial statement of the case, which bears every mark of completeness and accuracy. Unless some wholly different element can be shown to have entered into the matter from any with which his account is concerned, there is nothing in the story that need give him a moment's uneasiness. It may serve to remind people that his career has been that of an aggressive labor leader, but apart from this circumstance—which may, indeed, be held by many to be an objection—there is nothing in the case to injure him in the opinion of any man of sense. And to balance this there is also the reminder, which the newspaper accounts arising out of this episode naturally add, of the story of his early life—such achievement in the face of difficulties as meets with a sympathetic response from all sorts and conditions of men.

On its face, a grave injustice seems to have been done in the case of Capt. Templin F. Potts, of the navy, who was compulsorily retired from active service on July 1. He was the senior captain of the navy and was eligible to promotion to rear-admiral on March 26 last. But Secretary Daniels arbitrarily denied him his promotion on the ground that in his five years of service as captain he had had but ten months of duty at sea. Never before was an officer denied promotion on this ground, and, of course, Capt. Potts had had no warning that he would be punished if he did not go to sea. More than that, Capt. Potts's failure to go to sea was due to the Navy Department itself, for it decides which officers shall have sea commands. Secretary Meyer was responsible, for he had made Capt. Potts his "aide for personnel," perhaps the most important and honorable shore position in the service; there is none which brings an officer in closer touch with the Secretary himself. Now, as soon as Mr. Daniels made his extraordinary ruling, Capt. Potts immediately applied for sea service, in order to earn his rear-admiralcy, and received the command of the Louisiana. On the first of July he was compulsorily retired by the board of rear-admirals, which annually creates a certain number of vacancies. Had Secretary Daniels not withheld his promotion, this board would have had no authority over Capt. Potts, since it cannot retire rear-admirals. It may be that there is something in Capt. Potts's record which entitles him to this shabby and seemingly unfair treatment. We only know that he has served forty-one years honorably; that four months ago he was thought worthy to preside over the entire commissioned force of the navy; and we cannot forget that he was one of the gallant officers of the Massachusetts in the blockade of Santiago and the fight with Cervera.

Some of the figures presented by the statement sent out from Washington, concerning Government receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year just closed, are interesting. The total of "ordinary" receipts—which, of course, leaves out the Post Office—was $724,000,000, a record-breaker; the highest previous total was $701,000,000, in 1911. But so is the total of ordinary expenditures a record-breaker, this amount being $684,000,000, as against a previous high record of $662,000,000, which was reached in 1909. The expenditures in 1912 were $654,000,000; the excess, of 29 or 30 millions, for 1913 is in the main accounted for by the increase in pensions. The pension outlay for 1913 was $175,000,000, as against $153,000,000 in 1912, the difference being due to the new pension law, which President Taft thought he was going to veto, but didn't. Customs revenue and internal revenue (exclusive of the corporation tax) are nip and tuck; the former amounted to $318,000,000 and the latter to $309,000,000. The customs receipts were not quite up to the highest record, but the internal revenue receipts seem to have been a little above the largest figure previously reached. Nearly all of this $309,000,000 is from taxes on tobacco and liquor; from which it would appear that the high cost of living has not had a powerful effect in cutting down the vogue of these indulgences.

One need not go so far as Kansas in order to be treated like a voter in a close election. Ohio, too, needs harvest hands, and farmers are offering the bait of $2.50 a day, with board, and free automobile transportation from home to work and back. The more astute among them are also pointing out that the question of social standing does not enter into this kind of labor. One may leave his toil in a city trench and help the Ohio farmers get in their superabundant crops, without suffering social ostracism. And yet, with all this, there is no rush towards the fields. Pecuniary inducements, pure air, food "the best in the land," appeals on the score of patriotic duty, all fail to tear the city laborer from his job. A few college men are all that can be caught. "It is hard to understand the city laborer's attitude," moralizes the Ohio State Journal, "except on the theory that he likes city life and is willing to pay for it." But there is the further consideration that harvest work lasts but a short time.

The biennial appropriation bill which Gov. Dunne has just signed for the University of Illinois will make the heads of endowed institutions envious. Some of its provisions should be noted by those who fear that narrow-minded legislators will cramp higher State education financially and administratively. Two years ago a Republican Legislature levied a permanent mill tax for the University, expected to yield about $5,000,000 biennially. The measure was bitterly opposed. This year it devolved upon a Democratic Legislature, pledged to economy, not merely to appropriate from the fund thus created, but to vote whether trustees or States should direct the manner of itemized expenditures. The final measure gave the University $4,500,000, and virtually liberty to use it according to its own judgment. Even an amendment forbidding support of a medical college, a branch of the University generally unpopular, was defeated as subversive of the trustees' proper authority. Thus this growing institution is henceforth assured by precedent and the sentiment of all parties of a fixed and competent income, completely at its disposal. And this is in a State which, unlike Wisconsin and Minnesota, has not hitherto exhibited marked popular pride in the State University.

A Chicago newspaper is cruel enough to apply a scientific-management test to the Illinois Legislature. It finds that the twenty-three weeks of the session were divided in this way: Three weeks—electing a Speaker; one week—idleness; five weeks—electing two United States Senators; two weeks—attending the Wilson Inauguration; two weeks—organizing and "getting down to business"; four weeks—committee hearings and reading of bills; four weeks—passing 25 per cent. of its bills; two weeks—passing 75 per cent. of its bills. As every day of the session cost $1,500 in expenses, in addition to $2,500 in salaries, the wasted weeks constituted an extravagance in money as well as in time. Other States could furnish equally horrible examples. No one expects a large group of men to transact affairs with the expedition of a small group. We are more than willing to pay the high cost of representative government. But is the American voter to be blamed if now and then he becomes a little disgusted at the sharpness of the contrast in this respect exhibited by his representatives in counting-rooms and his representatives in capitols?

McLoughlin's defeat by Wilding was not generally expected, plainly not in England, but is one proof more that experience and seasoned skill may be too much for eager youth even in lawn tennis. Larned was at the top of his game when he was forty, and Wilding is a veteran in struggle if not in years. It is true that he had also the advantage of not being compelled to play all through the tournament. He offered to do so, but the committee decided that the old rule should be adhered to, under which the champion has only to wait for the challenger, meanwhile keeping himself in practice and keenly studying the play of his opponent, as Wilding daily did McLoughlin's. But there was no doubt that he showed himself superior, when the final test came, and there is no room for excuses. Referring to the steady shining of the old lawn-tennis stars, the Westminster Gazette said, on the eve of the tournament, that the dashing youngsters who "sprang upon the twentieth century with the demand that the heroes and heroines of the past should surrender their laurels and retire to the fireside" are now "paying for seats on the grandstand to see those same champions defend the national cause." There was an unconscious prophecy in this! At the same time, no one questions McLoughlin's prowess, and Wilding himself declares that, with a year or two more of experience, the young American will be the greatest tennis player that ever swung a racquet.

The wonderful feature of M. Brindejonc's successful flight from Paris to St. Petersburg and back is not the distance, the 3,100 miles covered falling a thousand miles short of the distance traversed by Rodgers in this country in 1911, when he flew from Sheepshead Bay to Pasadena. But while the American accomplished his undertaking by a long series of short flights, the Frenchman has attained his goal by a short series of long and very speedy flights. Rodgers's longest flight in one day was 231 miles. The Frenchman's shortest flight in one day was 219 miles. The American was in the air on thirty days, scattered over seven weeks. Brindejonc flew on just nine days, scattered over one calendar month plus two days. And the Frenchman's speed! On the first day of his trip, he flew from Paris to Warsaw, 875 miles, in eight hours, averaging well above a hundred miles an hour. At another time, he travelled a considerable distance at the rate of 140 miles an hour. Of course, it is possible for our pride to reflect that the Frenchman succeeded only by flying a return journey, and that he was compelled to travel over the territories of several nations, while in our broad domain Rodgers went in only one general direction, and was never out of the jurisdiction of the Stars and Stripes. But for a decadent people, the French must be admitted to act rather strangely now and then.

Attempts by the French to put the best face on their perennially disappointing figures of population are of interest to others than sociologists. The latest results lend themselves to an interpretation almost encouraging. In a population of 39,600,000, the excess of births over deaths in 1912 was nearly 60,000. It is clear that a part of this gain was made possible only by a reduction in the death-rate; and this the French are asserting will be permanent, though some ascribe it to the marked coolness of last summer. Sterility in certain sections is traced to their prosperity rather than to race degeneracy. Brittany, Normandy, La Vendée, and the easternmost provinces show gains; the Côte d'Or and Loire and Garonne Valleys have lost. The new governmental plan of assisting poor families with more than three young children will not help matters in departments decaying because of comparative wealth. A lightening of financial burdens will not necessarily encourage large families, although it may relieve those already large—and poor.

Argentine cattle-breeders have a definite idea of the limits of the power of a Trust. At a meeting in Buenos Ayres it was explained to them that, in the first place, no Trust could create a "corner" in a primary necessary article of consumption. To be sure, a Trust could hurt the consumer, but cattle-breeders were beyond its reach, since the higher the price charged by the Trust for meat, the higher the price which breeders could expect for their cattle. This sounds like pretty roundabout reasoning to any one who has lived in the land of the Beef Trust, and heard the complaints against it from cattlemen no less than from consumers. An auctioneer, addressing the same meeting, illustrated the working of the law of supply and demand in a way that would add to the force of most expositions in the books on economics. He had sold steers that very day, he said, for $117 each that, in his opinion, were worth no more than $90. Circumstances independent of the quality of the meat governed the price. But did his conscience trouble him on account of that unearned increment of $27 a steer? Not at all. Cattle as good might at any time bring only $80, and thus the average was not far from what it ought to be. The meeting was so thoroughly convinced of the immunity of Argentine cattle-breeders that the question of what defence to make against the Trust did not even come to a vote.

It does not seem at all likely that the trouble at Johannesburg is over, though the latest accounts indicate that outward order has been restored for the time being. What has been going on there is what has occurred, at one time or another, in almost every region in which there has been a rapid development of mining on a great scale. It is probable that the grievances of the men are great and remediable, and it is certain that they have been wrought up over them to the point of anarchy. When that spirit gets thorough possession of a community in which the mine workers are in an overwhelming majority, such scenes as those at Johannesburg are always in danger of being enacted, and can be averted only by great wisdom and sagacity on the part of Government authorities or mine owners or both. To draw from such occurrences, taking place under the sway of mob passion at its highest point, any broad conclusion about the tendency of democratic institutions is little short of farcical. Yet this is what the London Daily Mail appears to have done when, according to a cable dispatch, it says, apropos of the failure of the Rand newspapers to appear on Saturday, that democracy, which began by demanding the right of free speech and liberty of the press, reaches its final stage by completely suppressing that and liberty. What happened at Johannesburg, in the climax of a mob uprising, is no more the "final stage" of democracy than what might happen at a European capital after the assassination of a king would be the final stage of constitutional monarchy.

It may not be true that "there never was a good war," but about the detestable nature of the present war between Bulgaria and Servia, with Greece drawn in and Rumania in danger of being, there cannot be two opinions among disinterested and civilized men. If there is any cause for it except land-hunger, insensate national jealousies and animosities, and a brutal readiness to seek by the sword what could not be got by fair negotiation, the world has not been informed. To invoke the considerate judgment of mankind upon such a mad rush into battle would be farcical. Not the least part of the astonishment with which the bloody news from Macedonia is read arises from wonder how allies who are now flying at each other's throats could ever have worked together against Turkey. They are now freely charging each other with massacres as inhuman as any that were ever laid at the door of the unspeakable Turk. The reports leaking out suggest sickening details not yet revealed. In all this there should be food for thought for our transcendental militarists. Their vision of "the just man armed," establishing righteousness, appears just now in the Balkans as a horrible sarcasm.

NATURAL HISTORY OF THE LOBBY.

Vice-President Marshall made some, for him, sensible remarks at Philadelphia on Saturday about business men lobbying at Washington. He did not deny that there were, or might be, great evils in the practice, but he sought to explain its origin. It grew out of the feeling that laws mean everything; that business is absolutely dependent upon the Government. The source of this is not hidden. Not in vain have the protectionists for two generations preached the doctrine that it is the duty of Congress to legislate prosperity. Latterly, they even had the effrontery to maintain for a time that Congress must, in effect, guarantee a "reasonable profit" to American manufacturers and merchants. With this idea, amounting in some cases to a conviction, implanted in the public mind, it was, as the Vice-President says, the most natural thing in the world that business men should think it necessary to have agents and spend money in Washington. So doing, they have often been deceived and preyed upon. But it is an entirely human phenomenon which they have presented, and one that admits of rational explanation. The scattering details, of which we have been having so many in the press, can be understood only as they are taken in connection with the entire plan of operations.

Take the case of the National Association of Manufacturers. It was a body made up, in the usual way, of the wise and the foolish, fussily active members and the quiescent, contributing kind. Some meritorious objects it placed before itself, and it was wholly within its rights in opposing what it conceived to be injurious labor-laws. From this it was easy to pass to a demand for legislative favors, or, as the Association would have said, the maintenance of just privileges; and with the tariff under revision, it was inevitable that a partisan position should be taken. Having a good deal of money to spend, the National Manufacturers found no lack of men willing to spend it for them. They went into various Congressional fights. They gave to campaign funds here and there. Their representatives assumed the air of political magnates, hobnobbed with Congressmen and members of the Cabinet, and got the ear of Presidents when they could, and the Association grew increasingly important—in its own eyes.

This went on for several years. The facts were generally known. The Association did not hide its light under a bushel. It believed in advertising; and many of its claims to tremendous influence and achievements bore traces of the advertiser's art. But now what has happened to cause all the excitement? Nothing except that a former employee has sold to a newspaper a lot of the Association's correspondence. These letters and telegrams and reports really add very little to our knowledge of the methods of corruption, though they do add a good deal to our knowledge of human nature—especially of political human nature. It is a revelation of folly rather than of crime. Without undertaking to pronounce on the entire body of evidence—not all of which has yet been made public—we think it clear that the whole story is one of much lobbying and little corruption. The thing of main interest is the disclosure of the way in which such organizations as the National Manufacturers grow and operate, finding opportunities here and pitfalls there, playing the game of politics and frequently being beaten by the veterans at it. In a word, the Mulhall revelations are chiefly of value in giving us a glimpse of what may be called the natural history of the lobby.

It is perfectly plain how the thing worked. The Association could not tackle the job first-hand. It had to have secretaries and agents. That was where its efficiency seemed to begin, but it was also where its peril began. The search was naturally for an experienced and "practical" lobbyist who could produce "results." That was where Col. Mulhall came in. He knew everybody, or assumed that he did, was able, on his own showing, to get near the business and bosoms of the most prominent men in Washington, and was a master-hand at writing the most glowing reports. It is delightful to see him hanging upon the proceedings of Congress and assuring his employers that he was doing it all. Some bill is reported out or passed or killed, as the case may be, and the jubilant Mulhall hastens to assert: "We have won a great victory." He may really have had no more to do with it than one of the House doorkeepers. And Mulhall was always carrying elections, selecting Presidential candidates, and choosing the Cabinet. We do not blame him. He was hired to "do things" and he religiously lived up to his contract. If the Association was fooled by him to the top of its bent, that was not his fault. When you employ a lobbyist, you put yourself in his hands. It is for him, according to his kind, to take your money, then trick you, then sell you out.

Let it not be thought that we would make light of the lobby. All the disclosures that have been or may be made are to be welcomed. They are undoubtedly helping to make an end of old abuses. But they are doing it not so much by showing that lobbying has been astute and wicked, as by letting the country see that it has been so often both stupid and futile. When manufacturers and others fully realize, as by now they must be near doing, that to employ a lobbyist is a waste of good money, the occupation of that Othello will be gone.

LINCOLN AT GETTYSBURG.

Lincoln's Gettysburg address holds an undisputed place among the treasures of the English tongue, and among the oratorical masterpieces of all time. Few oral utterances in any language can bear comparison with it for perfection of form or for moving quality. Read again and again, year after year, it awakens afresh the emotion with which it is charged, the feeling which inspired it when first uttered. In one respect at least, it is safe to say that it has no parallel in history, certainly not in the history of modern nations. Were it not a simple fact, it would seem an impossible fancy that a few brief sentences, spoken at the dedication of the site of the decisive battle of a gigantic war, should so loom up in the memory of a nation and of the world as to have an historic eminence coördinate with that of the battle itself.

That such an utterance should stand for all time, as a source of patriotic inspiration to generation after generation of Americans, is matter for profound gratification. It expresses with a noble simplicity the ideal of the nation; it is filled with a solemn sense of what the preservation of that nation and its ideals means not only to ourselves and to the present time, but to all the world and to future ages. From the first word to the last this thought, this feeling, animates Lincoln's utterance. To have conveyed so lofty a conception of our country's destiny, of its part in the shaping of the destinies of the world, without the faintest trace of national vainglorlousness, is perhaps the most remarkable of all the remarkable qualities of the Gettysburg address.

When, at the outset, Lincoln, speaking of our nation as conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal, declared that we were "engaged in a great civil war testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure," he was not speaking in the air. He was building no theory, launching no speculation; he was but giving perfect utterance to that which was more or less distinctly in all men's hearts and minds, on both sides of the Atlantic. The great Republic in America was still thought of as an experiment; and the democratization of European institutions was but in its incipient stage. The preservation of the Union meant the vindication of democratic government; the disruption of it meant shipwreck of the American adventure. And it was out of the fulness of his heart, the completeness of his feeling of what was at stake in our country's success or failure, that the noble words of the conclusion of Lincoln's address were spoken. The war was not over. Many, many months of doubt and darkness were still before us. There were not wanting those, long after Gettysburg, who, though preferring the Union, were for letting the erring sisters depart in peace. No such near-sighted view of what was at stake was ever for a moment entertained by Lincoln. His soul was nerved by the conviction that shines through the closing words of the address. "That government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth"—it was for no less than this that the sacrifices were to be made which he called on the nation steadfastly to endure.

It is not surprising that Lincoln's words at Gettysburg have often been eagerly seized upon by advocates of this or that proposal of political or social amelioration as warrant for its merit. To say that Lincoln would be on their side if he were living is a favorite device. How effective it is in actually influencing thought or sentiment, there is no means of telling; that it has little or no legitimate value must be evident to any one who stops to think. If you have demonstrated that your proposal is a good one, you may conclude that Lincoln, being a good man and a sagacious man, would have been with you; but to assert that he would have been with you does not help in the least to effect that demonstration. Nobody knows, and there is nothing in Lincoln's acts or words to tell, whether or not he would have been for the initiative and referendum, or for endowment of motherhood, or for single tax; yet enthusiastic advocates of almost any "advanced" proposal of our day find little difficulty in persuading themselves that it is a corollary of the Gettysburg address. They read into "government of the people, by the people, for the people" as much of remote and unsuspected meaning as certain pietists of the past were able to discover in a simple Bible phrase, or as some commentators unearth in a line of Shakespeare.

What "government of the people, by the people, for the people" should be, in detail, each generation must consider afresh. The representative institutions, partly adopted, partly created, by the fathers of the Republic, may prove, in this respect or that, to fail of their rightful purpose. When that has been adequately demonstrated, a remedy must be sought and must be courageously applied. And, broadly speaking, it is right that the spirit of Lincoln's address should be invoked in support of any sincere and patriotic effort to bring the government of the country at any time into conformity with the needs of that time. But to invoke his language, in any more specific sense, for such a purpose, is clearly to pervert it. It was in no double sense, and with no mystic meaning, that he spoke those stirring words. They were born of the travail of that great war; of anxieties about foreign complications as well as the trials of the struggle at home; of the tremendous realities which for three long years had filled Lincoln's mind, by day and by night, and not of any dreams of future perfection. For these, the field of Gettysburg, four months after the battle, was no place and no time. Had Lincoln lived, surely no purpose to which the best thought of the nation might have turned would have been alien to him; but the cause of the Union—that cause for which those who had died at Gettysburg had given "the last full measure of devotion"—was the sole and sufficient inspiration of every word of the immortal address.

EXPLODING A LEGEND.

"Amazing" is the word most frequently used in describing the testimony given last week at Washington by the man who calls himself David Lamar. Hardened Senators were astonished. Cynical and blasé newspaper correspondents were left gasping. Never had there been such impudence, such cool effrontery, such unblushing acknowledgment of acts of turpitude. How could the fellow have mustered up such audacity? What a very thick skin must he possess, covering conscience as well as flesh and bones, to enable him jauntily to admit that he had made his living in Wall Street as a beast of prey! This was the note, these the prevailing comments, at the hearing and in the Washington dispatches. All records for impudent swindling had been surpassed. Cagliostro, in deep mortification, yielded the pas to David Lamar.

The question may well be asked, however, if all this astonishment is not a trifle misplaced. Is Lamar the man to be wondered at, or the men who have been his victims? To one who closely considers the whole story, and what lies back of it, the truly "amazing" thing is not so much the revelation as the belief in Lamar's extraordinary power, which had gone before it. For he has for years been the subject of legend in Wall Street. It was not, of course, a savory legend. It had to do with a supposed mysterious adroitness and success in wrecking and blackmailing. The idea was abroad that Lamar was almost a man of black arts. He was a figure of mystery, lurking, impending, terrible. The most exggerated notions were afloat of his facilities for information, of his infallible instinct for the right man or corporation to "strike," of his superhuman insight, and of his unparalleled talent for tearing the heart out of a mass of financial detail. His friend, Mr. Lauterbach, in the most innocent way in the world, quietly put his certification on the legend the other day, when he said that Lamar had a more acute mentality than any man he had ever known.

Well, this eighth wonder of the financial world, this supreme embodiment of diabolical cleverness, this midnight figure of dread, came out into the light of day, and what did we see? Little more than the appearance of a cheap trickster. His glib shamelessness did not hide his mental shallowness. At the first touch of cross-examination, he began to flounder in confusion. His subtle Machiavellian intellect was found unable to perceive the plainest snares laid for his feet. And the methods of operation to which he confessed were on a par with those of the ordinary deadbeat and routine vulgar impostor. His "impersonations" were so clumsily done that he was speedily detected. Mr. Ledyard, for example, at once suspected a blackmailer, and soon identified Lamar. And when this master of all the riddles of Wall Street, this gigantic financial talent, was asked where he got the figures about his alleged corporation "forgery," to the tune of $80,000,000, he disclosed his informant as a man who sells Wall Street "letters"! Was there ever such a pricking of a portentous legend?

The question presses how such a legend could have grown up. Lamar is plainly no Superman. Yet for years he has been referred to in timid whispers as a man who could make or mar in Wall Street. He was supposed to be always hovering about every large proposed financial undertaking, much as the wrecker waits on a lee shore when a ship is in the offing. That he had the power which consists in seeming to have it, appears to be beyond question. Whence did it come? Alas, not from his own extraordinary ability, but from the extraordinary cowardice, the gullibility, the doubts and fears of those upon whom he preyed. Capital is said to be the most timid thing in the world. It runs away at the slightest alarm. But is there any reason why capitalists should act like rabbits, just because a wolf heaves in sight around some Wall Street corner? The meat upon which Lamar has fed that he should grow so great has been furnished him by men who did not know how to face a blackmailer boldly, and who preferred to pay hush-money to a scoundrel rather than spend a little, and possibly face personal embarrassment and attack, in bringing him to justice.

This, it seems to us, is the great moral that stands out in the exploding of the Lamar legend. Get all the amusement you can out of his audacious confessions of villany. Be surprised, incredulous, indignant, what you will. Remark that Lamar proves the romance of cheating to be deathless. But do not overlook the conclusion that such a career as his is made possible only by the moral recreancy of his victims. If a determined front to rascals had been the rule in Wall Street, and the motto had been there: "Millions for exposure and prosecution, but not a cent for blackmail," we should not have had to wait till now to learn on how slender a foundation the great Lamar legend had been erected.

A STORY OF THRIFT.

A pleasing, and evidently authentic, story comes from Baltimore about a family servant. She came from Germany twenty-seven years ago, has lived with one Baltimore family ever since, and now returns to Germany with the tidy sum of nearly $10,000, accumulated by steady saving. Particulars as to wages are wanting, but it is evident that she has been having all these years a comfortable home and has been thoroughly appreciated in the household in which she lived. It is not improbable that her wages have been somewhat more liberal than usual, and that she has received presents that have helped her to economize in the matter of dress. But it is to be noted at once that there is nothing in the least marvellous about the tale. There are thousands of servants who, without sacrificing the requirements of comfort or self-respect, and without failing to live up to a very good standard of appearance as to clothing, could put by a hundred dollars a year out of their wages. There are many whose pay would permit the saving of two hundred dollars a year, with the same conditions satisfied. And two hundred dollars a year, regularly invested at 4 per cent., amounts in twenty-seven years to just about $10,000. Furthermore, $10,000 at the age of fifty means, for a single person, independence for the rest of her years—a comfortable and sure income for life without further labor; for it means an annuity of about $650 a year in a perfectly safe insurance company.

The story carries more than one moral. For one thing, it may serve to draw attention to a phase of the servant question which is far too much neglected. It is idle to deny that the position of a domestic servant carries with it disadvantages which weigh tremendously, and justly, against its advantages in the minds of young women in our time. The pay, in the case of girls who do not live at home, is far better than can be commanded by most of them in factory work, and the labor is also in a large proportion of cases much less trying; but against this stands less personal independence and a less desirable social status. But if the thing we have in mind were duly insisted on, were properly pressed on the attention of those concerned, the bigger pay could be made to have a powerful bearing on both the other elements. If it were to become a general thing for the better type of servants to take advantage of their opportunities for the accumulation of a fund calculated ultimately to insure independence and leisure, the effect upon their immediate feelings in regard to independence, and inevitably before long upon their social status, would be very great. A girl of twenty, getting, as so many do here in New York, a wage of six dollars a week, can lay by $200 a year without difficulty. If she marries, well and good; if she does not, then at the age of about forty-five she has something like $9,000 in bank, and can purchase for it a life income of about $45 a month. With this outcome of her labor in prospect, the status of a servant, first in her own mind and thence inevitably in the minds of others, would be very different from what it now usually is.

But there are others, far more fortunately placed in the economic scale, who might do worse than ponder the lesson of this German servant's achievement. No universal rule can be laid down to govern one's habits of expenditure. To be miserly throughout one's younger years, in order to be idle or luxurious as an old man, would be a poor management of the opportunities of life. Good sense and right feeling must be the final judge, and no arbitrary maxim can serve as their guide. But certain it is that, particularly in this country, there are myriads of persons who waste in ways that are unproductive of any real enjoyment resources which, if reasonably husbanded, would result in the most solid satisfactions of later life, physical and spiritual. And in part this is due to mere want of realization of the simple arithmetical elements of the case. Upon some it is difficult to impress the importance even of Mr. Micawber's sage deliverance as to the sixpence deficit or the sixpence surplus making the difference between misery and happiness; the great majority are above this line, indeed, but do not get so far as to realize, in youth, how great a blessing they could lay up for their later life by the exercise of even a very small amount of thrift, provided it was systematic and persistent. Conspicuous and general posting of a table showing what a dollar a week, or five dollars a week, at 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. compound interest, amounts to in twenty, thirty, and forty years would do more for the promotion of happiness, contentment, and even morality, than a great deal of sermonizing.

Among the many things of the Victorian age upon which we, "the latest seed of time," are in the habit of looking back with contempt, or at best with condescending patronage, is clearly to be included that kind of teaching which found its most popular expression in the works of Samuel Smiles. His very name is almost unknown to the younger generation; but men by no means old remember the time when his "Self Help" and "Thrift" had a currency as great as that which nowadays belongs to works on social reform and world-betterment generally. It is a more generous impulse that is now dominant; and it is one that will, we are sure, result in great good. But here are two kinds of good to be effected; and while we should do the one, we should not leave the other undone. If concentration of interest upon what society should do for the individual leads—as in fact we believe it has led—to a belittling of the part that may be played by what the individual may do for himself, the balance of gain in the shape either of increase of human happiness or of development of human character may not be so clear as some imagine. Samuel Smiles we may afford to patronize as a narrow Victorian; but it is difficult to patronize Benjamin Franklin, even though we cease to heed Poor Richard. Moreover, besides being a very wise and a very great man, Franklin was most distinctly a "forward looking" man; it would not be difficult to make out a case for him as the pioneer of social betterment activity in this country. But both his life and his writings were pervaded by the idea that, like charity, social betterment should begin at home, in the shape of paying your own debts and providing for your own future. And the world has not become so wholly changed but that there is abundant use still for the old-time virtues of providence and thrift.

IN HONOR OF A TRAVELLER.

This is the age of travel—at least, of travel in the Apocalyptic sense of "a great rushing to and fro." Yet there is frequent lament that the leisurely intimacy of journeys in the time of diligence and inn has departed. Still, the distance into which our long trains sweep is yet a golden distance. To go to mountain or seaside is enchantment to millions who, like Arnold Bennett's couple in the Five Towns, save pence all the year for the watering-place week where they may eat, stroll, and tip with the best. Three months of it is what our teaching class lives for. A book compiled at Harvard in 1911 mustered nearly half that year's graduates as those who had been abroad. And if this is the century of travel, Americans are the nation of travellers. No other people has their fluent money, their eager, pushing curiosity, their leisure when they step aside to find it. They might well think it worth while, therefore, to notice that on July 5 Norwich, England, set aside as a museum, at the one hundred and tenth anniversary of his birth, the house of the raciest of travellers—George Borrow.

Many a thoughtless traveller, of course, is ignorant of Borrow, unless haply his Sunday-school library had a copy of "The Bible in Spain," or some teacher of description crammed "Lavengro" down his throat. But real lovers of the broad highway, and its literary records, have long known him. To them it is perfectly clear that there are two general modes of travel; the first the mode of Stevenson and Defoe, the second the mode of Borrow and Sterne. Any schoolboy who can discriminate between imagination and fancy can define these. Every business man off for a fortnight's fishing must take his choice and abide by it. The first traveller makes of every road what Stevenson made of the Great North Road, and of every seaport inn what Stevenson made of the inn at Barnby. He sees in every forsaken valley the robbery that is the central scene of a novel, and in every foamy shingle the beach where the pirate captain signals with his handkerchief to the oarsmen in the offing. This is the man of a fecund imagination, which plays lambently over scattered scenes and incidents, until they are welded into some romance. He will make the chapter-heading of a novel out of each new railway station. The other is the traveller of a more impoverished invention. Yet for that all the more charming a thumb-nail painter. He is unable to invoke heroes of fiction out of fence-corners, and wanting in the sense of a locality's spirit which suggests an enwrapping narrative for it; but nevertheless a man of feeling and observation, who can render back every striking scene, steeped in his own personality. Of course, he is the better traveller. He is the more faithful, the less inclined to forget the actual that is before him for the romantic that is nowhere. Yet he need not have the reverence for exact verity that rubs the bloom from the freshest images. As travellers and nothing more, descriptive in content and not narrative, Borrow and Sterne are far more convincing than Stevenson and Defoe. And for obvious reasons, of the two the American will prefer Borrow.

For Borrow was American in many ways. There was a robustious humor and pugnacity about him, journeying through Spain with the Bible in one hand and a cudgel in the other, very Western in flavor. His writing a novel in three nights to get the money to leave London is a bit of American journalism. He orders dinner at Salisbury, forcing the maid to pump water upon his head, with the jocose assurance of a commercial traveller. He has a garrulous observation, a prejudice in politics and religion, a dry-savored humor, that is all but Yankee. He stoutly loves a fight, the bruisers of England, and a ready, outdoor life. He lives near the gypsies in the dingle with the same philosophical phlegm with which Thoreau dwelt at Walden. Fortunately, there was a good deal of the dreamy about Borrow, for dreaminess is a quality the traveller must cultivate. But there are Americans every day who set off on journeys with something of Borrow's equipment. They have a racial complexity as great as his mixture of Cornish and Huguenot blood, as much hardy downrightness, and as much of the spirit of adventure. They could do worse things than to assume Borrow's mantle in their peregrinations, and to create for themselves, at every turn, his shock of wonder when he "found himself off the coast of Galicia, whose lofty mountains, gilded by the rising sun, presented a magnificent appearance." Such castles in Spain will make out of the merest summer resort the great, challenging, romantic land that England, Russia, Spain, and Wales successively were to him.

That is why, if the English are ready to honor Borrow as a writer, we should be more ready to honor him as a lover of the open road. What our summer travellers should chiefly find in him is personality. Borrow was partly successful in keeping his long trips a glorious vacation, because he wanted bracing scenes, and the more out of the way, with the more odd foreign people, the better. In a larger way, it was because he saw life through the spectacles of prejudice—prejudice against the Catholics, the Lake Poets, the Whig Legitimists, prejudice against all peoples but his own English. If Jones or Smith can entertain a few pet black beasts—if he hates Presbyterians, tariff-reformers, woman's suffrage, and the local-color school of Indiana fiction—his interest in travel is assured. In some such way he must make himself distinctive. Behind these hatreds, of course, must lie self-sufficiency, self-assertion, and strong powers of self-defence. If he have these, his travels will have all his own vitality and independence.

AUSTRALASIAN LITERATURE.

SYDNEY, June 20.

The first literature of the South Seas was that of discoverers, and in it there was many a root of romance. Curiosity, wonder, and sometimes fascination marked the narratives of the early navigators. It was followed by the literature of missions, which supplied ample, if often uncritical, materials for the social writer. Almost before the explorers had gone, and while the pioneer missionaries were still planting stations, a third group—the waifs and strays, the beach-combers, the traders, and the "black-birders"—wandered through the islands or settled down in them. These, too, have given birth to a literature of their own, getting as near to the inner lives of the islanders as the explorers got to their environment, and revealing hidden depths of character from which the missionaries averted their eyes.

Louis Becke, who lately died in Sydney, is acknowledged to be the foremost contemporary writer of this last class. His own life was the romance he has written in a hundred tales. It has been briefly told by the Earl of Pembroke, who has swiftly followed to the grave the trader (as Becke then was) whom he first met in the scenes he was afterwards to describe. Of English origin and good ancestry, but Australian birth, Becke was born with the passion for roving in his blood. As supercargo, shipmaster, part-owner, trader, and labor-recruiter, he made the acquaintance of every island-group in the Pacific. According to Lord Pembroke, he knew the great ocean as few others, living or dead, have ever known it. And he ranks with Herman Melville as one of its two chief romancers.

Apparently, he lacked constructive skill. His earliest stories are very short. They gradually lengthened as he grew conscious of his powers, and some of his later books are full-length narratives. But for these he needed an historical foundation. For "A First Fleet Family" (the adventures of a family that had come out to Australia with the first convict ships) he had a veridical narrative to fall back upon, and the "Mutineers of the Bounty" are historical characters. His first collection of sketches and tales—"By Reef and Palm"—is accounted his best. It was fresh from the mint. In his later volumes there was more alloy, and more artifice was used in their composition. But they are all of the same texture. A trait of character suddenly shown, a flash of light, a deed of blood—and all is over. There is no dallying, no brooding over injuries received, no slow preparation of revenge, but the knife, the revolver, or the rifle gives instant effect to the thought or purpose. The elemental passions are alone at work. What we read of in the historians of primitive peoples thirteen centuries ago was seen in the South Sea Islands the other day. A half-caste wife stabs her rival in the presence of her paramour. A white trader pitilessly lacerates the naked back of his jealous young wife with a giant stingray, and then cuts off her hand. A man who is capable of doing such deeds rises in the estimation of his fellow-islanders. They recognize his perfect right to do what he has done.

We begin to understand exogamy and its savage sanctions. A medical practitioner marries his cousin and brings her to the island where he had before resided. Both are instantly boycotted by the natives, who all go away in shame when they discover how near is the relationship between the husband and the wife. To them it was the relationship between sister and brother. When two children born to them died, it was because the curse of wickedness was on them. So potent was the social sanction that they left the island, and when the doctor returned to it, he was alone. His wife was dead.

A life of strange vicissitude had an almost ideal ending. Louis Becke was found dead one morning, seated in front of his writing-table in a Sydney hotel, the MS. of an unfinished tale lying before him. Mr. Bertram Stevens, his literary executor, will doubtless tell the story of his life, which will be found to be as enthralling as any of the tales he has told. He will relate how Becke learned to write. No born genius, he, or even self-taught craftsman, his first short stories were licked into shape by Mr. J. F. Archibald, founder and long editor of the Sydney Bulletin, who continued to foster the reluctant writer till he needed no further aid. In England he speedily conquered the literary world and the world of taste, and his private papers, it is said, contain tributes from the most accomplished representatives of English culture, with Lord Rosebery at their head.

The late Sir Henry Wrixon, who had long been prominently connected with the public life of Victoria and was for many years president of its Legislative Council, was one of a number of cultivated writers who have resorted to the weapon of satire, when argument seemed to fail in effectiveness against the overwhelming forces of Socialism. Perhaps the most accomplished of these is the Australasian professor who masquerades under the pseudonym of "Godfrey Sweven" (G. Dream). His first utopian romance, "Rialiaro" (Putnams, 1901), has scientific pretensions. He imagines an archipelago in the South Seas where the central and dominant island regularly deports its vicious citizens to the surrounding islands, each according to his particular mania. On each island, inhabited solely by people with a special tare, this failing or propensity is developed to its logical extreme; and this gives our modern Swift an opportunity of painting new Lilliputs, which bear a perilous resemblance to certain British colonies at the Antipodes, and where monstrous psychical developments are depicted with every variety of humor, from subtlest irony to screaming farce. But the central island, Limanora, has in consequence been purified, and, thus starting with a clean sheet, it rears a perfect community by means of a method of selection unknown to Darwin—self-selection. We have no space to tell how eloquently, and yet how plausibly, the idea is elaborated ("Limanora," Putnams, 1903), but it may be doubted if any of the hundred utopias of our time is more original or more attractive.

A dozen years ago Sir Henry Wrixon composed in two large octavo volumes, consisting of 900 pages, a picture of Australian public life that lacked neither verisimilitude nor pungency. The love-story in it was naught, save in so far as it showed (what is not usual in Australia) how the tenderest of private relationships may be caught up and shattered by the machinery of public life; but the career of the labor agitator, Jacob Shumite, who gave his name to the book, was depicted, and the work was packed with instructive disquisitions and clever conversations on the questions of the time. So swiftly does every political treatise or discussion grow antiquated in the rapidly developing communities under the Southern Cross that the book soon got to be in part out of date. The last months of the author's useful life were accordingly spent in recasting it and reducing it to a quarter of its original bulk. The change involved the leaving of the labor agitator in the background, and the advancement of another character to the title rôle ("Edwin Fairlie Frankfort"; Macmillan).

It is a scathing satire on the public men and the political life of Australia. A young Englishman of culture and talent, a recent immigrant to Victoria, is ambitious of entering the political arena. He has high ideals and aims at the loftiest ends. He soon discovers that both ideals and ends are so many stumbling-blocks, unless he keeps them exclusively for his own consumption. What his proposed constituency wants is a reservoir. But it never thinks of embarking on such an undertaking for itself. What is the Government for if not precisely to supply it? Reservoir or no reservoir is, then, the deciding question. By a piece of jobbery the reservoir is left out of the Government loan-bill for the year, and, as all public works, productive or non-productive, are executed at the cost of the London Stock Exchange or its clients, the reservoir cannot yet be constructed. So the hero of the book, not being called upon to declare his belief about the reservoir—that it ought to be made elsewhere or not at all—wins his seat in the Legislature. That he is a member only in name and for a time he soon discovers. The reservoir turns up again, and, as he can no longer conceal his opinion, on that vital issue he is flung out. His brief parliamentary career is at an end.

There is not a trace of exaggeration in any part of the book; it is absolutely and typically true, as a mere narrative could not be, and it is not more true of the author's state, Victoria, than of New South Wales, Queensland, or New Zealand. Its lessons lie on the surface, and perhaps there are few progressive countries that might not read there their own horoscope. J. C.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

It is somewhat singular that two bibliographies of an author so little read as Sir Roger L'Estrange should have appeared within six months. The first is that contributed to the ninth volume of "The Cambridge History of English Literature" (pp. 415-418) by Professor Trent; the second is that to be found in Mr. George Kitchin's biography of L'Estrange, which was reviewed in the Nation for May 8, 1913. It was to be expected that with his large knowledge of L'Estrange's life and writings and of the literature of the times, Mr. Kitchin should have been able to correct and supplement the bibliography in the "Cambridge History." But, as a matter of fact, the later bibliography augments and amends but slightly the former, and it is not, on the whole, in my judgment, so convenient and trustworthy. Mr. Kitchin does, it is true, make one or two contributions of his own, and he discusses in an interesting way several tracts of doubtful authorship, as well as two transiations which have been assigned to L'Estrange, but are perhaps by Aphra Behn. He makes, however, an awkward division of his bibliography, giving a list of the translations in his last chapter and a list of the political writings in an appendix; he omits two significant tracts, "L'Estrange No Papist in Answer to a Libel," etc., and "An Answer to a Letter to a Dissenter"; he gives his titles usually in an incomplete and often in an inaccurate form; he is erratic in furnishing and withholding information about later editions or impressions; and finally he fails even so much as to mention several works that at one time or another have been attributed to L'Estrange. This is all the more regrettable because Mr. Kitchin's book is so valuable not merely as a biography of an interesting man, but as a contribution to the political history of the seventeenth century in England and to the early history of the English newspaper. It seems worth while, therefore, to endeavor in the following notes to supplement and somewhat to amend the bibliography of L'Estrange as Mr. Kitchin has given it on pp. 376 seq. and pp. 411 seq.

(1.) It is not quite clear why Mr. Kitchin has failed to list L'Estrange's "printed appeals for liberation in 1644-6 and his Kentish and Interregnum manifestoes." "To a Gentleman, a Member of the Honorable House of Commons," is an appeal dated July 8, 1646.

(2.) For complete and accurate titles of the tracts listed as Nos. 1, 5, 12, 13, 14, 16, 23, 25, 26, 36, 39, 40, 44, 46, 48, 54, see the British Museum Catalogue and the bibliography in the ninth volume of the "Cambridge History."

(3.) "An Appeal in the Case of the Late King's Party" is dated on the title page, 1660. Mr. Kitchin is probably right in thinking it earlier than most of the broadsides later reprinted, but where is the external evidence for 1659?

(4.) A full list of L'Estrange's broadsides reprinted in his "Apology" may be found in the bibliography in the "Cambridge History."

(5.) "Treason Arraigned" (April 3, 1660), which is a tract reprinted in the "Apology" and called there simply "an answer to Plain English," should have separate notice. It was published under the former title in 1660.

(6.) "Physician Cure Thyself" is undoubtedly L'Estrange's, and should appear after "No Blinde Guides." (See the discussion in the Nation for May 8, 1913, p. 475.)

(7.) There were at least four impressions of "A Caveat to the Cavaliers," the third dated August 21, 1661, and the fourth September 18, 1661.

(8.) A third impression of "A Modest Plea," etc., is dated 1662.

(9.) A second impression of "The Relapsed Apostate" is dated November 14, 1661. The date of the third is 1681.

(10.) The preface to "State Divinity" is dated December 4, 1661. Mr. Kitchin dates the tract "November, 1661."

(11.) Mr. Kitchin's remark about "Interest Mistaken" would lead one to think that the statement quoted from the edition of 1682 is our only evidence for believing that the pamphlet was first published in 1661. The facts are that we find an edition dated 1661, a second impression dated 1661, a third and fourth both dated 1662, and the edition of 1682.

(12.) The title quoted by Mr. Kitchin as No. 13 ("A Whipp, A Whipp," etc.) is almost correct. But No. 14 (which should not be a separate item, as it is simply a later, enlarged edition) should read "A Whipp for the schismaticall animadverter upon the Bishop of Worcester's Letter with an answer," etc., and the tract should be dated February 12, 1662.

(13.) "A Memento," etc., appears in Watt's "Bibliotheca Britannica" under the title "His Memento; or the laying open the workings and series of the late Rebellion to disappoint the purposes of another. Directed to all those that reverence the memory of King Charles the Martyr, and wish the honour and safety of Charles II." There seems to be no corroboration of this title, but it is too circumstantial to be a misquotation.

(13.) A copy of "Toleration Discussed" bears an "Imprimatur" of February 16, 1662. It should precede "Considerations and Proposals" in Mr. Kitchin's list.

(14.) The Intelligencer and the Newes were published on Mondays and Thursdays respectively from August 31, 1663, to January 29, 1666.

(15.) The "Discourse of the Fishery" was republished in 1695 and later printed in a collection of tracts on the fishery dated 1751. (Mr. Kitchin mentions the collection on p. 410.) Why does he add "by Roger L'Estrange" when he has not noted that L'Estrange's name appeared on the title-pages of many other tracts?

(16.) The second edition of "The Parallel" with the title "An Account of the Growth of Knavery with a Paraliel," etc., is dated on the title-page 1678.

(17.) The title of item No. 23 should read "Tyranny and Popery lording it over the Consciences, Liberties, and Estates both of King and People; being a further account of the growth of Knavery and Popery under the mask of Presbytery." It sometimes appeared with the title, "The Growth of Knavery and Popery under the Mask of Presbytery."

(18.) The second edition corrected of "The Reformed Catholique" bears the date 1679 on the title-page.

(19.) A third edition of "The Freeborn Subject" is dated in 1681.

(20.) The second edition, enlarged, of "The Case Put" is dated 1679, and the third 1680.

(21.) A second edition of "The Answer to the Appeal" is dated 1681, and a third 1684.

(22.) A fourth edition of "A Further Discovery" is dated 1681.

(23.) A third edition of "A Seasonable Memorial" is dated 1681.

(24.) Two editions of "Discovery on Discovery" appeared with the date 1680.

(25.) A second edition of "A Short Answer to a Whole Litter of Libellers," sometimes found with the title "A Short Answer to a Whole Litter of Libels," is dated 1681.

(26.) A second edition of "The Casuist Uncas'd" is dated 1680, and a third 1681.

(27.) "L'Estrange No Papist nor Jesuite" is a douhtful ascriptiou. Mr. Kitchin omits "L'Estrange No Papist in Answer to a Libel entituled L'Estrange a Papist, in a Letter to a Friend" (1681), which hears his name. In the case of this tract his habit of ahhreviating is unfortunate, for when he refers hriefly (page 419) to "L'Estrange No Papist" we are not sure which of the above tracts he is discussing.

(28.) Three editions of "The Dissenters' Sayings" are dated 1681. A fourth edition of Part I, accompanying a second edition of Part II (see below) is dated 1683.

(29.) Two editions of "A Second Part of The Dissenters' Sayings" are dated 1681.

(30.) "An Apology for the French Protestants" is a misquoted title which is especially unfortunate, as another tract with a similar title has been incorrectly assigned to L'Estrange (see below), and it is important to differentiate the two. L'Estrange translated the tract "An Apology for the Protestants, heing a full Justification of their Departure from the Church of Rome . . . done out of the French." On page 415 Mr. Kitchin says the tract was advertised in the Observator for August 2, 1681. No Observator came out on that date, and it appears that Mr. Kitchin meant to say August 13, for he gives this date on page 377.

(31.) "Considerations on a Printed Sheet entituled The Speech of the Late Lord Russell to the Sheriffs" should scarcely be dated June, 1683, since Lord Russell was executed July 21, 1683, and the date of his execution is mentioned on the title-page.

(32.) Mr. Kitchin, as we have seen, omits "An Answer to a Letter to a Dissenter upon Occasion of His Majesty's Late Gracious Declaration of Indulgence," 1687, although he mentions it on page 325. The tract bears L'Estrange's name, and is one of the easiest of his writings to procure.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As they said at Chicago, as they said at Washington, so they said at Gettysburg, "A good speech, hut good for another place and occasion." And meanwhile our sorest national need is of just this "quiet counsel" that hardly any one in high place has the inclination or the wisdom to give us. On these occasions that celehrate a great deed well done, and hopes high or petty, the President speaks the quiet, deliherate word that calls us to match the deed, to fulfil the hopes if they are high, to enlarge them if they are petty, but, ahove all and first of all, to think what we do. And almost no one else in effective high place tells us this. Like his great master, Burke, he "saturates polities with thought." And still the silly patter sounds in our ears ahout "other places and occasions." But it is small wonder when he talks to us ahout "constituted leadership" and "the vision to guide and direct" the people. A different gospel this from the common one, which assumes that political implies mental equality! The President talks as if he actually believed in a democracy guided by something hesides the newspapers.

It was a great speech, eminently suited to the place and occasion; and we ought all to he of one mind in saying so. It sounds a hit literary and polished, of course, beside the matchless monosyllahles of that other Gettyshurg address, with which, paying it the highest compliment we know how to pay, we make haste to compare it; but no one except a Philistine will like it less on that account. Good writing, with all that it implies, is almost as rare among us as "quiet gospel." It has a place iu the scheme of things, and in the democratic scheme of things its place is not a low one.

"SIR" FRANCIS NICHOLSON.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Of the many Englishmen who came to this country late in the seventeenth and early in the eighteenth centuries, no one, with the possible exception of Sir Edmund Andros, held so many important positions as Francis Nicholson. Arriving late in 1686, he was, hetween 1688 and his death on March 5, 1728, either Lieutenant-Governor or Governor of no fewer than five governments—namely, the Territory and Dominion of New England, Virginia, Maryland, Nova Scotia, and South Carolina. In contemporary documents Nicholson is invariahly referred to as "Captain" or "Colonel" or "General" or "Esquire," and nowhere is there the least hint, so far as the present writer is aware, that he was knighted. Yet in hook after book published in this country since 1880, he is called "Sir" Francis Nicholson, and even the year of the alleged knighthood is often given. This erroneous statement originated in this country, and, with one important exception, appears to be confined to American hooks—the exception being the Dictionary of National Biography. The sketch of Nicholson in that work was written by the late J. A. Doyle, who unquestionably repeated the statement from American sources, since, in the various books he himself wrote on the American colonies, Nicholson apparently has no title. The error has been traced to Charles Camphell, in whose "History of the Colony and Ancient Dominion of Virginia," published in 1860, we read: "In 1713 Colonel Nicholson was Governor of Nova Scotia. Having received the honor of knighthood in 1720, Sir Francis Nicholson was appointed Governor of South Carolina" (p. 369). In 1872 the error found its way into F. S. Drake's Dictionary of American Biography, and so into recent hooks.

The fact that Nicholson's name does not occur in Shaw's "Knights of England" is strong evidence, though perhaps not ahsolute proof, that he was not knighted. The Calendars of State Papers, America and West Indies, have not as yet heen printed beyond 1702. What is conclusive is that in the "Acts of the Privy Council, Colonial," in other contemporary documents, and in obituary notices that appeared in the Political State of Great Britain, in the Historical Register, and iu the New England Weekly Journal he has no title, as he surely would have had if entitled to it. Finally, in his will (Prerogative Court of Canterhury, Brook 91), dated March 4, 1728 (the day hefore his death), he speaks of himself as "I Francis Nicholson Esqr Governour of South Carolina in America, now resideing in the parish of St. George's Hanover Square in the County of Middlesex."

Attention was called to the error a decade ago in England by Charles Dalton in his "English Army Lists and Commission Registers," VI, 399, and in Notes and Queries, Ninth Series, XII, 201; hut this correction has apparently escaped the attention of American historians.

CAMPAILLA, BERKELEY, AND MILTON.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The introduction to the second edition (1728) of "L'Adamo ovvero Il Mondo Creato," by Tommaso Campailla, the Sicilian philosopher and poet (1668-1740), contains two Latin letters addressed to him by Bishop Berkeley which have escaped the attention of the hiographers of the latter, but which are of interest as relating to an ohscure episode in the career of the great Irish metaphysician, viz., his travels in Sicily.

That Berkeley visited Sicily at all has only been known through a passing allusion in one of his letters (1745) and through a statement of Thomas Blackwell in his "Memoirs of the Court of Augustus," II, 277. In his article on Berkeley in the Dictionary of National Biography, the late Sir Leslie Stephen conjectured that the journey to Sicily took place in 1719. Professor A. C. Fraser, in his life of Berkeley, however, assigns it correctly to 1718. The first of the above-mentioned letters, which is dated from Messina February 25, 1718, proves that it fell in the beginning of that year, for this letter commences: "Clarissime Vir: Ex itinere per universam Insulam instituto jam tandem, favente Numine, reversus, animum jucundissimum memoria Siculorum hospitum, atque amicorum, praesertim quos ingenio, atque eruditione praestantes invisserim, subinde, reficio. Porro inter illos quanti te faciam, vir doctissime, facilius mente concipi quam verbis exprimi potest," etc. I may remark, in passing, that Berkeley uses the new style throughout in his journals, etc., so that this letter was really written in 1718 of the modern reckoning. From the remainder of the letter it appears that the writer had visited Campailla at his home in Modica (in the diocese of Syracuse), and that the latter had given him copies of his works to be submitted to the Royal Society in London. Moreover, Berkeley promises to send to Campailla a copy of Newton's "Principia" on his return to England.

In the second of the letters, which is dated from London, "Kalendis Julij, 1723," Berkeley informs Campailla that he has given the books "Viro erudito e Societate Regia," "qui cum solertiam, & ingenium tuum pro meritis extimet, tum id plurimum miratur, tantum scientiae lumen in extremo Siciliae angulo tam diu delituisse." He adds a few lines on the impracticability of metal mirrors for telescopes—evidently in answer to an inquiry of his correspondent—then tells him that he is sending out the promised copy of Newton's work, and concludes with some words of compliment. From the beginning of the second letter one is led to suspect that the date "1723" is a mistake of printer or transcriber for "1720." It runs as follows: "Clarissime Vir: Post longam quinque fermè annorum peregrinationem, variosque casus, & discrimina, nunc demum in Angliam redux, nihil antiquius habeo, quam fidem meam tibi quondam obligatam," etc. Now, this would apply very well to 1720, for Berkeley went abroad in the latter part of 1715, whereas in 1723 he had certainly been at home for upwards of two years. In the biographical sketch of Berkeley prefixed to the new edition of his Works (1901), Professor Fraser, however, says: "In the summer of 1720 we find the travellers at Florence." There is no authority for this statement in the published writings of the Bishop, but as his biographer had access to the unpublished correspondence of Berkeley and Sir John Perceval, I hesitate to press the suggested emendation of date.

The author of the introduction to Campailla's poem, D. Jacopo de Mazara ed Echebelz, tells us that the works which the Sicilian philosopher submitted to the Royal Society through his visitor were "L'Adamo" and a "Discorso del Moto degli Animali." The first of these is a kind of "De Rerum Natura" in ottava rima. The first edition (1709) contained only six of the twenty cantos that were ultimately published, and it was, of course, this earlier edition of which Berkeley took copies to England. The poem is worthy of some attention on the part of students of English literature, owing to one feature which it has in common with "Paradise Lost": Here, too, the angel Raphael appears as an expounder of the order of Nature to Adam. Indeed, Campailla's whole poem takes the form of a dialogue between the angel and Adam in which the former develops a complete system of philosophy (essentially Cartesian), while explaining to his listener the laws of the physical world, of the human mind, etc. He finds Adam puzzling over the mysteries of the existence into which he has been just introduced, and begins his instruction with the declaration:

> Mandami l'Increata Sapienza
> A prendermi di te perpetua cura.

He takes Adam to the Terrestrial Paradise, where there is a palace containing, among other things, all the instruments for mathematical and physical research that the future is to develop. Indeed, later on in the poem we have the comical situation of the angel and our First Parent peering through a microscope together. Eve is not created until the beginning of the thirteenth canto, but her creation merely furnishes the occasion for a formal disquisition on human physiology.

Apart from the feature just mentioned, I have observed no resemblance between "L'Adamo" and "Paradise Lost." Did Campailla know Milton's poem? This seems very improbable. If the Sicilian had known English, Berkeley would hardly have addressed him in Latin. To be sure, William Hog had already in 1690 turned "Paradise Lost" into Latin verse, but it is not likely that a copy of this rather obscure translation should have reached a small town in Sicily within little more than ten years of its publication. Probably the rôle of "the sociable spirit" (to use Milton's phrase) which Raphael plays in the apocryphal Book of Tobit was enough to suggest to the Sicilian and English poets independently the idea of making him God's chosen instructor and monitor of Adam.

SCANDINAVIAN STUDY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Society for the Advancement of Scandinavian Study, at its second annual meeting at Rock Island last May, defined the functions of its committee on translations as the authorized literary committee of the Society, its members to study old and new translations of Scandinavian writers into English and publish the results of such studies. The committee was also authorized to offer the services of its members as special readers of manuscripts of translations to such publishing houses as are issuing translations of Scandinavian writings; for the Society recognized the inadequacy of English translations hitherto published and desired to coöperate with publishers in raising the standard. Publishers wishing to avail themselves of this service should correspond with the undersigned; final arrangements should, however, always be made with the individual member of the committee whose services are desired.

The committee was also asked to make some effort to have new Scandinavian publications adequately reviewed in American journals. The personnel of the committee is made up as follows: Dr. A. LeRoy Andrews, Cornell University; Mr. W. N. C. Carlton, the Newberry Library; Dr. Chester N. Gould, the University of Chicago; Mr. Aksel G. S. Josephson, the John Crerar Library; Dr. L. M. Larson, the University of Illinois; Dr. Henry G. Leach, the American-Scandinavian Foundation.

Aksel G. S. Josephson,
Chairman of the Committee.

NORTHERN WANDERINGS.

Lost in the Arctic: The Story of the Alabama Expedition, 1909-1912. By Ejnar Mikkelsen, author of Conquering the Arctic Ice. New York: George H. Doran Co. $5 net.

A Summer and Winter on Hudson Bay. By C. K. Leith and A. T. Leith. Madison, Wisconsin: The Cantwell Printing Co. $2.50 net.

One of the most plausible arguments alleged by the partisans of Dr. Cook in his claim to have reached the Pole was the similarity of his narrative to that of Commander Peary. What the argument really proved was the inherent monotony of the Arctic ice, and as new volumes of Arctic exploration follow one another in quick succession this monotony is forced upon the reader more and more. In the volumes of Peary and Amundsen interest is kept alive by the positive attainment of something which appeals powerfully to the imagination. But there are no more polar centres to discover, and sore-footed wandering over unlimited ice, with the regulation Arctic diet varied occasionally by a few slices from the liver or ham of one of your favorite dogs, killed when it was just on the point of dying from exhaustion, soon ceases to be an exhilarating literary diversion.

Mylius Erichsen sailed from Denmark in the summer of 1906 to explore the northeast coast of Greenland from Cape Bismarck to Cape Bridgemann. He actually accomplished his undertaking, only to become separated from the main body of his expedition and perish in the end, together with Lieut. Hagen and one Eskimo companion. The body of this Eskimo was discovered in the spring of 1908, before the return of the expedition, with a note to the effect that Erichsen and Hagen had perished in the middle of Danmarks Fjord. It was to recover their bodies and diaries that Ejnar Mikkelsen sailed in 1909, in the Alabama, under the joint auspices of the Danmarks (Erichsen) Expedition Committee and the Danish Government. In this they were not successful, though messages left by Erichsen were found at two different places. One of these, dated ten weeks after his separation from the main body of his expedition, contains the following sentence: "We drove westward with twenty-three dogs until the first of June, reaching Peary's Cape Glacier, and discovered that the Peary Channel does not exist. Navy Cliff being connected by land with Heilprin Land." Mikkelsen's comment on this is:

> We think in a circle, the centre of which is the fact that Peary has stood on Navy Cliff and declared that the straits were open! How is it possible? The only explanation we can find is that he must have been so high up that the low land which connects Navy Cliff with Heilprin Land appeared to him as the surface of an ice-covered sound, and that the islands he has charted as lying across the straits are the bare tops of some small hills.

Evidently here is a task for still another northern voyage, to clear up this geographical contradiction. We shall not attempt to outline Mikkelsen's painful wanderings, after he had left his vessel, with one companion, his assistant engineer, Iversen, to search by sledging for the remains of Erichsen. It was a lucky accident that attached Iversen to the party, for it was only through his unquenchable spirit and extraordinary power of resistance that Mikkelsen ever got back to tell the story. The book is well written, translated into satisfactory English, and superbly illustrated; but as we have already indicated, the literary stomach grows squeamish when the Arctic diet is long continued.

"A Summer and Winter on Hudson Bay" does not take the reader far enough into the Boreal monotony to contract scorbutic affection of the mental mechanism, and one finds it a decided relief as a gradual return towards literature of a more human temperature. The book is a by-product of a geological expedition under direction of Prof. Charles K. Leith, the author of many papers of high scientific value in the Bulletin of the United States Geological Survey, and in various geological periodicals, and especially prominent as an authority on iron ores of the Lake Superior region and elsewhere. The geological results of this trip appeared in Economic Geology for April, 1910. The present volume is given to more general observations on the region visited, which covered the entire southern and eastern shores of James Bay, and the eastern shore of Hudson Bay to a point fifty miles north of Richmond Gulf. Some interesting comments are made as to the effect of the Hudson Bay Company on the region under its influence. Devoting itself exclusively to the fur trade, it has systematically discouraged any effort to develop other resources. It has frowned even upon the introduction of more modern means of travel and communication in the conduct of its own business, as likely to draw attention away from its primary object of procuring furs. Even the geographical knowledge which its agents accumulate is turned over to the public very tardily, if at all, as is witnessed by the large blank areas on existing maps of the region about Hudson Bay. "Probably nowhere else in the world could there be cited a similar case of arrested development of a great region under control of white people." Of course, the reason for this is at hand. Whenever the region is opened up to anything which will bring in a population not devoting itself to trapping, the knell of the fur business there will have been sounded.

Mr. Leith notes in this region the same painful lack of medical service which Mr. Elihu Stewart, ex-Superintendent of Forestry for Canada, lamented in the Mackenzie-Yukon region, in a volume recently reviewed in these columns. By plain implication Mr. Leith censures the Hudson Bay Company for this deficiency; and the reader is disposed to grant the justice of the censure, as he peruses in the latter part of the volume verbatim extracts from the company's own record book at Great Whale Post, for October, 1902, when a violent epidemic of measles took over one hundred lives within a few weeks. Occasionally, a white man whose condition will permit is sent out to civilization for treatment, but such relief is so difficult and expensive as to be extremely rare, and for the Indian it is virtually impossible. "The one cheerful element in the situation is the fact that the country and habits of life tend strongly toward developing and preserving good health when reasonable care is taken." Evidently, here is a chance for some philanthropist. The mere providing of a salary for a few experienced general practitioners judiciously distributed, with a fair allowance for medical and surgical supplies, would do an enormous amount of good, and it should be no objection that the alms would not be seen of men.

CURRENT FICTION.

Sylvia. By Upton Sinclair. Philadelphia: John C. Winston Co.

The author of "The Jungle" always uses the form of fiction as a stalking-horse. This time the doctrine of eugenics, or, more properly, of the physical protection of marriage, is launched from the cover of romance. For some time we seem to be reading a story. The beautiful Southern heroine appears to be in for no more serious troubles than should in the best interests of story-telling attend the path of true love. She is daughter to a fire-eating and firewater-drinking Major, who on a decaying Southern estate struggles with the problem of keeping up the family dignity by means of a tottering family credit. In her earlier phase Sylvia is of the type of Mr. Tarkington's Flirt. The heart of man is a plaything with which she irresponsibly diverts herself, until the Only Man appears. He, unluckily, though of the right blood, is son of a father who, through a technical crime, has served a term in jail. The Major and his clan, however, consent to an engagement; whereupon the youth determines to go to Harvard in order to make himself worthy. The upshot is a visit of Sylvia to Cambridge, involving a good deal of academic and social intrigue, and resulting, not, as might have been expected of a mere novelist, in the triumph of the humble but constant lover, but in Sylvia's marriage to the great catch of the "Gold Coast" at Harvard. This young gentleman bears the suggestive name of Van Tuiver, and has been from birth a multi-millionaire. New York, and of course Cambridge and Boston, grovel before him. Sylvia is the first girl who has ever remained upright in his presence; consequently, he falls in love with her. The machinery by which their marriage is brought about is somewhat rusty. After her return South, Sylvia is informed by letter that her betrothed has been grossly unfaithful to her. She accepts the report without question, sends back his letters unopened, and presently marries the millionaire. Not long before the date set for the wedding she discovers that a friend has been physically ruined by marriage with a man of good social standing who has led a foul life. Fearing for herself, she causes the millionaire to be questioned as to whether her union with him will entail any risk of the sort. He gives his word it will not, but he lies. Her child is born blind, and she herself dies young. The story is unpleasant rather than tragic, since we cannot help feeling that the hapless Sylvia in part deserves her fate.

Michael. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture (Lady Clifford). New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

In "The Inside of the Cup" Mr. Winston Churchill has just shown how a man may put himself in the way of fulfilling his spiritual nature by escape from subservience to religious authority. Lady Clifford shows the same end being reached by the opposite process. It all depends on the nature. John Hodder is (or is supposed to be) a man of strong mind and character, born to construct and to lead. The way of blind faith in the dogma of the past could not be the way for him. Michael Ferrys, on the other hand, with all his lovableness, is inherently weak and chameleon-like. Taking thought in matters of religion merely confuses him. Not until he feels the strong arm of churchly authority about him does he find himself believing, and at peace.

The means by which he is brought to this sense is strange, and, from the merely human point of view, accidental. Bred to no religious belief, he falls in love with the daughter of an old English Catholic family, a maiden firm in her faith, but otherwise the blue-eyed, golden-haired miss who is Lady Clifford's favorite heroine. His great wealth and personal charm make him in general acceptable to the family; nevertheless, the condition of his betrothal is that he shall embrace the Roman faith. He is quite willing, and puts himself under the instruction of the Church; but neither the efforts lavished upon him nor his own good will bring conviction. Dogma does not offend him, the rites of the ancient faith have their glamour for him. But his heart remains untouched, and he is at least too honest to pretend. He sets out to confess his failure to his beloved, and to appeal to her feeling for him—and finds her dead. The shock of this discovery, supplemented by an apparent miracle, and a physical accident resulting in concussion of the brain, has its outcome in his sudden demand to be received into the Church. Apparently in his right mind, he is really unconscious of all that happens between the moment of his accident and the awakening, weeks later, from the long fever that follows. But the discovery that he has been received into the Roman Catholic fold is the important thing to him—not the manner of his reception. The matter has simply been taken out of his hands: he is safe; at one stroke all his doubts and hesitations have vanished. The idea is a striking one. The romantic conclusion of the story as a story is in Lady Clifford's familiar vein.

Fortitude. By Hugh Walpole. New York: George H. Doran Co.

Mr. Walpole extols his hero's fortitude, but the reader's deserves more praise. The history of Peter Westcott's boyhood, prolonged through thirty-odd years, leaves one with the feeling of having wandered too long in a misty dream. Peter himself complains that life has been "like fighting in a fog." His chief plight—so far as its shifting outlines permit of exact definition—seems to be that he began as a hero of romance and fell midway into a discouraging stretch of realism. After a boyhood of lonely terrors, paternal beatings, and boarding-school brutalities, he runs away from Cornwall to London, there to be launched upon a literary career under the auspices of a gentle coterie of anarchists disguised as bookworms. Through the starvation period, traditionally indispensable to the budding novelist's development, he is squired by his childhood idol, a Cornish yokel of gigantic stature and unreasoning devotion. So far he has been able to take hardships as adventures, "and nothing hurt where everything was romance." But the miseries that follow belong to a later literary fashion, and there is no disguising them. Having attained semi-celebrity and prosperity, he marries that modern woman who is ideal to woo but impossible to live with—selfish, jealous of his work, "afraid of life," deficient in maternal affection, full of the shortcomings familiar to the popular science of matrimonial pathology. His work deteriorates, his infant son dies, the unsatisfactory wife disappears with an admired friend of his school days. Then comes the modern bugaboo—heredity—to fright him with visions of a drunken old age, and memories of Cornwall lay sinister hold upon his imagination. Fortunately, in the belief that a motto makes for unity, Mr. Walpole has provided Peter at the outset with the words of a tavern sage, "It isn't life that matters, but the courage you bring to it." A final tableau reveals Peter posed solitary upon a high hill, "with the great sea at his feet, with the storm rolling up to him," symbolically breasting the future in a lofty mood of stoical equanimity.

Mr. Walpole is firmly convinced that to be indefinite is to be highly artistic and impressive. He accounts for the lurid lighting of a foggy street scene by "some fire, blazing at some street corner," and is especially delighted with photography in which "things stood out—castles, a hill, trees, running water, a shining road—and behind them there was darkness and mystery." This aversion to over-explicitness, together with an unconscious habit of imitative enthusiasm, makes bewildering reading for one who entertains no great partiality for the amorphous.

HERR BEBEL.

My Life. By August Bebel. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.

The life story of such a man as Herr Bebel is of universal interest. He is a rare narrator. He tells us just the things we want to know; he is graphic and dignified and well-balanced; he possesses a sense of humor, and we discover in him few traces of the egoist. He humanizes a great cause, and by so doing makes it intelligible, and perhaps even appealing, to thousands who would otherwise pass by on the other side.

The lacunæ of history are always a fascinating study. None is more so than that which intervenes between 1848, when Marx and Engels put forth the "Communist Manifesto," and the founding of the International Workingmen's Association in 1864. Bebel was born in 1840, and from the account which he gives us of his youth, we are able to glean much of this period of gestation from which Socialism as a political force emerged. As we read of the hardships which confronted the proletariat of those days, we are not surprised at the demands formulated by such men as Liebknecht and Bebel; our wonder is that, once having gained an influence, they did not proceed to the limits of injudiciousness. Bebel's father was a non-commissioned officer in a Prussian regiment. The conditions surrounding such a life were miserable. The pay was more than scanty. All the official and military classes of Prussia had in those days to exist on very narrow means; almost every one had to go hungry, tightening the belt for God, King, and country. It was a maxim that Prussia became great by hunger. In 1844 the elder Bebel died at the age of thirty-five, leaving his wife without a claim to a pension. Soon after his death, his twin-brother, the better to fulfil the duty which he had taken upon him of providing for the family, married the widow. He became a constable to the military hospital at Mayence, and afterwards a warden in the Reformatory of Brauweiler, near Cologne. His compensation consisted of free lodgings (two rooms), fuel, and light, and eight thalers (six dollars) a month. This had to provide for five persons.

Consumption, however, carried him away in 1846, and his widow had to return with her family to her birthplace, Wetzlar, where lived her mother and three sisters and a brother. There Bebel attended the Poor Law School. He displayed some proficiency in mathematics, and was even initiated into the secrets of logarithms. History and geography were also favorite studies. He tells us that he was noted for pranks, and earned the reputation of being a moral reprobate. Yet the day came when he said, "Now, you must begin to be a sensible fellow." From that time he did nothing that was punishable, and eventually took the first place in his form. The family, however, continued in desperate straits. Bebel sought employment as boy in a skittle-alley, to which he resorted after school, reaching home at ten o'clock in the evening.

His mother died of consumption in 1853, and at the age of thirteen he became apprenticed to a turner. In January, 1858, he began to tramp as a journeyman. In 1860 he turned up in Leipzig, where, he says, he was lucky enough to find work at once, and just of the kind by which he afterwards built up a business of his own. At that time the Conservative reaction which had set in after 1849 began to subside, by reason of the pressure of the middle-class Liberals, who, having developed their economic forces and having obtained wealth, were showing an interest in political affairs. The "German question" had acquired a new vitality, and was supported with the greatest enthusiasm. The Nationalverein demanded the convocation of a German Parliament. The more far-sighted of the Liberals quickly recognized the importance of obtaining the support of the workers, and to this end lent themselves to the promotion of workers' unions, and sought to put trustworthy men at the head of them.

The German workingmen of those days knew next to nothing of politics.

In 1861 a Workers' Improvement Society was founded in Leipzig, of which Bebel immediately became a member. He was now on the road which landed him in Parliament, and eventually made him a power in Imperial affairs. In 1867 he was elected a member of the North German Diet. In that year was founded the Social-Democratic Labor party, which declared itself a branch of the International. This act was immediately followed by a dissolution of the League of Workingmen's Societies. The new party was pitted against the Lasalleans, who were divided into two factions bitterly at war with each other. In 1870 a fourth Social-Democratic organization came into being, but had only a short life. It was not until 1878 that the Social-Democrats were unified.

Bebel was not slow to make his presence felt in the North German Constituent Reichstag of 1867. In the Reichstag itself, which convened in September of that year, his first speech was on the Address. His second effort was in connection with the law of universal military service. On this occasion he demanded a term of nine months with the colors. This, of course, was rejected, but Bebel received many congratulatory communications from all parts of Germany. "Our Leipzig friends," he says, "sent us a token of their approval in the shape of a nine-pound ham, which was very welcome to unsalaried members as we were then."

On the 17th of December, 1870, Bebel was arrested on a charge of attempted high treason, and spent 101 days in prison awaiting trial. During this period, on the 3d of March, 1871, occurred the new elections to the Reichstag, and he was again successful. On the 2d of April he went to Berlin to attend the sittings of the Reichstag, but had to face the court in the spring of 1872. The trial lasted fourteen days, and ended in a sentence of two years' imprisonment in a fortress. His doctor consoled his wife in a curious way. "Frau Bebel," he said, "if your husband gets a year in prison, you may rejoice, for he needs a rest." His release from confinement came on April 1, 1875; but in June, 1877, he was again sent to prison, this time for six months, on a charge of libelling Bismarck. The present volume carries us to the eve of the Anti-Socialist laws and to the attempt on the Emperor's life in 1878. Absorbing as we have found it, we know that we are only at the beginning of Bebel's real political life.

In the work are disclosed the foundations on which has been constructed one of the most surprising and transforming political movements of modern history. Men and things about which there has been a vast amount of controversy in the last half century are pictured with sufficient calmness to enable us to feel that we are getting new and genuine insights. What Bebel has to say about Liebknecht, for example, is of no small account in estimating the forces of the last half of the nineteenth century. Liebknecht's was the true fighting temperament, supported by unshakable optimism. No misfortune, whether private or affecting his party, ever for a moment dashed his spirits or disconcerted him. He could not be "bluffed"; he could always find a way out of difficulties. The attacks of opponents he met on the principle that the correct move is always to go one better. Brusque and inconsiderate to opponents, he was always helpful to friends and comrades. In his private life he was a good husband and father and devoted to his family. He was a true lover of nature. A group of fine trees in otherwise unattractive surroundings would move him to enthusiasm and persuade him that the place was beautiful. He was unassuming in manner and simple in his tastes. When he appeared in a new suit—a thing which did not happen often—if Bebel did not at once notice it and compliment him on the fact, he would invariably call his attention to it and ask for his approval. He was, Bebel declares, a man of iron with the heart of a child.

Highly instructive, if not so dispassionate, is Bebel's sketch of Schweitzer, who, after the death of Lassalle, acquired the leadership of the General German Labor Union. Schweitzer, he says, was well endowed with many of the qualities which are of value to a man in such a position. He was well grounded in theory, and his judgment was cool. As a journalist and agitator he had a gift of making the most difficult problems clear to the most simple of workingmen, and he understood how to fascinate the masses and "rouse them to fanaticism." He wrote some of the best things in Socialistic literature, such as his criticism of Marx's "Capital." As a parliamentarian he was adroit. Finally, he was a good speaker. But besides these fine and even brilliant gifts he had, Bebel declares, many defects which made him a dangerous leader for a Labor party in the first stages of development. The movement which he joined after many failures was for him only a means to an end, and this end was his own advancement. Briefly, he was, in Bebel's judgment, a tool of Bismarck's.

Of Bismarck himself we are told much. Bebel's first view of the Prince was at the opening of the Reichstag of 1867. "I looked in vain," he says, "for the famous triad of hairs standing upright, like poplars on a plain, in the midst of an otherwise bald cranium, as shown in all the caricatures. I was very anxious to hear him speak, and was greatly disappointed to find that, giant though he was, he did not roar like a lion or speak with the voice of Stentor; his voice was actually a high tenor. He made use of long and involved sentences, and was sometimes hesitating, but all he said was of interest and to the point." Shortly after Bebel's trial, he fell dangerously ill with pleurisy. "I was thoroughly exhausted with all this work and worry, public and private," he says. "I suffered violent pain, and could not sleep. During the nights, as I lay awake, I bethought myself of Bismarck, in the light of a fellow-sufferer; for I knew from the papers that he was very ill with insomnia and neuralgia."

English Literature and the Classics. Lectures by Gilbert Murray and Others. Clarendon Press. New York: Henry Frowde. 6s. net.

More than twenty years ago, the late Churton Collins urged the English universities to establish "Honor Schools" in English literature, which should require as an integral part of their discipline the systematic study of the Greek and Latin classics. His plan, though approved by many distinguished persons, was quashed by University conservatism, more especially by the "philological" or linguistic wing of the "Modern Side." Some of his ideas have since been effected, gradually and partially. At Oxford the Regius professor of Greek and the Corpus professor of Latin now serve with the professor of English literature and the professor of poetry upon the Board of the Pass School (not an Honor School) in English Language and Literature. At Cambridge there is a personal union at least, if not an institutional union, of English literature with the classics, in the person of A. W. Verrall, first holder of the King Edward VII professorship of English literature (established 1910-11). And American humanists will recall the fact that Harvard now offers "Final Honors in Literature," based upon the study of at least two literatures, one ancient and one modern.

The institutional union, then, of these two provinces of literary study seems not beyond hope. Meanwhile it is promoted by diplomatic missions sent over the boundary from time to time to acquaint the inhabitants of one province with what has been done for them by their neighbors across the border. Such a mission is undertaken by the present "collection of nine lectures delivered in Oxford at the invitation of the Board of English Studies. . . . They were addressed primarily to members of the English School, but in effect to all students of modern literature who cared to hear . . . something of what the classics mean in the history of letters" (Preface).

The contributors have conceived their tasks variously, and their product, though of generally high quality, is uneven. S. G. Owen's "Ovid and Romance" is a conscientious notation of parallel passages in English from Chaucer to the nineteenth century, together with critical remarks of no very profound order upon the romantic quality in Ovid and his imitators. "Senecan Tragedy," by A. D. Godley, a very accomplished account of the rhetorical qualities which Seneca's Roman public and French public liked, but which no English public could long endure, concludes that "there is nothing of the Senecan tradition in Mr. Galsworthy; and we look for it in vain in the plays of Mr. Bernard Shaw"!

R. J. E. Tiddy and G. S. Gordon (the editor of the volume) come to their subjects from the "Modern Side," both being lecturers in English. Mr. Tiddy, in "Satura and Satire," propounds what seems to us an untenable analogy: as Roman satura is to Roman satire, so is English satire before the Renaissance to English satire after. As a matter of fact, the genial quality of the early Roman form is not matched by mediæval English satire, save in isolated cases like the "Speculum Stultorum" (Burnellus the Ass) of Nigellus Wireker; in general, quite unlike satura, the early English product has for its note bitter complaint and savage invective. Mr. Gordon, in "Theophrastus and his Imitators," signalizes most entertainingly the initial connections of character-writing with comedy, with philosophy, and with rhetoric; shows how the genre reached modern literature through the last of these channels—the classroom exercise in ethopoicia, not waiting for Casaubon to restore Theophrastus's own "Characters"; and establishes, finally, the relations of English character-writing to the comedy of humors, the essay, and the novel. The Oxford smartness, which in Mr. Gordon's brilliant article makes for lucidity, and is no obstacle to the conveyance of solid information, becomes cryptic, oracular, and jejune in J. S. Phillimore's "The Greek Romances"; which, moreover, leaves quite untouched the English portion of its subject. Inasmuch as this portion includes Lyly's "Euphues," Sidney's "Arcadia," and Shakespeare's "The Winter's Tale," it hardly deserves either this neglect or Mr. Phillimore's slur (Postscript, p. 117) that it is the sort of thing "that thesis-writers will not willingly let die."

Cicero's influence, not upon rhetoric and oratory alone, but upon politics, philosophy, and even religion, is the vast subject of A. C. Clark's "Ciceronianism." A genius that made Fathers of the Church take sides, and that could count among its followers Petrarch, English Deists, and Dr. Johnson, together with French Revolutionists and Burke, is surely a permanent force in the world's thought; surely "still moves among us and delivers a message to those that hearken." The "Vergil" of H. W. Garrod varies Sainte-Beuve's dictum that Virgil "divined what the future would love": rather was Virgil carried beyond his classic intention unconsciously, upon a wave of romantic feeling the nature of which he himself did not divine. Rapt from success by the Celtic glamour in his blood, he achieved in his partial failure a kind of universality that was not of the old world, but of the world to come.

Gilbert Murray, in "Greek and English Tragedy," attempts no detailed account of influence or imitation, but treats instead the pregnant differences between an art that soon forgot its liturgical origins and an art that to the very end was religious to the core. The lecture is essential criticism of a high order. Possibly even more suggestive is J. A. Stewart's "Platonism in English Poetry"; which by dealing somewhat intensively with a few poets (omitting, for example, the whole seventeenth century) builds a pathway to the Platonism in many more. Above all, the lecture itself conveys the Platonic mood; more than one neophyte is likely to look back upon it as his initiation.

Eminent English Men and Women in Paris, 1800-1850. By Roger Boutet de Monvel. Translated by G. Herring. New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons. $3 net.

The author of this scholarly and fascinating book, which was deservedly crowned by the French Academy last year, has been singularly fortunate in his translator. G. Herring, who is responsible for the English version, has done a really notable piece of work in preserving to an unusual degree the lightness of touch and grace of idiom that characterize the French, and that are almost invariably lost in the transference to our more stolid forms of speech. M. de Monvel himself seems to possess exactly the right equipment for his task: a wide sympathy and acquaintance with English habits of life, a profound erudition, and an unconquerable sense of humor. With the genius of his race he understands how to marier le sérieux au riant, and whether he is grave or gay, he writes with equal charm. He is very subtle, too, as he shows us in his analysis of Thackeray's diatribes against the frivolous and immoral French nation; this is a delicious chapter of satirical writing. If Thackeray lays about him with a club, M. de Monvel parries easily with a rapier, and his ripostes are the more effective because he has a very sincere appreciation of the novelist's genius. The Parisienne, he says, according to Thackeray, is "a creature who puts on rouge and powder, garbs herself conspicuously in ridiculous clothes, wears disgraceful hats, and has at least two lovers at the same time." The Parisian man is no better: "Why, ye gods," cries Thackeray in a rage, "do Frenchmen marry at all?" And then M. de Monvel proceeds to show us that Thackeray's invectives were directed against a society that he had created for himself out of the lurid novels of the day, and that when he comes into personal contact with these frivolous, immoral Parisians he often writes with sympathy and kindliness.

But if Thackeray failed sometimes to appreciate the inhabitants of the land where he spent, nevertheless, a good deal of his time, there is a long list of English men and women who have made themselves thoroughly at home there. Napoleon's prisoners at Verdun found many mitigations for the tedium of their long captivity, and made of that sleepy city a gay pleasure resort that would certainly have merited the strictures of the severe Victorian moralist. Later, when the war was over, Wellington and his army were quartered in Paris, and general, officers, and privates alike seem to have found plenty to amuse them during their sojourn, and, in marked contrast to the conduct of Blücher and his men, to have established themselves on very good terms with the inhabitants. Some of the officers, indeed, found the lure of Paris so irresistible that afterwards they made their permanent home there, and, like the inscrutable Capt. Gronow, on whose journals M. de Monvel has drawn freely for information, became the arbiters of a society which they and their successors in the next generation infected with a severe attack of Anglomania.

Then there was that wonderful Lady Blessington, who once reigned there a queen of society, and thither returned long years afterwards, an old woman, hunted by creditors, to die friendless and alone by her own hand in a humble lodging on the Rue du Cirque. Her body lies in a vault on the Chambourcy estate of the Duchesse de Gramont, who, three years later, "with touching thoughtfulness," caused to be laid beside it that of poor d'Orsay, fled like his quondam mistress from "a throng of insolent creditors" in London, and dying the day after the Prince President had relieved him from financial anxiety by appointing him Director of Fine Arts. Lady Hamilton was another who at the last sought the hospitality of France, and lies in its friendly soil. As the record in the city's register of births and deaths shows, she died at Calais on January 15, 1815—of hunger.

It would be possible to quote indefinitely from this charming book, but that would be apt to convey the false impression that M. de Monvel's work is principally a volume of entertaining gossip. So far from that being the case, the author displays throughout a definite constructive purpose, which is to illustrate the somewhat remarkable fact that, despite the most radical differences of sentiment and manners between France and England, there are, as he says, politics apart, "few nations who have maintained a more uninterrupted intercourse with one another, and probably fewer still whose thought and culture have acted and reacted so closely one upon another."

Notes

The Century Company announces that Oliver Herford's "Jungle Jingles" are to be made into a characteristic Herford book this autumn, with pictures on every page and a cover drawing by the author.

The same house will publish Jack London's "John Barleycorn" and a book on the Balkans by Robert Hichens, with pictures by Jules Guérin.

Mr. Charles Hughes, author of "Unpublished Chapters from Fynes Moryson," will bring out, through Simpkin Marshall, "Mrs. Piozzi's Thraliana."

Among the announcements of Longmans, Green & Company are the following titles: "Organized Democracy: An Introduction to the Study of American Politics" (American Citizen series), by Frederick A. Cleveland; "Public Opinion and Popular Government," by A. Lawrence Lowell; "Modern American Speeches," edited with notes and introductions by Lester W. Boardman, and "A History of England, from the Defeat of the Armada to the Death of Elizabeth, with an Account of English Institutions During the Later Sixteenth and Early Seventeenth Centuries," by E. P. Cheyney.

In Mrs. Dora Sigerson Shorter's "New Poems" (Dublin: Maunsel & Company) there is nothing to alter or affect particularly the reputation already gained by the poetess. The volume, a very slender one this time, is composed of several ballads and a few lyrics written in the strain already associated with her name. To be sure, there is no ballad to equal "The Deer Stone" and "Kathleen's Charity," no lyric so good as "The Wind on the Hills" with its admirable expression of what we have come to think of as the Celtic spirit, whose > children shall inherit

> The unrest of the wind.

But it is written in the same key, with much of the same gentle nostalgia for the world of romance and faery, with the same delicate touch at work on the prosaic little details of daily life, transmuting them into something rarer and more ethereal than the things of sense.

> All night the small feet of the rain
> Within the garden ran,
> And gentle fingers tapped the pane
> Until the dawn began.
> The rill-like voices called and sung
> The slanting roofs beside;
> "The children of the clouds have come;
> Awake! awake!" they cried. . . .
> All night the small feet of the rain
> About my garden ran,
> Their rill-like voices called and cried
> Until the dawn began.

It is a question whether an Everyman's Library need be painstaking in its apparatus; and it is not certain how many poets have been careful editors. In any case, John Masefield, in his Introduction to Anson's "Voyage Round the World" (Everyman's Library, No. 510: Dutton), has done no more than write something about life at sea and ashore in 1740, letting Anson's "Voyage" come out again as the work of Richard Walter, chaplain of the Centurion. It seems perfectly clear that this extraordinary narrative was put together by Benjamin Robins, the celebrated expert on gunnery.

From the Yale University Press we have an "Index Verborum Catullianus," by Prof. Monroe N. Wetmore, of Williams College, following the same plan as his index to the vocabulary of Virgil, published in 1911, except that the careful record of manuscript variants given in the Oxford text edition rendered unnecessary any reference to them in the parenthetical notes of this index. As previous indexes to Catullus are out of print, and even the best of them unmindful of variant readings and otherwise defective, many readers who share the revived interest in Catullus will heartily thank Professor Wetmore for this aid.

In "Annals of the Strand" and "Annals of Fleet Street" (Stokes), E. Beresford Chancellor has done good work in concentrating the histories of these two famous streets, almost the most famous in the world, which merge into one another, into two substantial volumes. Despite his modest apology for "sins of omission and commission" he seems to have given a singularly full and complete account of the history and topography of the streets as well as of the great names which have been associated with them. His study of the available sources of information has been commendably conscientious, and both books have the merit of liberal quotation and of footnotes giving chapter and verse of references to authorities. It cannot be said that either of the volumes is written in a particularly entertaining style; but in compensation for the lack of qualities calculated to make a popular appeal, the information they contain is full and accurate; they are well indexed, and as reference books for those who have more than a superficial interest in the street of London where more of history is written than in any other they should prove of great value. It is perhaps regrettable that Mr. Chancellor has not seen fit to include in his "Annals of Fleet Street" some fuller account of its life to-day, and of the personalities who are moving there in our own generation. True, that would be a somewhat delicate task, but Fleet Street is probably not less interesting to-day than it has ever been, if we except the great and inevitable Johnsonian tradition, and for the peripatetic philosopher from a foreign land in London such a chapter would have a great fascination The illustrations in both volumes are judiciously selected and well reproduced.

The translation of the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," made in 1847 by J. A. Giles, which was formerly bound with the same translator's version of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History," has been reissued as a separate volume in Bohn's Library (Macmillan). Although completely superseded by the critical edition of Earle and Plummer, its cheapness gives it a kind of claim on those whose interest is curious rather than strictly scholarly. A new introduction has been provided.

Mr. Robert W. Neeser, the secretary of the Naval History Society, has published, through the Yale University Press, "A Landsman's Log," being his diary on board the battleship Kansas during a four months' winter cruise in Caribbean waters some few years ago. The book, profusely illustrated with excellent and quite remarkable photographs of his own taking, gives a detailed account of his experiences while honorary (and, we are sure, most welcome) member of the Kansas's Ward Room Mess. No better description than this of modern ship life can be found. The varying episodes of coaling and the subsequent cleaning up, of drills and exercises afloat and ashore, of target practice with great guns under way, or with rifles at the Guantanamo range, of boat racing, of sports and entertainments on board, of games and athletic competitions at the recreation ground, also at Guantanamo, are faithfully recounted. To the average reader, who knows but little of the routine and discipline of our fleet, this log will prove most acceptable. Though it pretends to be no more than the title implies, one is tempted to regret that it has not thrown more light on the bluejacket's daily life or presented his point of view. The good quality of the enlisted man is recognized, and reference is made to the admirable relations existing between him and his superior officers, but this last gratifying fact and his mental attitude towards the service in general might well have received further elaboration at the hands of this author, whose clear style, competent observation, and unusual modesty are manifest on every page.

It is not pleasant to find fault with a writer on Austria who loves the country as much as does James Baker ("Austria: Her People, Their Homelands," John Lane), but it must be said that he has written a disappointing book. It is neither guide book nor description of travel, but a very superficial medley from various sources, some as remote as Kohl's "Reisen," in the early forties. Complacent quotations from the author's novels, the scene of which is laid in Austria, are also relied on. The style is often slipshod, and the pages fairly swarm with errors and misprints. The adjective "Slowenisch" is used as a noun. The battle of Lissa is said to have "made the Adriatic so largely an Austrian sea," the fact being that after the battle Austria was forced to surrender Venice, her principal possession on the Adriatic. Graz, the capital of Styria, is defined as "formerly spelt Gratz and pronounced 'grates,' rhyming to 'gerato' (it has succeeded)," which we leave to some clever etymologist and prosodist to puzzle out. The aquarelle illustrations may have been pretty enough in the original, but the tricolor process does them scant justice. The picture of beautiful Salzburg is not much more than a blotch, and St. Stephen's, in Vienna, looks as if it rose from a lake. As is often the case in English books, the legends on the pictures contain mistakes—"Cernowitz" for "Czernowitz," and "Trieste" for "Trent." For the information on the latter picture, that it represents "the scene which inspired Dante's 'Inferno,'" the author alone must be held responsible. The price of the book, $6.50, is absurdly high.

Sir James Murray begins the tenth and last volume of the "Oxford English Dictionary" with the double section Ti-Tombac (Frowde). This tract is notably rich in those familiar "low" words of the vernacular which are eschewed by academic taste, and which can seldom be accurately dated or with certainty traced to their origins—such as tinker, tippler, tipsy, titter. Tinker, for example, was derived by Johnson from the verb tink, "to emit a metallic sound," on the ground that a tinker proclaims his trade by beating a kettle or that in his work he makes a tinkling sound; and this explanation is still offered in Webster's "International." Tinker, however, appears as early as 1265, and frequently before 1300, whereas tink is unknown before Wyclif's translation of I Cor. xiii, i, "I am maad as bras sownynge, or a symbal tynkynge." It is a curious fact that this useful order of workmen seems not to have improved its social status since the days of Henry III, when the lowest assessment, two pence, made by the Corporation of Wallingford was upon "Editha le Tynekere." In 1666 John Bunyan alludes to the practitioners of this trade as belonging to "that Rank that is meanest and most despised of all the Families in the Land." In Scotland and Ireland tinker is still the equivalent of gipsy and of vagrant generally as in John Synge's "Tinker's Wedding." It were a pretty economic problem to determine whether vagrancy leads to tinkering or vice versa. Probably the most piquant guild contribution to language and literature is the Tinker's Damn, a fine "colorful" phrase which, in 1877, Knight attempted to whitewash with the following rather Teutonic explanation: "A wall of dough raised around a place which a plumber desires to flood with a coat of solder . . . it has passed into a proverb, usually involving the wrong spelling of the otherwise innocent word 'dam.'" For our first example of tipsy we are indebted to the Rev. Meredith Hanmer, who introduced the word into his ecclesiastical history in 1577. The second example is Shakespeare's "tipsie Bachanals" in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," wrongly dated 1590—four or five years earlier than the accepted date. The first use of the adverb titter-totter, meaning unsteadily, is dated 1725. We find an example in 1672, Francis Hawkins's "Youths Behaviour" (eleventh impression), page 23, "stand not titter-tatter on one foot." Under toad-eater, meaning sycophant, it is a pity that there is not a reference to the humorous anatomization of "the Phusalophagos or Toad-eater" in the Lounger, May 14, 1785. The most conspicuous American contributions are tobacco, tomahawk, and tintinnabulation, the last due to Poe, the "jingle man," in his "Belis," 1831.

The history of the Ohio Company, 1748 to 1774, which is the first of the three essays composing the new volume—"Early Chapters in the Development of the Patomac Route to the West" (Washington: Columbia Historical Society), by Mrs. Corra Bacon-Foster—adds very little to our knowledge of the undertaking of this first company of Virginian and London land-speculators to exploit the Trans-Alleghany region. The intricacy of politics, both imperial and local, surrounding the operations of the company, must be known to understand the situation; and this knowledge is not possessed by the author, who has been satisfied with an examination of a few well-known authorities on local history. Part ii is an account of the "Patowmack Company, 1785-1828," and is by all odds the most important section of the book. This is based on the correspondence of the prominent men engaged in the enterprise and the papers of the company, from both of which sources long extracts are printed. The account is further supported by appendices of seventy-nine pages of quotations from printed and unprinted sources. The whole forms a very interesting and exhaustive treatment of this undertaking to connect Virginia by a water route more directly with the growing West, in order that she might enjoy the profits of a trade which was enriching the Pennsylvanians, and later, after the construction of the Erie Canal, added so much to the fortunes of the New Yorkers. The third part is a sketchy life of Charles Simms, eight years president of the Patomac Company, with a selection of his private and public letters. The volume will be found of interest to many readers, whether trained historians or not, and although there must be some criticism of both form and matter, the studies were decidedly worth doing.

The lively articles on Germany which originally appeared in Scribner's have now grown into a stout volume ("Germany and the Germans from an American Point of View," by Price Collier; Charles Scribner's Sons). Thus collected, the essays form a graphic picture of present-day Germany, by a shrewd, well-informed, and, on the whole, kindly observer of men and things. Mr. Collier is an intense admirer of the German Emperor, the German army, and German home life. He is less partial in his comments on party government and the ever-present hand of the police and the bureaucracy. What he says in praise of the German press gains in emphasis by contrast with American conditions; on the other hand, he does less than justice to German railways in his remark that "were the system [of "inefficient and unnecessary employees"] spread over the United States the chaos in a dozen years would be almost irreparable." A jaunty cocksureness in many of the author's assertions, while not without a certain piquancy, detracts seriously from the value of the book as a whole. We are told that Goethe was "as parochial in his politics as he was amateurish in science," that "in Baden three words out of ten that you hear are French," that "criticism of the Emperor's habit of speaking of 'my navy' is merely the petty pin-pricking babble of boarding-school girls," that "peace is a negative thing that no one really wants," that music is "the art which burns up the manhood of its devotees." The author cannot understand "how any German can criticise Bismarck"; Voltaire is to him "that acidulous vestal of literature," and Racine and Corneille are disposed of by a reference to their "second-hand and half-baked Hellenism." But it is very natural to dogmatize when one is upheld by serene confidence in the justice of one's opinions. "I betray no secret," says Mr. Collier, "when I declare that the most intelligent and patriotic criticism in Germany coincides with my own." It would be idle to expect a judicious summing-up of the conflicting impressions of a writer who, while knowing Germany well, in most of the aspects of its public and private life, lacks "das geistige Band," which would unite what he has seen into an harmonious whole. His conclusion concludes nothing. It is ludicrous, after exalting the army and the Emperor, to write: "Werther, and Faust, and Lohengrin are far more real than those scarecrows autocracy, bureaucracy, and militarism, triplets of straw, premature births, not destined to live, of which Germany boasts to-day as the most precocious children in the world."

The fifth volume of Hastings's "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics" (Scribner), containing the articles from Dravidians to Fichte, maintains the good standard of the preceding volumes. The collections of facts are large, the bibliographical lists are useful guides for scholars and for general readers, and the conclusions reached are for the most part carefully thought out and deserve respectful consideration, even when they are not accepted. The wide range of topics embraces nearly the whole field of religion and ethics, with excursions into other fields. There are descriptions of such general religious facts as fetishism, dualism, euhemerism, the female principle (the relation between religion and love, and the influence of the cult of female deities), eschatology, the idea of a fall of man from a state of original innocence and happiness, and the belief in all-controlling fate. And certain great modern movements are discussed, notably the Enlightenment (the development of thought from Grotius and Hobbes to Kant) and the Encyclopædists. A long list is given also of persons ("enthusiasts") who believed themselves inspired to preach new gospels. Professor Starbuck properly rejects the view that religion and love are in origin identical, and the difference between the two would have been made clearer if his limits had allowed him to trace the genesis of female deities. The importance of the study of early religious customs is recognized in articles on drink, dress, fasting, and feasting (with which the eucharistic meal must be connected), and even the household winnowing fan is shown by Miss Jane Harrison to be religiously interesting. The ancient and still widespread belief in the "evil eye" is brought out by F. Elworthy. Fairy lore is described at length by MacCulloch, and the treatment of the fable has been properly assigned to Joseph Jacobs. A general view of early cults in Europe is given in Keane's article, Europe. The positive statements of his article, Ethnology, must be treated cautiously—his dates, for example, for the earliest civilization of Babylonia (above 8,000 years ago) and for that of Egypt (above 13,000 years ago) are too high by some thousands of years. The national religions described in whole or in part are the Egyptian (Petrie), the Elamitic (Pinches), the Chinese (Dukes), and the Celtic (MacCulloch and Maclean); what is known of the Etruscan is summed up by Herbig, and the latest views of the Eskimos are given by Radin and Gray. There are excellent accounts of the Jewish and Jewish-Christian sects, the Essenes, the Ebionites, and the Elkesaites. The history of the episcopate is given at length; the point of view of the writer, Darwell Stone, Principal Pusey Librarian, Oxford, is indicated by his speaking of the "so-called" Methodist Episcopal Church in America—that is, Coke received the title "bishop," not from ordination by an English bishop, but from the American Methodist Conference.

The more spiritual side of religious life is discussed in the articles Expiation and Atonement, Faith and Experience. The first of these is composite, giving, by separate writers, the conceptions found in the lower peoples and in the great religious systems (except the Vedic and the Celtic, which are treated elsewhere). Various conceptions of faith are described (Burns)—a simple trust (so generally), or, in the Pauline system, spiritual union with Christ, or, as dependent on its moral value, or, in the Greek view, coterminous with knowledge; but the relation between reason and faith is not discussed. The value of religious experience for knowledge of God is emphasized, and William James's suggestion of the great part played in experience by the subliminal self is mentioned, but not adopted. Much space is given to ethical subjects. The article Ethics (Muirhead) discusses the basis and the validity of our ethical judgments. Philosophical articles discuss Epistemology (Iverach), Error and Truth (Royce, who looks to a combination of revised Hegelian dialectics, recent Pragmatism, and modern Logic for a complete treatment of the problem of error), the Ego, Egoism, and Empiricism, Emotions (Dorner), Feeling (Salmond), and Fear (with criticism of the view of Lange and James that the feeling of fear succeeds, not precedes, the reactions). Finally, there are scientific articles on Evolution (Biological), Economics, and the Fabian Society. Altogether, this volume of the Encyclopædia, in the number of its articles on important subjects and the saneness of its judgments, is not excelled by any of its predecessors.

Science

The Mosquitoes of North and Central America and the West Indies. By Leland O. Howard, Harrison G. Dyar, and Frederick Knab. Two volumes. Washington: Carnegie Institution.

Following hard upon the discovery, in 1897, that malaria is mosquito-borne, and the still more startling proof that yellow fever is carried solely by certain mosquitoes, came the reflection that virtually nothing was known about the life histories and habits of even our commonest species. Writers were still copying the treatises of Swammerdam and Reaumur and assuming that their descriptions were typical for the group. The fallacy of this was apparent to our Government entomologist, Dr. L. O. Howard, and he was convinced that a thoroughgoing monographic study of all our mosquitoes, with special reference to their biology and classification, would yield data of the utmost value from a practical standpoint. With this in mind, he applied for aid from the Carnegie Institution, and in January, 1903, a grant was made covering the three-year period within which it was supposed that the monograph could be completed. It was found impossible to finish the work in the time set, and the investigations were continued through three additional years, partly by Government aid and by volunteer observers and partly at the expense of two of the authors (Dr. Dyar and Mr. Knab). Before us are the first two volumes of the monograph, and the remaining two are promised for an early date.

Volume one, the most interesting for the non-entomological reader, is devoted to "a general consideration of mosquitoes, their habits, and their relations to the human species." In the five hundred quarto pages there are first discussed in great detail the early accounts of mosquitoes, the structure of the adult, larva and pupa, the habits of adults and larvæ, their natural enemies, and methods of collecting, mounting, and rearing. The major part of the volume is given to the discussion of the relation of mosquitoes to man as disease carriers, the economic loss they occasion, and protective and remedial work. Following a detailed consideration of the structure of the antennæ, the authors dissent from the generally accepted view that in the male these organs have an auditory function. The hypotheses "are founded upon the assumption that the male seeks the female and is attracted by her song," but "at least in those forms in which the antennæ of the male are most highly specialized, the males 'swarm' and the female seeks the male."

Much of the general portion of the book is direct quotation, with due credit given, from various special papers, but these have been selected and interpreted in the light of so broad a knowledge of the group that this but adds to the value of the work. The biological discussion, especially, is rich in original observations and contains much that will be of the utmost value in the fight to control mosquitoes and the diseases they carry. The writers are careful to emphasize that they are entomologists, and not physicians or medical men, and that the portions dealing with the relation of mosquitoes to disease, with the diseases themselves, and with the causative organisms, are not the result of original investigations. An especially valuable original contribution to the morphology is Mr. R. E. Snodgrass's study and figure of the structure of the thorax of a mosquito. Based upon a broad comparative study of this region in insects, it may be accepted as authoritative.

In the section on food habits of adults it is pointed out that, while mosquitoes have engaged the attention of man largely through their bites, and, hence, have been thought to be blood-suckers as a group, this is far from being the case. "There are a great many species, perhaps more than half, which never suck blood at all, while others do so but rarely." Elsewhere in the text it is emphasized that much energy and money may be wasted in an effort to eradicate species which are in reality harmless to man. The moot question as to whether males suck blood seems to be effectively disposed of by pointing out that some of the mouth parts are absent or greatly reduced in the male, and that for this reason it is unable to pierce the skin. The few authentic accounts of blood-sucking males probably refer to abnormal individuals in which the mouth parts are fully developed.

The earliest established case of disease propagated by mosquitoes was that of the transmission of various species of Filaria, small parasitic worms which live in the blood of man and animals and are supposed to be at least one of the causes of the tropical disease, elephantiasis. Then followed the demonstration of the rôle of the mosquito in the transmission of malaria, yellow fever, and dengue. The part played by the insect in the transmission of these diseases is an absolutely essential one. In the case of typhoid fever and certain other diseases, the house-fly has been of late much featured as an agent in the spread of the germs, but it serves purely as an accidental carrier. Exterminate all of the house-flies and the disease would still exist and be disseminated by other agencies, such as polluted water, or milk, or contact. Even the bubonic plague may be transmitted otherwise than by the flea, its normal carrier. But the mosquito serves as the host in which is undergone a part of the life-cycle of the particular disease-producing organism carried. Exterminate all of the mosquitoes of a certain group and malaria would be absolutely stamped out; exterminate certain others and yellow fever would no longer exist. It is this which has placed the fight against the mosquito on a very different plane from that against the house-fly, or certain other insects. An extensive bibliography and well-prepared index close volume one.

Volume two is made up of plates. Of these there are a hundred and fifty, illustrating important systematic characters of adults, larvæ, pupæ, and eggs. Not only are they accurate, but they meet an artistic standard rarely exemplified in such work. Naturally, there are omissions and debatable statements, but this is not the place for a detailed discussion of technical points. One is surprised to find no reference to the moot question of parthenogenesis of mosquitoes, and the omission of Keilogg's and of Lühe's notes on the subject. Metalnikoff's interesting work on the pericardial cells of mosquito larvæ is overlooked and Lankester's ancient theory that these structures in insects are of the nature of gangiion ceils is rehabilitated, though in a quoted section.

Charles Greene Rockwood, professor emeritus of mathematics at Princeton since 1905, died last week at Caldweli, N. J. Professor Rockwood was born in New York in 1843, and graduated from Yale in 1864, receiving his Ph.D. degree from the same institution in 1866. He was professor of mathematics and astronomy at Rutgers College from 1873 to 1877, and professor of mathematics at Princeton from 1877 to 1905. He was a member of many scientific societies, American and foreign, and contributed a number of articles on seismology to the American Journal of Science and other periodicals.

Drama and Music

A biographical and criticai study of Piêrre du Ryer, the French dramatist of the seventeenth century, by Henry Carrington Lancaster, professor of Romance languages in Amherst College, has been published by the Carnegie Institution of Washington. It is a work of notable industry and scholarship, which will be of great value to the student of the foundations of the French classic stage, although it is not likeiy to prove very attractive to the ordinary reader. It is the resuit of eonscientious research in the libraries of Paris and the British Museum. In its references to both ancient and modern sources, its carefui analysis and comparison of disputed dates and accumulation of scattered details concerning the character, circumstances, influence, and reputation of the playwright, it is admirabie. Du Ryer experienced his fuil share of the vicissitudes of fortune. After basking in royai favor, tasting the fruits of literary success, and triumphing over Corneiiie in an election to the Academy, he feli upon evii days and for years earned a precarious living by transiations, which, if they added somewhat to his literary renown, scarcely provided him with bread. But he was biessed in his domestic reiations, and of his iife Professor Lancaster makes an interesting story. Unfortunateiy, he is less happy in dealing with the plays to whose consideration the great buik of his book is devoted. His descriptions of Du Ryer's earlier and later works, which he groups under the generai head of tragic-comedies, are exceedingly diffuse, muddled, and indiscriminating. The simpie truth is that most of these productions are the crudest of romantic melodramas, without any dramatic significance or vaiue whatsoever. Whatever virtue they possess is iiterary. He is more successfui, however, in dealing with the tragedies—"Lucrèce," "Aicionée," "Saül," "Esther," "Scévoie" (Scævola), and "Themistoclée"—upon which the fame of Du Ryer now chiefly reposes. In these the stories, following ciassicai iines and making lesser demands upon dramatic invention, which was not the writer's strong point, are much simpler and more easiiy analyzed. In his purely literary observation Professor Lancaster is acute and sane and his knowledge of his subject is clearly demonstrated in his remarks upon the estabiishment of the French classic style, Du Ryer's contribution to the fabric, and his relative position to Corneiiie. The book would have been twice as effective if it had been half as long, but it is a treasury of fact.

The "Denys of Auxerre," of James Barton (London: Christophers), a play founded upon the story in the "Imaginary Portraits" of Waiter Pater, is a redoubtable piece of poetical workmanship. But from the theatre it is barred by its confused and arbitrary construction, its blend of the mystiicai and the naturai, and the doiefui nature of its philosophy. The scene is in Auxerre in the thirteenth century, and the theme is the tragedy, actuai and spirituai, brought about by a clash between pagan and more modern religious ideals. Denys, the hero of a Bacchic mask, with all the fascination of the youthful Dionysus, has, by virtue of his personal charm and his Epicurean doctrine, become the idoi of the populace and scandalized the church. Moreover he has won the love of Ariane, the daughter of the Duke, and so incurred the antagonism of her father and her military lover Phiiip. When his foiiowers make a demonstration in his favor, the soidiery is iet ioose upon them and many of them are slain. Tempest and other portents foiiow, and a weird scene is enacted in the cathedrai, where the bishop, to appease divine wrath, sets the people to tearing up the grave-stones, to find the bones of the patron saint and put them on the high altar. From one of the sepulchres Denys appears, raving mad, and is saved from capture by a miraculous vision. When he is caught soon afterward by the vengeful Philip he is again rescued, this time by wolves, his old forest friends, and ministers. Sheitered by a monk repentant of former persecutions, he finds soiace in music, recovers his wits, and studies Christian dogmas, which are powerless to convince or console him. Robbed of the joy of life, and harassed by new conceptions of morai responsibiiity, he is hopeiessiy distraught, eraving oniy knowiedge of the truth. Even Ariane, who visits him, cannot rouse him from his despair. Fleeing from her, he has a vision of the nether world, where Nephthis reviews the rise and decay of successive creeds and prociaims the inevitable resolution of ail things into the primai dust. In his final phase, seeing no hope except in blind faith, love, and sacrifice, he courts contagion as a ieper, and in that guise returns to Auxerre on a festival day, and there is pitiiessiy beaten to death by a mob of his former worshippers. His epitaph is spoken by the Duke, who says: "Oh, Life, he would have spelied some syiiabie of meaning in thee, but the light failed."

The dramatic weaknesses of such a tale, even when it is regarded as prose romance, are sufficientiy obvious. The dreary agnosticism, and biunt disregard of reiigious obsessions would be fatal, even if the scenic arrangement were more manageabie. But the poetic excellence of the work and the interest of the story make it fascinating reading. The scenes of Bacchic reveiry are written in ciassic verse, and the incidental choruses and love passages are fuil of spirit and meiody. Much picturesque imagination is displayed in the grewsome cathedral episode and in all the later adventures of Denys. Especiaiiy striking are the passionate harangue with which, recaiiing the freedom of the woods and hiils, he finaiiy deciares his inabiiity to accept happiness in monastic bonds, and the fanatical outburst with which he ciings to faith, after the chiiiing visions of Nephthis. In iiterary quaiity this piece stands conspicuous among poetic plays of recent date.

Next season wiii see an addition to the number of chamber-music organizations in this city, the Phiiharmonic Ensemble. It wiii include five of the ieading players of the violin family, besides a French-horn player, and the ieading wood-wind quartet, aii of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Severai weii-known soioists are in the list, which inciudes Henri Leon LeRoy, the soio clarinet of the Phiiharmonic Society; A. Fayer, the first flute; August Messnard, the prominent French bassoonist, who joins the Phiiharmonic Orchestra next season; Xaver Reiter, the French-horn soloist of the Philharmonic. And Leopoid Kramer, the society's concertmeister, will be among the members of the Ensemble. The literature for this combination of instruments inciudes many interesting compositions very rarely heard in America.

Paderewski wiii be heard on Aprii 1 with the Phiiadeiphia Orchestra, for whose next season the ambitious, energetic, and admirabie Mr. Stokowsky is preparing a fine set of programmes. Other soioists, to be heard during the winter, are Fritz Kreisler, Louise Homer, Josef Hofmann, Bonarios, Grimson, Teresa Carreño, Camille Zwecker, Mischa Eiman, Horatio Connell, Haroid Bauer, Thaddeus Rich, Wilheim Bachaus, Juiia Culp, Herman Sandby, Cari Fieseh, Katharine Goodson, Schumann-Heink, and Kathieen Pariow.

Stuttgart has just had a Swedish music festivai, designed to give an impression of the present condition of the tonal art in Sweden. Apart from the eminent violinist, Henri Marteau, all the participants were from that country, and so was the music, the composers represented being Stenhammar, Tor Aulin, Sjögren, Alfven, Peterson-Berger, Natanael, Berg, Anton Andersen, and Andreas Hailen, whose opera, "Waidemar's Treasure," had its first German performance on this occasion. The best-known of the Swedish singers heard at the festival were the baritone, John Forsell, and the students' choir of Upsala.

Alberto Franchetti, whose "Germania" was produced at the Metropolitan a few seasons ago, with sumptuous scenery and Caruso to help it out, and whose "Cristoforo Colombo" is to be staged in Chicago next season, is now at work on still another opera, the first scene of which is completed. it is to be called "Notte di ieggenda," and is based on the usual style of blood-and-thunder story. In the last scene the soprano shoots the tenor and then becomes a raving maniac.

The Minneapolis Orchestra, during the season just ended, played in fifty-two cities situated in twelve States and one Canadian province. Altogether 109 concerts were given, at which 139 compositions were played. To these, 42 numbers were added by seven soloists.

Londoners regard themselves as most fortunate in having as chief conductor of the Italian operas at Covent Garden this summer Signor Polacco, who also won so much admiration at our Metropolitan last season. They have found his readings of Puccini's operas a revelation, and we know on this side of the water that in "Aïda" he rivals the brilliant Toscanini. It is gratifying to know that Polacco will conduct "Madeleine," the Victor Herbert opera accepted for performance at the Metropolitan next winter, an opera of which he has a high opinion.

If Wagner came back to-day he would be astonished at some of the things that are done with his works. While Paris, once so hostile to him, is looking forward to three rival "Parsifals" next winter, London is to have its first taste of that music drama in the shape of moving pictures. With the full sanction of Frau Cosima, it is said, and with so eminent a man as Sir Henry Wood to conduct the orchestra, there will be presented at the Coliseum a series of tableaux representing incidents and scenes in "Parsifal," such as the killing of the swan, the ejection of Parsifal, Klingsor hurling the spear, Parsifal in the hall of the Grail, etc. Perhaps this enterprise was suggested by the remarkable success of another series of moving pictures started in London a few weeks ago, illustrating romantic incidents in Wagner's life.

It was announced some months ago that Maurice Renaud was to create the part of Amfortas in "Parsifal" at the Paris opera, but it is also understood that he is to open Oscar Hammerstein's New York opera house in November as Don Quichotte, using a revised version specially made for him by Massenet shortly before his death.

Art

THE ART OF ILLUSTRATION.

General dissatisfaction has been expressed with the state of book and magazine illustration to-day. Yet when discussion is narrowed down to the work of the individual illustrator, criticism usually consists mainly in pointing out particular instances where he has erred in petty details of the hero's or the heroine's personal appearance, the style of their attire, or their relative positions under interesting circumstances. In other words, while the illustrator is constantly reminded that he is, after all, an artist, his pictures are still frankly regarded as a mere gloss on the text and are appraised accordingly. It rarely seems to occur to any one that there may be a connection between these two things, and that one important reason why illustration does not attain a higher artistic standard is just because it is so rigidly subjected to a purely literary standard. When virtually the only question ever asked concerning a set of illustrations is: "Do they illustrate?" the illustrator himself can hardly be blamed for failing to take his work with sufficient seriousness.

The real difficulty with such work, on the whole, is, not that it does not illustrate enough, but that it illustrates, if anything, too much—that is, that it does little else but illustrate. "Illustration must elucidate the text or adorn it; it may do both, but at all events it must be in harmony with the text," writes Mr. Weitenkampf in his recent book on "American Graphic Art." By "harmony" he does not mean to censure "the occasional lapse on the part of the artist, the oversight that produces an unwarranted change in the appearance of a character, or an anachronism in costume, or the construction of a scene differently from the author's description. Such matters," he asserts, "may be left to the letter-writing reader of 'literary supplements,' who will be sure to air his discovery in his paper. Our illustration has suffered not so much from such mistakes as from a tendency to parade cleverness in place of thoroughness, to dazzle the eye by a display of glittering superficiality." What Mr. Weitenkampf has in mind is something rather psychological than objective, and his protest is directed primarily against the practice of employing the same popular model for a whole range of widely divergent types of character. But when he says that "consideration of present-day illustration must be based on the principles of the art," more even is implied than this question of psychological truth.

For one of the first of these principles is that an illustration is a picture, and that it must therefore be treated and regarded as such, with proper attention to draughtsmanship, values, and decorative design. It is this last that principally suffers through the necessity of making a drawing meet the exigencies of any given scene—of telling the story precisely as the author has told it, and in the most dramatically effective manner. It is not that this demand is not in itself a perfectly just one, although the notion of drama is too often and too narrowly associated with scenes of violent action; but that in making it there is a tendency to neglect everything else, and even to feel that such neglect is essential to the achievement of popular success. The illustrators themselves share this feeling, and are inclined to resent any suggestions of a higher synthesis in their art. There was once an art editor who had the ingenuousness to frame and hang in his office half a dozen photographic reproductions of seventeenth-century Dutch genre pictures and offer them as models of what illustration might properly aspire to attain. The only result was to make him the laughing stock and the byword of nearly the whole illustrative fraternity.

Perhaps there is, indeed, something to be said against such efforts to elevate illustration all at once to so high a level. Almost as many bad results come from over-ambition as from lack of ambition on the part of the young artist. Seeing a slight sketch in wash of a woman's head by an illustrator whose elaborate pictorial compositions were notoriously overwrought and labored, another art editor exclaimed: "If only he wouldn't ever try to do any more than just that!" To ask such an artist for a "picture" is to make him strive to carry his work to a point beyond his powers. The truth is that few of our present illustrators can compass satisfactorily more than a respectable sketch. This is as far as the brief and therefore necessarily superficial training of the ordinary art school takes them. Not, however, that this institution is wholly, or even principally, to blame. If there are classes in illustration it is because there is a demand for them, and not because directors and instructors believe that illustration can be taught without the same thoroughness required by any other branch of art—can, indeed, be taught at all as a separate branch. They do their best in the short time at their disposal, and with the rather unpromising material they have to work with. For the present imperative demand for immediate instruction in illustration comes mainly from young men and women actuated less by a genuine interest in art than by the promise of large and prompt profits on graduation. Thus our illustrators to-day are recruited from a totally different class from that of the men who made American illustration what it has been in the past, and who, for the most part, after a thorough training, as painters primarily, only gradually drifted into working for reproduction.

If our illustrative art of the present is decidedly inferior to what it was twenty, or even ten, years ago, in spite of so much sheer talent and cleverness currently displayed, it is because, while there are still honest and workmanlike men in the field, they are nearly swamped by the hordes of the half-trained and, worse still, unscrupulous illustrators whose sole ambition is to make money easily, spend it freely, and ride about in big motor cars. And as the final choice between the two classes lies with the larger public, which shows little discrimination in such matters, the better men tend inevitably to be forced from a field which grows constantly more uncongenial in the demands it makes, and the competitive conditions it imposes. Thus illustration forms to-day merely a transition stage for most artists who practice it. And, instead of painters becoming illustrators as before, we have now the spectacle of the ablest men starting in to paint as soon as they are pecuniarily able to do so. Of course, there are other conditions which have combined to bring about this change, which would be bound to occur inevitably, and to a greater or lesser extent, in any case. The art situation is radically different in America to-day from what it was twenty years ago, and there are now many more rewards for the native painter, part of whose earlier tendency to drift into illustration is to be explained by his failure to find a paying or appreciative public in any other way.

But there will always be some men better fitted for illustration than for anything else, and willing to devote themselves to a kind of work which has opportunities and possibilities of its own, though so seldom recognized. What ought to be possible is to conserve and consolidate such talent in its own special channels, and to assure it such recognition and hope of reward that a band of trained illustrators might be formed for the development of the art of the illustrated book and magazine beyond any point that it has heretofore reached. So far, while there are isolated workers here and there, there are few indications of the formation of any such band. Indeed, under present conditions, there is little to encourage idealistic enterprise in this field. And yet it would need the active coöperation of but one or two magazines or publishing houses to afford an ample basis for important and far-reaching reforms. Thus it seems a pity that, in the present movement urging the illustrated magazine to pass over into the category of the unillustrated, there has not as yet appeared one audacious experimenter willing to stop half-way with a magazine in which the pictures should be employed with sobriety and restraint as a legitimate source of embellishment and interest, and no longer merely as a means of intensifying the shrill shriek of sensational fiction, or of dazzling "the eye by a display of glittering superficiality."

W. A. Bradley.

Finance

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

In all the voluminous reminiscences of the great battle of the Civil War, which was fought just half a century ago, little or nothing has been said of what was happening behind the armies—at Philadelphia, which Lee himself believed that he might capture; at New York, where the network of trade communications centred which the Confederate army was breaking, and where the Stock Exchange was registering the market's view of the fortunes of the nation. Yet dramatic chapters of history are enacted in such places at such times. Every one knows Thackeray's extraordinary picture of the events at Brussels on the eve of Waterloo, and every one wishes he knew exactly what was going on at Belgrade and Sofia when the Balkan troops first met the Turkish army, last October.

Profound discouragement had settled on the Northern people, and profound depression on their financial markets, after the disastrous defeat at Chancellorsville in May. Early in June, however, stocks had risen and gold had fallen. There was talk of a "rebel invasion of the North," but nobody took it seriously. All at once, on June 16, the newspaper headlines told the startled Philadelphians and New Yorkers that Lee had crossed into Pennsylvania, had captured Chambersburg, and was probably now moving on Harrisburg or Philadelphia.

Gold rose from 143 to 150, and the news which kept coming in was not of a character to allay misgiving. One of Lee's columns threatened Harrisburg; another turned eastward; the Governor of Pennsylvania issued this proclamation:

> To the People of Pennsylvania:
> If you do not wish to bear the ignominy of shirking, come forward at once! Close your places of business and apply your hearts to the work. Come in such organizations as you can form.

The Mayor of Philadelphia thus addressed his people:

> In view of the urgent need for instant action, to protect the capital of your State and secure the safety of your homes, I do hereby earnestly appeal to all citizens to close their places of business, and connect themselves without delay with the existing military organizations, for the defence of the city.

All this was patriotic, though just a bit hysterical. But it reflected the mood of the day, which reached its climax in an outburst of excitement when captured Richmond newspapers were brought in, with editorial assurances that Gen. Lee was about to set on fire the coal fields of Pennsylvania. From such a mental state, reaction is always bound to follow; it came on June 18, when the city and the Stock Exchange had the story that the Confederate army was withdrawing. The Tribune editorially announced: "It seems almost certain that there are no rebels in force in the State of Pennsylvania." Markets rose; gold fell from 150 to 143; the strain was apparently over.

This second mood continued a full week, until June 25, when some very formidable news arrived. Lee's entire army was certainly in the State, and advancing rapidly. At Harrisburg, a dispatch reported, "during the whole of last night, long trains of wagons, laden with goods and household furniture, were entering the city," and at the same time, "many merchants here are packing their goods for shipment, and people are crowding the trains for New York and Philadelphia." On June 26, the dispatches from the front reported Lee at Gettysburg, Meade approaching, and a great battle imminent. By the 29th, freight trains stopped coming east over the Pennsylvania Railroad, and all business at Philadelphia was suspended. A panic followed in Baltimore, which expected immediate capture if the Union army was defeated. On July 1 the three-day fight began.

It is an interesting fact that, from the moment the battle of Gettysburg actually began, the New York stock market advanced and gold declined. Perhaps this reflected relief on the part of people who had been apprehensive that Lee's advance northward would not be opposed. In 1863, the 3d of July fell on Friday. For that reason, news of the furious contest of the 3d, of Pickett's charge, of its disastrous failure, and of Lee's retreat, came to New York in curiously fragmentary form. Even the morning papers of the 4th did not realize what a stupendous victory Meade had won, and on Sunday, the 5th, no newspapers were published.

The full story was not told to the North until Monday, July 6. What was hardly less singular was the manner in which the Vicksburg news arrived. The schoolbooks give the impression that the news of Lee's defeat, and of the fall of the great Confederate stronghold on the Mississippi, came simultaneously to an exultant Northern people on Independence Day. Pemberton did, in fact, surrender Vicksburg to Grant on July 4; but the wires were down, communication slow, and as late as July 6 the New York papers were publishing news of the continued siege of Vicksburg. Only on the 7th of July did the public learn what had actually happened there.

In the midst of the general rejoicing of the public in the North, gold fell from 138 to 132, but the Stock Exchange greeted the news, both from Gettysburg and Vicksburg, with a general decline. Financial reviewers, even in that early day, called it "realizing on good news." Yet one may wonder, in the light of subsequent events, whether the alert mind of the stock market may not instantly have taken its cue from the intimation in the dispatches even of July 6, that Meade was neglecting to pursue Lee's broken army, and that missing his chance of dealing the final blow, the war was destined to last nearly two years longer.

Prokosch's German for Beginners

By EDUARD PROKOSCH, Assistant Professor in the University of Wisconsin. xiii+336 pp. 12mo. $1.00.

This is constructed on the same general plan as the author's successful Introduction to German, which bases the work on a graded series of German texts in Part I, but it is altogether a new book and is intended for a younger class of students. The reading matter has been simplified, the lesson divisions are shorter, and the relation of Text and Exercise is made clearer and more striking by printing them on opposite pages.

Giese's Graded French Method

By W. F. GIESE, Associate Professor in the University of Wisconsin. ix+438 pp. 12mo. $1.15.

A new method based upon simple graded reading selections repeated and varied until mastered. The selections are quite unhackneyed. The elements of French Grammar are developed from the reading material in due order and very gradually, so as to involve no knowledge of matter not treated in previous chapters. Reading can be carried on from the very first day with some ease and rapidity.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF

Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of the Nation (1865-1906)

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait. Price $1.50 net, postpaid.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait. It likewise preserves the notable letter of appreciation addressed to Mr. Garrison by more than two hundred contributors to the Nation on the completion of his fortieth year of service, and his acknowledgment thereof.

Suggestions for the Interpretation of Human Life

By D. E. PHILLIPS, Head of the Department of Psychology and Education in the University of Denver.

An interesting treatment of psychology connected as a science with life and conduct. Among the chapters that touch on problems of contemporary interest are Suggestion and Mental Healing, Magic and Spiritualism, Relation of Psychology to Evolution, Problems of Heredity and Environment, Social Psychology, and Psychology in Literature and Art.

Feeling, instinct, imitation, habit, etc., are presented simply and treated as the springs of human conduct and the basis for explaining the more formal and technical part of psychology.

While the book is admirably adapted for an introductory course in high schools, normal schools, and colleges, it also provides interesting material for teachers and reading circles or for the general reader.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 17, 1913.

The Week

It is not surprising, but it is extremely gratifying, that an understanding was reached at the White House conference on Monday which assures the submission to arbitration of the question raised by the demands of the trainmen and conductors on the Eastern railways. The situation was one peculiarly favorable to such an understanding, and President Wilson showed his usual promptness and quiet decision in taking the step necessary to bring it about. The passing of the Newlands bill to amend the Erdman act was the one thing needed, and the only danger lay either in Congressional delay or in the terms of the bill not being satisfactory to the two sides in the dispute. Both these points were satisfactorily covered. The modifications unwisely pressed by Secretary Wilson have been abandoned, and the bill, almost exactly as originally drawn under the auspices of the National Civic Federation, was immediately passed by both House and Senate. For the great public benefit that has thus been obtained, thanks are specially due to Seth Low, president of the Federation, who has been unremitting in his efforts to bring about this amendment of the law. But for the fact that the ground had been so well prepared—not only in the drafting of the bill, but in the good understanding concerning it which had been established on all sides before it was sent to Congress—this opportunity for averting a colossal and calamitous strike might not have been open to the President or the country.

How can there be truth in these rumors of a "split" in the Progressive party? Is social justice divisible? Can there be two Armageddons? The evidence offered of lack of agreement between mighty Progressive minds does not seem to us at all conclusive. It may be that Mr. Amos Pinchot feels that George W. Perkins is not exactly the man to be turned loose on the Trusts, or to cry havoc to monopolies, and that he would like some more root-and-branch method. But what does this signify? While the teacher is away the children will play. It would be merely necessary for the Colonel to emerge from the Grand Canyon, rebuke quarrelling Amos and George, and instantly the Progressive party would again be one and indivisible and in the Colonel's pocket.

There may be nice question whether the New York Legislature ought to have removed Judge Cohalan, on the charges and evidence presented against him. We can readily believe that an honest Senator or Assemblyman, duly sensitive, too, on the subject of judicial purity, might conscientiously doubt whether the Cohalan case came under the intent of the Constitutional provision for removal of judges of the Supreme Court. It is that they may be removed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the Legislature, if two-thirds of all the members vote for it; but it is added that no judge must be removed "except for cause." This "cause" had presumably to do with the Judge's behavior when he was a judge and as a judge. It must have contemplated judicial corruption or gross impropriety on the bench or scandalous personal conduct on the part of a judge. This being so, we must hesitate to affirm that the Legislature should have removed Judge Cohalan. Few culpable acts touching him in his judicial capacity were proved. True, it was as a judge that he gave a sorry exhibition when the charges were made public, that he had meekly acceded to the demand made in the most insulting letter—terribly insulting if not true—that any judge can ever have received from a responsible lawyer, and that he finally made a public statement which the Bar Association declared to be "untrue and misleading." All these things are fearfully humiliating to a judge of the Supreme Court, but it may, we admit, fairly be argued that they alone were not enough to warrant the Legislature in putting him off the bench.

It is seldom that the responsibility for a railway accident is put so squarely on the shoulders of the company's management as is done by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its report on the recent Stamford disaster. For that report goes far beyond the mere statement that the engineman of the second section of the passenger express, who caused the collision by running past the signals, "did not have the special experience and instruction required for the operation of such a train." That this should have happened, even in one individual instance, would be a serious matter; but the Commission not only declares that there was "negligence on the part of the corporation" in putting in charge of such a train "an engineman inexperienced and uninstructed in this class of work," but expressly states that the New Haven Company "had no reliable method for determining the capacity of enginemen before placing them in charge of high-speed passenger trains." Thus the Stamford disaster is unmistakably taken out of the category of those things that are sometimes conveniently dismissed from mind as "acts of God," and emphatically laid to the charge of a standing defect in the road's management of the gravest character. And in addition to this standing neglect, relating to the selection of the enginemen, another is set down, having reference to the condition of the locomotives:

> This railroad has no proper system of checking work reports so as to determine whether or not defects reported on locomotives are actually repaired. This lack of supervision is dangerous, and it ought not to be permitted to continue.

The New Haven Company has issued a reply in which it attempts to break the force of that part of the Commission's censure which relates to the qualifications of the engineman. "The Interstate Commerce Commission," it says, "fails to state that the employment of this engineer was practically forced upon the New Haven Railroad by the engineers of this company." And it goes on to cite the terms of an agreement entered upon between the engineers and the company relating to the employment of spare engineers. As a defence on the part of the company, this is puerile. In the first place, the language of the agreement appears to be quite broad enough to permit the exercise of any precautions that may be necessary to insure efficiency and safety; it makes reference both to competency and to the "requirements of the service." And in the second place, if the agreement is not to be so understood—if it is an agreement that prevents the company from taking such measures as are demanded for the safety of its passengers—the company was guilty of criminal dereliction of duty in entering into it at all. We believe, and have heretofore so stated, that the question whether and to what extent trade-union pressure interferes with the proper working of the railways is one that the Commission should thoroughly investigate; but it is impossible, upon any view of it, to relieve the New Haven Company of responsibility for such a condition of things as is pointed out in the Commission's report. As the report itself says—apparently anticipating the company's reply:

> The determination of the ability, fitness, or qualifications of an engineman is the duty of the railroad itself. It was not delegated to any other organization, nor could it be so delegated. It was neither delegated nor performed. It was neglected.

Gov. Foss's announced determination to transfer to Canada part of the operations of the machinery-manufacturing company which he controls will hardly of itself create a tremendous stir in the country, or cause Congress to shrink back appalled from the passing of the tariff bill whose prospective enactment appears to have been the drop that caused the cup of Mr. Foss's troubles to overflow. And the fiery broadside with which he accompanies the announcement is of such a character as to mitigate, rather than enhance, with level-headed men the effect of the announcement itself. He tells us that there has been "going on for many years," all over the United States, "among the principal manufacturers" a movement towards the establishment of plants in Canada, and that this has resulted in the investment in these Canadian plants of "from three to five hundred million dollars of American capital." Well, if all this is so, it looks as if we had been able to stand the thing pretty well, doesn't it? And as to what is going to happen in the future, Mr. Foss's warning cry would have more chance of creating the terror it is meant to excite if it were a little less shrill and hysterical. "If we are to continue to meet our foreign obligations," he declares, "pay for foodstuffs and raw materials imported, and avoid actual national bankruptcy, an expanded market for American manufactures is absolutely imperative." Mr. Foss doesn't pretend that lowering the tariff, even without reciprocity, will diminish our sales of manufactures in foreign markets, which have been growing by leaps and bounds; and the man that can talk about something having to be done to stimulate those sales in order to "avoid national bankruptcy" is simply indulging in ignorant and sensational rant.

It always takes time after a Legislature adjourns for any one to find out just what it did. Even the members do not know. Pennsylvania now learns that its wise men at Harrisburg appropriated nearly $90,000,000 for the next two years, while the estimated receipts for the period fall $27,000,000 short of that sum. The duty of making both ends meet having thus been jauntily ignored by the legislators, Gov. Tener must attend to it. He has the power of vetoing separate items, the Legislature apparently reasoned. Accordingly, members got the largest appropriations they could for charitable and other institutions, private as well as public, in their respective districts, so that, even after the Governor's knife had gone through the bill, something might be left. This is legislation upon the principle of the buckster who puts a high price upon his wares, expecting to be forced to lower it.

A movement to "recall" Judge Lindsey illustrates the topsy-turvy condition of our politics since last August. The recall, it is to be remembered, is meant for the enemies of the people. "Ben" Lindsey is on the side of the people. His picturesque and vigorous language at the Chicago Convention proved that. Only Heney rivalled him in this display of innate patriotism. Yet there are women in Denver who are planning to ask Lindsey some questions, and to invoke the sacred instrument of the recall if he does not answer satisfactorily. They declare that the conduct of his court is "loose"; that he lets offenders of certain kinds off with light sentences. It is also charged that the juries of his famous juvenile court are not guarded as they should be. Instances are mentioned in which the jury, failing to come to an agreement, exchanged notes with the judge, after which a verdict was speedily handed up. This, it is thought by some in Denver, does not look well. Hitherto, Judge Lindsey has regularly triumphed over his enemies, and these triumphs have generally been regarded as victories for decency. It is to be hoped that he can vindicate himself now, and thus escape being hoist with the Progressive petard.

The discovery that noise is not a necessity may turn out to be one of the great achievements of the twentieth century. So long as racket was thought an indispensable element of progress, we minimized its evils. But now we are finding that it causes more harm than even discomfort. Indianapolis has begun a campaign for greater quiet. The point insisted upon there—as it has also been in this city—is the bad effect of noise upon the schools. The report of a wide investigation just concluded says that good work under present conditions is possible only if the windows are closed; that is, at the price of health. The committee further declares that 85 per cent. of the noises in the neighborhood of school buildings are capable of being abated. It suggests the creation of "zones of quiet," the repaving of certain streets with noise-absorbing material, the location of school buildings with reference to immunity from disturbance. As soon as we care as much about doing away with unnecessary noise as we care about the things for the sake of having which we endure the noise, our cities will be revolutionized.

Efforts to limit the suffrage in South Carolina to "white men of intelligence and character" meet peculiar difficulties. To exclude all negroes, regardless of intelligence and character, was easy. The test of literacy, or owning three hundred dollars' worth of property, shut out the bulk of them, while admitting most of the white men. The latter were further provided for by solicitude for "the heroes of the '60's," and for all other white men who became of age before January 1, 1898, all of whom had the opportunity of registering under the "special temporary 'understanding' clause" of the Constitution of 1895. The few deserving white men not thus taken care of must, as a defender of the law remarks, be young, with time to learn to read and write. For "many a negro learned as much after emancipation"! Yet what do we see? The ungrateful white man who happens to be illiterate calmly goes to the primary and assists in the selection of candidates, and his better educated fellows go to the polls a few weeks later and ratify his and their choice. Thus "the rising generation are encouraged to lack of ambition to excel the negro"! Apparently, nothing remains, after all this endeavor to rouse the illiterate white man to his duty, except to take away from him the right to participate in the primary.

Tuesday of last week was Count Zeppelin's seventy-fifth birthday, which he celebrated in the happiest fashion by steering his twentieth airship on her maiden voyage. Germany has lost none of her enthusiasm for this conqueror of the air. Every city has a Zeppelinstrasse or Zeppelinplatz; his movements are chronicled like those of royalty; his picture is in every shop-window. His recent flight to Vienna gave rise to another outburst of national pride, for Germany still leads all the world in lighter-than-air craft, even though a French dirigible has flown higher and faster than any Zeppelin thus far. But every new Zeppelin craft is an improvement upon its predecessor, and the Count loses none of his fondness for new ventures. He is a veteran of our own Civil War, yet the Berlin newspapers reported two weeks ago that his last visit to that city was due to a desire to consult with the Government in regard to a flight across the Atlantic to the United States. If he really puts his mind upon it we may yet see him sailing into New York.

On this side of the water few have any conception of the development of this branch of aerial transportation. The cable brought the news last week of the founding of a British company to start a dirigible service between London and Manchester and other cities, and also between London and Paris. In Germany the Zeppelin Company has ships at Berlin, Hamburg, Leipzig, and Baden-Baden which make almost daily flights —one of them reported one hundred successive air voyages last summer without the slightest mishap of any kind. A month ago a navy Zeppelin, with a naval crew, left Berlin at 12:30 o'clock on a moonlight night, cruised to Hamburg, and then out to the island of Rügen in the North Sea; returning to the coast it came down on the water and lay there for half an hour. On rising, it roamed about the coast, and then, flying back, reached Berlin in comfort and ease at 7:30 o'clock. So remarkable an annihilation of space as this is now deemed worthy of only a few lines in the Berlin newspapers. Inevitably, one wonders what such a ship will not be capable of in another six years—it is but six since Zeppelin made his first successful flights in the Zeppelin III. Shall we be hearing then of round-the-world competitions?

When education is modernized in England, it is done in the most conservative stronghold. Old Etonians have remarked with amazement the report that the boys liked their lessons! As the Headmaster of Harrow pointed out recently at speech-day, new ideas have made the past year noteworthy. Besides more elective courses, the curriculum is changed. "In teaching English the boys are set one serious book, and also such a volume as Jefferies's 'Gamekeeper at Home.' If they once start the 'bait book' as a lesson, they finish it voluntarily, and so acquire soon a taste for literature." American teachers would see nothing new in this idea, nor in making mathematics practical, not experimental, or emphasizing living over dead languages. And if the change requires a new version of Shakespeare's schoolboy creeping sluggishly to school, another result also is familiar here. "A great many boys wish to specialize in science, till the science school is full; and the number in modern branches is steadily increasing."

Passage of the Irish Home Rule bill for the second time serves to fix attention afresh upon the actual working of the Parliament Act. Under it, the Commons will simply need to pass the bill a third time, and then it will become law without the consent of the House of Lords. That cannot occur, however, until about a year from now; for the Parliament Act provides that, in the case of bills made law despite the objection of the Lords, two years must have elapsed from the date of the second reading of the bill on its first passage through the Commons. That date was, in the case of the Home Rule bill, May 9, 1912. It is also necessary to send the bill to the Lords, on each occasion of its passing, at least one month before the end of the session. Compliance with these two conditions is expected to make the earliest day on which the King can give his consent to the bill, notwithstanding the dissent of the Lords, about June 12, 1914. Thus it appears that the upper house retains full power of obstruction for rather more than two years.

Monday's statement by Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons, that there was no possibility of action by the Powers to force an armistice upon the warring Balkan states, and that they must fight on till exhausted, was probably not intended to be so pessimistic as it sounds. He may have intended it as a warning to Bulgaria to agree with her adversaries quickly, lest harder terms be exacted later. The actual military status is still confused. But there appears to be no doubt that the Bulgarian troops have met with terrible reverses at the hands both of the Servians and the Greeks. The earliest news, sent by Bulgaria's old stand-by, Lieut. Wagner, was of brilliant victories by the Bulgarian generals; but this was never confirmed, and now even at Sofia the best that can be said is that Gen. Ivanoff conducted a masterly retreat. But the correspondents with the Greek and Servian armies speak of this retreat as a disastrous rout. With Rumanian troops operating unopposed in Bulgarian territory, there can be no mistaking what has happened to Bulgarian military power. It has been badly broken just at the time when the German military experts were predicting that it would prove invincible. All their talk was of Bulgaria speedily making herself dominant in the Balkans, and becoming a veritable Grossmacht with which Russia would have to reckon. This is the second time within a year that the German army men have placed their money on the wrong horse. It will be remembered that they were confident that Turkey would show her military superiority.

BREAKING THE PROTECTION SPELL

The forces that have gone to the creation of the present tariff-reform situation in this country are many. Possibly the "high cost of living" is entitled to the foremost place. Perhaps next to this should be placed the connection between tariff protection and the promotion and sheltering of monopolies. But whatever may have been at the bottom of the change that has taken place in public sentiment, the thing that has been most distinctly visible, the thing that has expressly stirred the feelings of the people, is a certain moral element, an element that forms part of that whole vast stirring of reform impulses which has been manifested in so many ways during the past half-score years. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was drawn in the good old way, when the country was made to feel that, after all that had come and gone, the protected interests still regarded the fixing of tariff rates as a matter in which their desires came first and the claims of the mass of the people second, the demand for a genuine reform of the tariff acquired a potency that had been unknown since the days of the Cleveland campaign.

Accordingly, from the standpoint of American public sentiment, the break in the protectionist system that we are on the point of accomplishing presents itself chiefly in the light of emancipation from a sordid tyranny, the shaking off of an influence injurious to us economically and still more injurious to us as a source of political corruption and demoralization. But there is an additional aspect of the matter in which we may well take keen satisfaction. If the tariff reform now on the eve of consummation shall prove successful—if, whether owing to the nature of things or to favoring fortune, the country shall enjoy business prosperity during the next two or three years—there will be as much reason to rejoice in the breaking of the intellectual fetters with which protectionism had bound us as in our assertion of political soundness or in the material relief afforded by the reduction of tariff burdens. So rapid are the changes in the tone of political opinion, and so short is political memory apt to be, that it requires a distinct effort to recall the state of mind in which the country rested during about ten years after the protectionist policy regained its supremacy with the enactment of the Dingley bill. The concurrence of hard times with tariff reduction and of the return of prosperity with the return of high protection was as complete as circumstances could make it; and presently, even among persons who had formerly been quite hospitable to tariff reform, it came to be the habit to think of a high protectionist tariff as a permanently established part of our national policy. "You may argue tariff reduction till you are black in the face," such was the current view, "but the American people will have none of it. Better accept the accomplished fact, and don't disturb business for a thing that hasn't a ghost of a chance of ever being adopted."

But never is a long word; and in point of fact within the space of a dozen years there took place a change not only beyond what in the then prevailing opinion was possible, but a change far beyond anything that the most hopeful of tariff reformers could have looked for. When one realizes the character of that change it strikes one as almost ludicrous. For we are not only making a severe cut in the tariff, upon radical anti-protectionist principles, but the process is going through with so little protest that one is hardly aware that there is a protectionist party in the country. There will, of course, be some good old-time protectionist speeches in the Senate. There are a certain number of protectionist newspapers that are keeping up a line of talk against the bill, and predicting disaster as its consequence. But for anything like a great and powerful protest, anything even remotely suggesting that violence is being done to the settled sentiment of the nation, we look round in vain. That this state of mind will be lasting we do not assert; whether it will or not depends in no small measure on the accidents of economic conditions, agricultural and financial. But surely as things stand now, protection's long spell is broken.

This change in the attitude of our country towards protection is calculated to have a powerful effect beyond our own borders. For fifty years, the example of America has been one of the potent stimuli to protectionism in Europe. One of the greatest difficulties that have been encountered by English leaders in maintaining their country's splendid isolation among the great nations of Europe in the matter of free trade has lain in the fact that not only were the militarist nations of the European Continent committed to the protectionist policy, but that the great American Republic was the most extreme, and apparently the most irreclaimable, of the devotees of that policy. The manifest-destiny argument was one of the most telling in the whole of Mr. Chamberlain's collection of protectionist appeals; he was constantly insisting that the ideas of Cobden and Bright had been made obsolete by the logic of facts; all the world, except England, had turned its back on them, and it was mere stupidity for her to persist in the face at once of adversity at home under free trade and prosperity abroad under protection. The steadfastness of the free-traders soon had its reward in the demolition of one half of the Chamberlain argument by the return and persistent growth of business prosperity in England; but the other half, the apparently fixed committal of all the rest of the world to the protectionist doctrine, has remained. When our new tariff law is passed, opponents of protectionism throughout the world will be heartened, and in England the preservation of the free-trade principle will be further insured. The maintenance and success of the law will mark the first great break in that hold of protectionism among the leading nations of the world, other than England, which may be dated from Bismarck's adoption of the policy some forty years ago.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE ON TAXING COTTON FUTURES.

The Democratic Senate caucus having agreed to add to the tariff bill a clause taxing contracts for future delivery of cotton, evidently on the theory that it would be a popular measure, must be surprised at the volume of protests against it. These are coming in great numbers from the South, where the best newspapers and chambers of commerce and reputable business men seem to be of one mind on the folly of the proposal. The hasty Senators would have done well to look back to a similar project in 1892. In that year a scheme to tax futures and options was before the Senate, and its defeat was due in good part to a powerful speech against it by a Southern Senator. He was Senator from Louisiana. His name was Edward D. White. His strong contention that such a tax would be utterly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, has a certain significance to-day owing to the fact that he is at present Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court.

His Constitutional argument, twenty-one years ago, went to several points. The tax was discriminatory. It singled out certain products—the plan at that time was to tax futures in wheat and corn and pork and some other things—and omitted others. This would be even more forcible to-day, when it is proposed to tax cotton alone. Furthermore, it was pointed out by Senator (now Judge) White that the tax would be upon a form of contract which the courts had held to be valid. It was not a gambling transaction that was to be penalized. State courts and Federal courts—including the Supreme Court—had decided that contracts for future delivery were perfectly lawful, provided that either of the parties had "an honest intention to deliver." But the argument upon which Mr. White in 1892 laid most stress was that the proposed tax was a fraud on its face. It pretended to be a revenue measure. In reality it was a punitive statute. And what Senator White declared that the Supreme Court would do to such a bill, if it ever came before it, has great pertinence at a time when he is the presiding justice of that court. The language which he said that the judges would use to Congress when a measure taxing future contracts was challenged as being unconstitutional, was as follows:

> When you have called the statute one thing and the very terms of the statute indicate another thing, and that other thing is outside of the power of Congress, then it is not a statute at all, but a violation of authority, and we strike it from the statute books.

This is directly pertinent to the tax on cotton futures now proposed. It is offered as part of a bill "to provide revenue." But everybody knows that this is not the real intention. The purpose is to muict a certain form of trading. By so taxing contracts for future delivery of cotton that the dealer would have to pay $50 extra on a hundred bales, the intent is obvious to punish and abolish that established method of doing business. This was the aspect of the matter which most stirred Senator White's indignation as a lawyer, and which could hardly fail now to enter into any decision which he might have to make as a judge. He affirmed that, under the pretence of exercising the taxing power to raise money for carrying on the government, "we have breathed into this law a living lie," and "declared that our purpose is to tax for revenue, when every line and letter of the bill says that it is not an exercise of the taxing power at all, but an attempt to destroy." Mr. White discussed the tax on State bank notes, which the Supreme Court upheld, and also the oleomargarine tax, both of which, he maintained, could be discriminated from the tax on futures. What the Supreme Court would say to the latter, he put in words which would seriously embarrass any lawyer having to argue its Constitutionality before the present Chief Justice:

> Where the face of the statute shows no tax, where the face of the statute itself eliminates all human possibility of the exercise of the taxing power for revenue, then I say the mission of jurisdiction is given to the courts of this land to brush that statute away for its flagrant and open violation of the Constitution.

On the practical side, Mr. White's speech was powerful, and is still worth reading. He had fortified himself with knowledge of the entire development of the trade in cotton, and had the methods of buying and selling, with the history of prices, at his fingers' ends. He had no difficulty in showing that the system of cotton futures had been devised to meet pressing business exigencies, and that, on the whole, it had wrought great benefits, the chief of which had inured to the cotton-grower. The latter is no longer exposed to the old alternations of glutted and empty markets, but can count upon steady prices, based on actual crop conditions, with as much certainty as can traders and manufacturers. The whole question was, indeed, threshed out in Mr. White's speech in the Senate of July 21 and 22, 1892. It is just as true of the tax on cotton futures now as it was then that, in addition to being almost certainly unconstitutional, it is a proposal based on ignorance or prejudice. From the folly of having temporarily approved of it, the Democratic Senators should retreat as soon as and with what dignity they can.

THE TAX ON KNOWLEDGE.

The phrase, "the tax on knowledge," was originated by Bright and Gladstone some fifty years ago, when they were attacking and seeking to make odious the English paper duties. These were so high as to make the publication of newspapers very expensive. Anything like a cheap press was impossible; and as the only hope of success for the Liberal policies lay in the freest popular discussion, Bright and Gladstone struck hard at the tax which was most effective in preventing it. They were able first to reduce and finally to abolish the paper duties. Naturally, they were opposed and sneered at by Lord Robert Cecil, afterwards Lord Salisbury, then spokesman for the Tories. He asked what could possibly be learned by an educated person from a newspaper, and declared that it was a "prostitution" of terms to "talk of this tax on the penny papers as a tax on knowledge."

One would scarcely have expected to find American Democrats of 1913 sympathizing with the Tory view of 1854. Yet in one of the changes made by the Senate Democrats in the clauses of the tariff relating to books, there is displayed a reactionary spirit hostile to the freest possible diffusion of knowledge. We refer particularly to the proposal to lay a duty of 15 per cent. on books printed in foreign languages. Such books have been entitled to free importation for a great many years. Even the McKinley bill put on the free list "books and pamphlets printed exclusively in languages other than English." The Wilson bill retained that provision intact. So did the Dingley bill of 1897. In the Payne-Aldrich bill of 1909, the phraseology was changed so as to make it more liberal, the words being "printed chiefly in languages other than English." That form was kept in the Underwood bill as it passed the House, but it was stricken out by the Senate Finance Committee; so that, if it has its way, books in French and German and other foreign languages will be taken from the free list and made to pay the general duty of 15 per cent. on all books imported that were printed less than twenty years ago.

That this is a step backward needs no arguing. It would deprive the scholar of his tools, the book-lover of his satisfactions. And to what end? Is there here any question of a homo industry to protect? Books in foreign languages are not printed in this country to any appreciable extent. No; the duty must be intended for revenue, which means that it is a tax, and a tax on teachers and readers, a tax on knowledge. The Democratic Senators left in the bill the provision making Bibles free. They ought to take a free Bible and read in it the passage about the people perishing for lack of knowledge. Then they might ask themselves what the people will think of legislators who would levy a tax to make knowledge more difficult of access.

It is not necessary to spend words on this new tax. Indeed, it is so illiberal and so uncalled for that we are inclined to think that the Senate Committee was inadvertently betrayed into proposing it. For it is only fair to say that some of the other provisions of the bill relating to the importation of books are an improvement over anything we have had. In the first place, the duty is reduced. It has been 25 per cent. Even the Wilson bill of 1894—though doubtless against the personal wishes of its author—placed the duty at that figure. But now it is to be reduced to 15 per cent. This will mean a distinct gain to large classes of readers. Moreover, there is one generous and comprehensive clause added by the Democratic Senators. They put upon the free list "all textbooks used in schools and other educational institutions." This would, of course, cover books in any language, and would be a real boon to many. But such an enlightened provision only makes one wonder the more how those who framed it could have adopted so benighted a plan as that of clapping a tax on books in foreign languages. The thing cannot endure discussion; and we are very confident that, either by the Senate itself or at the demand of the House in conference committee, this proposed tax on knowledge will be dropped. It is inconceivable that President Wilson could give it countenance for a moment.

THE STATUE HABIT.

News came the other day of a proposal in Kansas to have the statue of Senator Ingalls withdrawn from the Hall of Statuary at Washington. It sprang not from any who denied his merits, but from those who were anxious to keep his fame green. They objected that his inclusion in the Hall had done him anything but honor, and that he only shared there the ridicule that many visitors shower upon the figures in the American Pantheon. And they argued that a reputation in need of no statue had only been lowered by giving it a memorial so common as to have lost all distinction. The suggestion of this incident lies not so much in criticism of the incongruities and artistic deficiencies of the collection in the Capitol as in a general reflection upon the whole cheapening practice of Americans—and others—of hastily setting up permanent tributes to any man for whom a community feels a temporary enthusiasm. The impulse to anticipate history's verdict is long-standing; and it is a wholesome reaction that makes people certain of a great name reluctant to range it with those to whom immortality has been prematurely decreed.

This memorial instinct should be chastened without either dulling public appreciation of great characters, or checking attempts at a distinctive civic art. A youthful nation will not lack eagerness to honor its heroes, or to set idealized figures before its children. But the effort to do this defeats both history and art when it fails in just proportion. What is objectionable is not that cities remember their founders, or persons connected with their development, as they have done from Pennacook with Hannah Dustin to Salt Lake City with Brigham Young. This means of giving spirit and tradition to a town's atmosphere, and of granting local notoriety a continued local currency, will deceive no one. But what is harmful is for a community to set itself up as arbiter of a broader fame. It was proper, no doubt, for Galena to erect a statue to Grant at his death. But for Dayton at once to distinguish the late Orville Wright in the way Washington has just distinguished Dr. Samuel P. Langley would be less clearly defensible. The reputation of statesmen is still more precarious. Even our short history shows us Chief Justices and Presidents that are now thought scarce worthy a pedestal. But the worst follies of all, as Coventry Patmore once pointed out, are in the cases of recent writers and artists. Just standards of taste seldom chime with popular moods; many a Tupper lives famous to die unknown, and many a Bulwer dies famous to sink into oblivion; and even "just standards of taste," from Caroline to Georgian to Victorian times, undergo reversals that leave one generation laughing at the mistakes of the last.

To convert these generalizations into specific instances is easy. From Akron, with its statue of Col. Simon Perkins, to Yonkers, with a statue of John Watts, city calls unto city names that even specialists in American history would not recognize. Passing over hurried, cosmopolitan New York, and the Chicago of stock-yards and grain-elevators, we find the third city of the land, Philadelphia, honoring a list that runs: Baldwin, Caldwell, Davis, Dodge, Drexel, Forrest, and so forth—names whose initials furnish no clue to their identity. It is true, pause was made to honor Columbus, and Dickens and Little Nell. Such a city as Hartford, which could not well avoid statues to Thomas Hooker, Nathan Hale, and Israel Putnam, included with them Brownell, Buckingham, Colt, Davenport, Hubbard, Knowlton, G. A. Stedman, and Horace Wells. These men had doubtless earned a civic wreath; but had they earned more? Indianapolis's taste is manifest in her list of seven men, all connected with the city's life, and all but the last, an able early Governor, widely known: George Rogers Clark, Schuyler Colfax, Benjamin Harrison, Thomas A. Hendricks, Oliver P. Morton, and James Whitcomb. And if some cities, like Chicago, which has memorials to Lincoln and Douglas, and to a host of foreigners from Hans Christian Andersen to Von Humboldt, have few native great, they have given their streets inspiration with representatives of the ancestor-nations of present-day Americans. But in general the land is cluttered with stones that try ineffectually to lift leaden names out of the dust, and that only choke the plant that grows on no mortal soil.

As we have said, those who advocate caution in rearing public monuments must be cautious themselves. But only those who conceal a grudge against historical truth and true greatness can fail to wish the extravagances of the movement checked. In other lands, Ministers and committees—and they have made some sorry mistakes—choose the subjects for such civil honors. With us they are elected by popular acclaim. It is therefore public restraint, and patience to abide the decree of time, that must be learned. Nothing has been said of the artistic aspect of the question. The real virtue of any sculpture must depend chiefly on its execution. A country with such work as that of French, MacMonnies, and Saint-Gaudens cannot be accused of inability to do justice to worthy subjects; and the best art is not nurtured on wide devotion to commonplace themes.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE POET.

Reports that the Laureateship would be abolished, or, at least, that no one would be appointed to take the laurel scarcely greener from the brows of Alfred Austin, were denied last week in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister stated that he intended to name a Poet Laureate. He did not say when or whom. To the suggestion that the honor might be made more broadly literary, and be bestowed upon a man whose fame did not chiefly rest on his poetry, Mr. Asquith did not accede. A poet the Laureate has been and a poet he must continue to be. Doubtless the Premier feels that it would, in a way, be doing despite to poetry not to keep up this official recognition of it. Notwithstanding all the complaints that English poetry is going sterile, the public desire to discover and to delight in poetical distinction is apparently as keen as ever—almost pathetically so. Say as despairingly as we may that the age is given over to material pursuits, there are always to be heard voices crying out eagerly, with Clough, "Come, poet, come!"

In a recent lecture on "The Future of English Poetry," Mr. Edmund Gosse touched upon the great difficulties which the poet has now to encounter. These relate as much to his art as to his audience. There is an immense demand for freshness of expression. It is laid upon his own heart by the poet, as well as echoed in his ear from the outside. Why should he merely seek to say over again the simple, obvious, even poignant things that have already been said? He must strive for something new, either in theme or form. Rendering of the primitive natural emotions has already been done, even to satiety. Language has nearly gone bankrupt. Hence it was probable, argued Mr. Gosse, that we should find future poets inclining more and more to symbolic and subtle forms of verse. In their horror of the trite, they would endeavor to produce an effect by "wrapping the truth in darkness." Mr. Gosse's rather dismal conclusion was:

> The domain of verse had been persistently narrowed by the incursions of a more and more powerful and wide-embracing prose. No ode or threnody could equal in vibrating passion Capt. Scott's last testament. The poetry of the future was likely to be very much occupied with subjects, and with those alone, which could not be expressed in the prose of the best-edited newspaper, and he believed that the closing up of the poetic field would isolate the poet from his fellows. That was likely to lead them to hand themselves more closely together for mutual protection. He also thought it very likely that sexual love might cease to be the predominant theme in lyrical poetry. The poetry of the future might not improbably become more and more dramatic, although perhaps by a series of acts of definite creation, rather than as the result of observation, which would be left to the ever-increasing ardoitness of the brilliant masters of our prose.

That such tendencies as Mr. Gosse indicates are actually operative need not be denied. There is a poetical school of over-refinement. Some think they will be heard for speaking dark oracles. Certain minds lose themselves in their own windings, and fancy that they can make poetry out of their efforts to extricate themselves. But such twisted obscurity of thought and style has never been characteristic of the great English poetry, nor is it of the best to-day. Subtleties are distinctly not in the movement. They are not the manner of Alfred Noyes or Stephen Phillips or Masefield. Broad and large effects still have their appeal. Nor need the old simplicities of nature and of life be given up as now hopelessly banal. Almost at the very time Mr. Gosse was lecturing, a volume of verse by a new writer was making its appearance, about which competent critics are enthusiastic on account of its strong and fresh handling of immemorial subjects. We have not yet seen the book, George Bartram's "England's Garland," but judging by some of the published extracts, it does not seem a great exaggeration to speak of him, as does the Manchester Guardian, as "a remarkable new poet." His note is clear and full and, what is to the present point, sounds ancient English themes. This shows that, after all, it is strong and original handling that matters in these things. Mr. Bartram's poem is long and ambitious. It is varied by making old masters of English song reappear. Here, for example, are the lines which begin a sort of meditation by Andrew Marvell:

> In glade remote of greenwood olden, long miles away from road and town,
> When wheat is sere and barley golden, and Sol hath burned the pastures brown,
> Most sweet it is to walk, when dies the splendor of the western skies.
> Tall elm and beech, the white birch limber, the ash thick hung with golden keys,
> The sturdy oak, stout lord of timber, the goodly glade is rich in these,
> But the dark yew is king enorm, whence fork the alleys cruciform.

Nothing wire-drawn about that! Mr. Bartram does not find it necessary to wrap his truth in darkness. He enters with frank joy into the spirit of the countryside, and seeks to refashion the old lineaments of nature and of life to modern needs. And he has a kind of exultant "valediction" which it is instructive to set, both for form and substance, against the somewhat depressing view of men like Mr. Gosse. We quote some of the lines:

> What weakling urges that the starry nights
> In woodland wanton with the joyous sprites,
> In meadow peopled with the tripping fays,
> Have fled for ever, and our souls are borne
> In endless circuit of the Streets forlorn?
> Who sings a requiem for the golden days?
> . . . . . .
> Some vagrant wizard may the track pursue,
> The maze unravel, and the spell renew,
> And wake the singing of the vanished quires.
> . . . . . .
> Vast Tree of Empire, shallow hirelings say
> The sign is on thee of a swift decay,
> That, foul and secret at thy deepest core,
> Dread canker nestles of the worm of doom,
> And thou art barren of the goodly bloom
> Thy olden vigor in such bounty bore. . . .
> It is not so: thy heart is still immune
> Of that gray mischief, and a coming June,
> Instinct with virtues of the South serene,
> Shall shape thy blossoms in the primal mould,
> Heap thy broad members with a fruit of gold,
> And dower thy foliage with eternal green!

WORDSWORTH AND HARTLEY.

In the development of Wordsworth towards an æsthetic and philosophy of life there are two important steps, after his graduation from Cambridge and his enforced return from France in 1793. The first, his enthusiastic acceptance of the philosophy of William Godwin, beginning in 1793 and continuing to about 1795, has been made out with tolerable distinctness. The second step, lasting from about 1795 to 1797, and covering the period of his recovery from the moral despair induced by his belief in the evil results of Godwinianism, is not so clear. In "The Prelude" Wordsworth credits his sister Dorothy with maintaining for him a saving intercourse with his true self, and preserving him still a poet. This explanation of the manner in which he arrived at the view of life and art shown in the volume of 1798 is not at all satisfactory; for it does not explain why, between the years 1795 and 1798, he found a set of doctrines more or less worked into a system which contain the essential Wordsworth as we know him. I wish briefly to indicate that the inspiration and source of Wordsworth's principles was the philosophy of David Hartley's "Observations on Man, his Frame, his Duty, and his Expectations," 1749, as derived from a study of the system itself and as interpreted in the light of Hartley's most enthusiastic disciple, Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

I.

In the "Lyrical Ballads," first published in 1798, in conjunction with Coleridge, the revolt from Godwin and the comfort in a more satisfying philosophy are both plainly to be seen. At the same time, of the twenty poems contributed by Wordsworth there are a number which deal with general humanitarian topics common to Godwin and a large class of his contemporaries. "Lines Left on a Seat in a Yew Tree," "Lines Written in Early Spring," "The Convict," and "The Thorn" are examples; and they are closely related to another and more numerous class which have to do with the more specialized topic of the horrors of war. Anti-military poetry was common at this time, and in this Wordsworth fell in with a fashion observed by Southey, Thelwall, Coleridge, Bowles, and others. In "The Female Vagrant" and "The Old Man Travelling" we see this special anti-military application of the general and widespread feeling for the sufferings of the poor.

All these poems would have met with the hearty approval of Godwin; but others are of a different quality. The philosopher of the "Political Justice" regarded abstract justice as the greatest virtue of society, and decried the more human virtues, such as pity, the family feelings, filial piety—the "blessed charities of father, son, and brother"—as mere prejudices, to be suppressed and subjected to the clear light of reason. Property, according to Godwin, was an evil; but we find Wordsworth making a protest against this principle in "The Last of the Flock," a poem written to show the natural love of man for property and its importance in fostering the domestic affections. This subject of the domestic affections and their importance for the English peasantry continued to engage the attention of Wordsworth, as we see in "The Brothers" and "Michael," and by the long letter to Fox in explanation of both these later poems. Another set of his poems inspired by his revolt against Godwin consists of those which have to do with "the primary laws of our nature," as he himself expresses the matter. To these belong "The Idiot Boy" and "The Mad Mother," founded on the maternal passion; "Simon Lee," a vindication of the feelings of benevolence and gratitude; "The Forsaken Indian Woman," a picture of the soul in the face of death, and its counterpart, "We are Seven," a picture of the child's inability to understand death; and, finally, "Goody Blake and Harry Gill," the account of a soul under a curse. This notion of the soul under a curse is likewise the subject of "The Ancient Mariner" and of those other poems upon which the authors of the "Lyrical Ballads" were engaged in 1798: "Christabel," "Cain," "The Three Graves," and "Peter Bell." The same theme is found in "The Spanish Military Nun" of De Quincey—"penitential sorrow," in his finely descriptive phrase.

After we have given all the preceding titles in the volume of 1798 we have left names that are far more famous still: these are the poems dealing with the relations of Nature to the development and nurture of the individual soul. The titles of these poems are not so much names as a roll-call of glory—"Lines Written at a Small Distance from My House," "Lines Written in Early Spring," the pair, "Expostulation and Reply" and "The Tables Turned," and, greatest of all, "Lines Written a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey, on Revisiting the Banks of the Wye During a Tour, July 13, 1798." Here, surely, we are at the heart of Wordsworth.

In these poems there are many expressions concerning the educative powers of Nature which have given trouble to commentators; some have called the doctrine they promulgate Pantheism, some Platonism; some, like Lord Morley, have regarded these expressions as "playful sallies"; while others have treated them as indiscretions to be hushed up and forgiven. I wish to examine them in the light of the Hartleian philosophy, as the earliest statement of the newly found solution of the universe and as the poet's first satisfying æsthetic, which gave theoretical support to his own insistent need of joy and hope.

Here it should be noted that, though Wordsworth speaks of immediate joy in the presence of Nature, as in the "Lines Written in Early Spring," this is not his characteristic attitude. His doctrine of Nature does not dwell on the immediate good which Nature brings; but rather on the "future good for years to come," as in the cryptic lines:

> Some silent laws our hearts may make
> Which they shall long obey—or, as in the words addressed to Dorothy in "Tintern Abbey":

> Therefore let the moon
> Shine on thee in thy solitary walk;
> And let the misty mountain winds be free
> To blow against thee; and in after years,
> When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
> Into a sober pleasure, when thy mind
> Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
> Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
> For all sweet sounds and harmonies. . . .

Dorothy's mind, like the poet's own, will be educated by Nature, and will be pleased to recognize "in nature and the language of the sense, the anchor of her purest thoughts, the nurse, the guide and guardian of her heart, and soul of all her moral being." Such is the education which Nature effects in all souls subjected to her sway; for, whether we will or not, our human souls are linked to her. In these poems Wordsworth is giving first expression to the thought which he was to work out later in such exquisite form as that of "Three Years She Grew," and at greater length in "The Prelude"—"how exquisitely the individual Mind to the external World is fitted; and how exquisitely, too, the external World is fitted to the Mind."

Now the point is that we find in "Tintern Abbey" the earliest clear indication of the characteristically Wordsworthian method of poetic procedure, that is, the method of reminiscence, or retrospect. This is by no means an invention of the poet's; it is a method derived from Rousseau and Rousseauism; nor is the glorification of childhood his own discovery. This, too, is derived from Rousseau. The new thing in "Tintern Abbey" is the philosophy of knowledge which connects in a causal relation the reminiscences and experiences of childhood with the adult mind. In other words, Wordsworth vitalizes the commonplace form of retrospect and reminiscence by interpreting the facts of experience in accordance with the association philosophy of David Hartley and some of his later interpreters. In the light of this philosophy it is not mere fancy but mere sober truth to say that the child is father of the man; and the philosopher does not go beyond the warrant of associationism when he gives thanks for

> Those shadowy recollections,
> Which, be they what they may,
> Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
> Are yet a master light of all our seeing;
> Uphold us, cherish us, and make
> Our noisy years seem moments in the being
> Of the eternal Silence: truths that wake
> To perish never;
> Which neither listlessness nor mad endeavor,
> Nor Man nor Boy,
> Nor all that is at enmity with joy
> Can utterly abolish or destroy!

II.

This is not the place to go into any detailed analysis of the system of Hartley. The first aspect of the association philosophy which must have appealed to the young poet in his revolt from Godwin is the important place given to emotion, feeling, pleasure, optimism, and to all the irrational impulses which had fallen under the condemnation of the author of "Political Justice." According to Hartley, the impulse for joy is not a mere surface thing, but is the most deeply seated fact of the soul and the universe; for, as God is infinitely good, men must all tend towards happiness; and the ultimate goal of every man is perfect felicity. Thus poetry and art, as the product of feeling and emotion, are not things that have to do with the superficialities of life, but go down to the depths of the soul. They are based on the "grand elementary principle of pleasure" in the heart of man, and so are as immortal as the heart of man itself.

A second important aspect of the Hartleian philosophical system is the clear manner in which it explains the development of ideas from simple sensations. According to Hartley all ideas come from sensation, which by the power of association are gradually transformed into the complexes of the mature mental life. These primary sensations, and the pleasures and pains of sensation, are ultimate, irresoluble facts; and from their various combinations and developments come the various classes of pleasures and pains called by Lamb the "motives to conduct," and designated by Wordsworth, in the Preface of 1800, "the primary laws of our nature" and "the great and simple affections of our nature." These "motives to conduct" act in the following order: (1) sensation, (2) imagination, (3) ambition, (4) self-interest, (5) sympathy, (6) theopathy, and (7) the moral sense. By the operation of the law of association the simple sensations are transformed by a change akin to that of chemistry into the higher and more impersonal forms of the mind; and the ultimate result is the translation of the material vibrations which produced the simple sensations into the pure love of God and universal benevolence. This system, in the opinion both of Hartley and Wordsworth, places in our control the choice of the ideas that shall come to the mind of youth. Moreover, it gives to every man a means of viewing the manner in which his mind was formed and of understanding the development of any other individual mind. And such is the general plan of "Tintern Abbey." The development of the mind is followed from youth to age, from the time when Nature was nothing but an appetite, up to the time when in Her was heard

> The still, sad music of humanity.

Nor is Wordsworth obscure as to the process by which Nature led on his mind; for he tells us that in youth the eye was all in all, the sense of sight being taken as typical, because, as Hartley says, "the ideas of this sense are far more vivid and definite than any other." In youth, then, sense was sufficient, and thought was not needed. But with the years thought came and sensation decayed, until he felt, at times,

> A presence that disturbs me with the joy
> Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
> Of something far more deeply interfused,
> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the round ocean, and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man,
> A motion and a spirit that impels
> All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
> And rolls through all things.

In the words of Hartley:

> Our intellectual pleasures are not only at first generated, but afterwards supported and recruited, in part from the pleasures affecting the eye; which holds particularly in respect of the pleasures afforded by the beauties of Nature, and by the imitation of them, which the arts of poetry and painting furnish us with.

And, through Nature and the language of the sense, we ascend, as Hartley tells us, to happiness "in the love of God, by the previous annihilation of self and the world." In the words of Coleridge, paraphrasing Hartley, in "Religious Musings," the idea is thus expressed:

> Till of its nobler nature it [the soul] 'gan feel
> Dim recollections; and thence soared to Hope,
> Strong to believe whate'er of mystic good
> The Eternal dooms for His immortal sons.
> From Hope and firmer Faith to perfect Love
> Attracted and absorbed: and centred there
> God only to behold, and know, and feel,
> Till by exclusive consciousness of God
> All self-annihilated it shall make > God its Identity: God all in all!
> We and our Father one!

This is but another way of saying what is said by Wordsworth in "Tintern Abbey":

> That serene and blessed mood,
> In which the affections gently lead us on,
> Until the breath of this corporeal frame,
> And even the motion of our human blood
> Almost suspended, we are laid asleep
> In body, and become a living soul:
> While with an eye made quiet by the power
> Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
> We see into the life of things.

In a letter written to Richard Sharp in 1808 Wordsworth speaks of Hartley as one among the "men of real power, who go before their age"; and exclaims concerning Hartley's book upon Man, "How many years did it sleep in almost entire oblivion!" This opinion was certainly Wordsworth's in 1798, for immediately upon the publication of the "Lyrical Ballads" he began to compose a philosophical poem on the same plan as that of "Tintern Abbey" which gave in detail an account of the development of his own mind. This was "The Prelude" in its earliest form, which was later enlarged in accordance with a much more ambitious and less consistent plan.

III.

Wordsworth continued to write poems in the spirit of those in the first edition of the "Lyrical Ballads"; and the result was a new edition in two volumes in 1800, and another with slight changes in 1802. In the Preface for the edition of 1800 we find a third and important aspect of the Hartleian philosophy clearly reflected. We have noted as the first aspect which must have attracted Wordsworth the validity given to emotion and passion; and as the second the simple manner in which the system explains the development of the mind; the third is the validity which it gives to the claims of the poet for serious consideration, as one who has something weighty to say on man, and nature, and on human life. Hume had given expression to the common opinion held by philosophers regarding poets:

> The Imagination of man is naturally sublime, delighted with whatever is remote and extraordinary, and running, without control, into the most distant parts of space and time in order to avoid the objects which custom has rendered too familiar to it. A correct Judgment observes a contrary method, and avoiding all distant and high enquiries, confines itself to common life, and to such subjects as fall under daily practice and experience; leaving the more sublime topics to the embellishment of poets and orators, or to the arts of priests and politicians.

To this charge Wordsworth had answered in the Advertisement of 1798, when he requested the reader to test his poems by asking whether they contained a natural delineation of human passions, human characters, and human incidents. This answer he repeats in the Preface of 1800, and claims for his poems reality of subject and of language. He then proceeds to show exactly what he means by reality, as follows: First, he says that the principal object in the Poems was to make the incidents of common life interesting by tracing in them, truly though not ostentatiously, the primary laws of our nature: "chiefly as far as regards the manner in which we associate ideas in a state of excitement." That is to say, poetic feeling arises out of thought; for though it be true that all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings, it is also true that poems to which any value can be attached can never be produced on any variety of subjects but by a man who has thought deeply. The priority of thought to poetic inspiration he applies to Dr. Johnson's stanza:

> I put my hat upon my head,
> And walk'd into the Strand,
> And there I met another man
> Whose hat was in his hand.

This, says Wordsworth, is not only not poetry, but it is not sense; for "the images neither originate in that sane state of feeling which arises out of thought, nor can excite thought or feeling in the reader." The necessary prierity of thought to emotion is explained at length by Wordsworth in terms of associationism:

> For our continued influxes of feeling are modified and directed by our thoughts, which are indeed the representatives of all our past feelings; and as by contemplating the relation of these general representatives to each other, we discover what is really important to man, so by the repetition and continuance of this act feelings connected with important subjects will be nourished, till at length, if we be originally possessed of much organic sensibility, such habits of mind will be produced that by obeying blindly and mechanically the impulses of those habits, we shall describe objects and utter sentiments of such a nature and such connection with each other that the understanding of the being to whom we address ourselves, if he be in a healthful state of association, must be in some degree enlightened, his taste exalted, and his affections ameliorated.

I have quoted this passage at length in order to show that it is nothing more than an enlargement and adaptation to æsthetic theory of Hartley's notions concerning ideas and the passions, and the constant tendency of all our mental activities to become habits. Of the relation between ideas and feeling, and the priority of ideas, Hartley says:

> Here we may observe,
> First, that our passions or affections can be no more than aggregates of simple ideas united by association. For they are excited by objects and by the incidents of life. But these, if we except the impressed sensations, can have no power of affecting us but what they derive from association.
> Secondly, since the passions are states of considerable pleasure and pain, they must be aggregates of the ideas, or traces of the sensible pleasures and pains. . . .
> Thirdly, as sensation is the common foundation of all these [the intellectual affections], so each in its turn, when sufficiently generated, contributes to generate and model all the rest.

IV.

In another important aspect of his work as poet and critic Wordsworth is closely identified with the philosophy of associationism. In his earliest published poems he was under the sway of Erasmus Darwin, a disciple of Hartley and one of the last of the advocates and practitioners of that artificial language which is known as "poetic diction," and which it was a part of Wordsworth's work to destroy. In the Interludes to "The Loves of the Plants," published in 1789, Darwin insists that poetry is addressed principally to the eye; for, as ideas derived from visible objects are more distinct than those derived from the objects of our other senses, the words expressive of these ideas belonging to vision make up the principal part of poetic language. This theory of poetic language is but the culmination of a long literary tradition which derives ultimately from Horace, but immediately from Locke's distinction between primary and secondary qualities in objects. This distinction was fully accepted by no less a critic than Addison in his influential papers on the "Pleasures of the Imagination" in the Spectator, as we see from his explicit statement, June 24, 1712, No. 413:

> I have here supposed that my Reader is acquainted with that great Modern Discovery, which is at present universally acknowledged by all the Enquirers into Natural Philosophy; namely, that Light and Colours, as apprehended by the Imagination, are only Ideas in the Mind, and not Qualities that have any Existence in Matter. As this is a Truth that has been proved incontestably by many Modern Philosophers, and is indeed one of the finest Speculations in that Science, if the English Reader would see the Notion explained at large, he may find it in the Eighth Chapter of the second Book of Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding.

This statement on the part of Addison is of very great importance, as it shows clearly that the theory ut pictura poesis had a distinct English and native tradition founded anew on English philosophy and distinct from the general Renaissance literary tradition. As Addison explains in the passage just quoted, Locke and his school demonstrated that light, colors, sounds, tastes, and smells are secondary and non-essential qualities in bodies, as contrasted with extension, bulk, and kindred qualities. And since these are the sensible qualities which distinguish ideas of objects, it was deduced by the critics as a principle of poetry and the arts, that those ideas to which a concrete form can be given by expression in terms of these secondary qualities are capable of being transferred from one sense to another without loss. Since both Locke and Berkeley dealt largely with the sense of vision, as the most important of the senses, it is not surprising that the later theorists of the arts should make poetry largely a matter of the visualization of abstract ideas. Nor is it any more surprising that the painters should practice their art from the same standpoint and should display a series of attempts at speaking pictures, and so on; nor that the poets should strive to express themselves in accordance with the principles of "poetic diction."

Armed with the more fundamental principles of his master, Hartley, which laid stress on the reality of poetry and imagination and furnished a philosophic basis for his own conviction that "a natural delineation of human passions, human characters, and human incidents" can never be expressed in any but a selection of the language of everyday life, Wordsworth broke through the surface theories of poetic diction, and using the materials of the association philosophy, laid the foundations for the new and all-important distinction between fancy and imagination. But that distinction was not made in the Prefaces of 1800 and 1802: it belongs to a later period in the development of Wordsworth's mind, and demands separate treatment. ARTHUR BEATTY.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Last week I gave, in this place, a list of additions and corrections to the bibliography of Sir Roger L'Estrange in Mr. George Kitchin's biography of that voluminous journalist.

In connection with the translations, which Mr. Kitchin discusses excellently, it should be noted that "A New and Complete French and English Grammar," by Peter Berault (1707) contains "above twenty Pleasant and Useful Dialogues, translated into English by Sir Roger L'Estrange, and here rendered into French," etc.

The list of works which have been "variously ascribed" to L'Estrange is incomplete, and needs some correction.

The discussion of "A Hymn to Confinement" (pp. 416, 417) is confusing. In the first place, the poem, which was attributed to L'Estrange as early as 1705, and which is to be found reprinted on pp. 199 ff. of Hannah's "Courtly Poets," is not "A Hymn to Confinement," but appeared with that poem in 1705. It has been called "The Liberty of the Imprisoned Royalist" and "The Imprisoned Cavalier" and "Loyalty Confined." The situation is made quite clear by the title of the edition of 1705 (quoted in "The Works of the Learned," Vol. 7, p. 103), "A Hymn to Confinement, Written by the Author of the Case of the Church of England's Memorial fairly stated, etc., to which is added a poem on the same subject by the famous Sir Roger L'Estrange, when in Newgate in the days of Oliver's Usurpation." This shows clearly that William Pittis, author of "The Case of the Church of England's Memorial," wrote "A Hymn to Confinement" and that L'Estrange was the reputed author of the other poem. Mr. Kitchin, on page 409, speaks of "His [L'Estrange's] 'Hymn to Confinement,'" but as the sentence has no verb, we shall never know what he intended to say about it.

The following tracts have been ascribed to L'Estrange, but are not mentioned by Mr. Kitchin in his bibliography, though some are mentioned elsewhere:

(1.) "An Address to the Freemen and Freeholders of the Nation," 1682, ascribed by Watt to L'Estrange or Edmund Bohun, is by Bohun.

(2.) "Aphorisms of Hippocrates. Englished by R. L'E," is mentioned by Watt.

(3.) "An Apology for the Protestants of France in reference to the persecutions they are under at this day; in six letters," etc., 1683, is given to L'Estrange by Halkett and Laing, but the contents would seem to indicate another author.

(4.) "The Apostate Protestant," 1682, ascribed by Watt, is perhaps by Edward Pelling.

(5.) "A Compendious History of the most Remarkable Passages of the last Fourteen Years, with an account of the Plot," 1680, has been ascribed to L'Estrange by the catalogues of several libraries, probably on the authority of Halkett and Laing. The contents show that he was certainly not the author.

(6.) "Crack upon Crack," etc., 1680, given to L'Estrange by Haikett and Laing, is a parody of "Cit and Bumpkin."

(7.) "The Head of the Nile; or, the Turnings and Windings of the Factious since Sixty," 1680, ascribed to L'Estrange by Watt, is by Thomas Baker.

(8.) "The judgment of an anonymous writer concerning these following particulars," etc., 1684, ascribed by the Advocates Library, is probably by George Hickes, D.D.

(9.) "Letter Out of Scotland from Mr. R L. S.," January 10, 1681, mentioned by Sir Sidney Lee in his article on L'Estrange in the Dictionary of National Biography, and ascribed to L'Estrange in various catalogues, is not his.

(10.) "A Letter to Miles Prance," called by Mr. Kitchin in one place "Letters to Miles Prance," is, he thinks, by Thompson or Farwell. It is not, as the language used on page 432 would imply, a mistaken addition to the bibliography made by Professor Trent, but is really an attribution due to Sir Sidney Lee.

(11.) "Present State of Christendome and the Interest of England with a Regard to France," 1678, is bound with "Tyranny and Popery" in a volume in the Peabody Library and given to L'Estrange in its catalogue.

(12.) "Remarks on the Growth and Progress of Non-Conformity," 1682, is dismissed briefly by Mr. Kitchin on page 432. It has been ascribed by Watt, the Advocates Library, and Halkett and Laing, and was advertised in the Observator. Professor Trent tentatively concurs in the attribution to L'Estrange on account of the writer's general attitude and his attack on Baxter, even though the publisher was not Brome. The question of its authorship seems to be still an open one, despite Mr. Kitchin's categorical rejection.

(13.) "Vindication of the Observator," 1685, ascribed by Watt, is probably not L'Estrange's.

Several titles which are to be found in booksellers' catalogues are here omitted, although the careful student of bibliography will slight such sources of information and vexatious misinformation only at his own cost. Frequently, the presence of L'Estrange's "Imprimatur" is a cause of error; sometimes collectors and students are misled by advertisements, as was notably the case with a contributor to Notes and Queries, December 22, 1906 (p. 489). I may add that a friend has given me a reference to "Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus," second edition, 1729, pp. 27-28, from which it should seem that in April, 1661, Mrs. Katherine Philips sent Sir Charles Cotterell an effusion by L'Estrange entitled "The Apology for Women." Whether this was in print or in manuscript does not appear, nor does the work seem to have been identified.

Correspondence

CHARLOTTE, N. C., AND OELWEIN, IOWA

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of June 26 you say:

It is a strange and painful thing to read that in any city of the United States a school board should refuse to appoint a woman as teacher in the public schools on the express grounds of her being a member of the Catholic Church. This is what was done, however, a few days ago in Charlotte, N. C., when two young women who had been teaching in the schools were, in the face of an extraordinary public protest against the proceeding, refused reëlection by the Board, the vote standing 10 to 5. . . . The demonstration of right feeling at the public meetings, attended by Protestant ministers as well as lawyers and business men, must be set down to the credit of Charlotte; but the people of that city should not rest content until they have brought about a reversal of the official act of intolerance.

Granting all that you say, it seems pertinent to express wonder at your failure to comment on an act far more "surprising and painful" that occurred at Oelwein, Iowa, on the evening of June 12, when a mob of some hundreds assaulted an ex-priest, Rev. J. J. Crowley, of Cincinnati, who had just delivered a lecture on the American public schools, upholding them as a bulwark of our liberties, and condemning the Catholic parochial schools as inimical to these liberties. To get my facts straight, I wrote to a Baptist minister in Oelwein, and his letter is before me, in which he says:

"I can speak with authority, for I was with Mr. Crowley through all the trying experience. There was a time when neither of us expected to get into the hotel alive. It was the declared purpose of the infuriated mob to lynch Mr. Crowley. Failing in their bloodthirsty desire to get Crowley they began to desire that I should be strung up."

Now it is perfectly well known that the Roman Catholics cherish an intense dislike to our public-school system. In this they are entirely within their rights as free citizens of a free republic. Moreover, they have a perfect right to denounce as freely as they wish, in the press and from the platform, the evils they see or even think they see in our system of public schools, and to do this without let or hindrance. But their Protestant fellow-citizens have an equal right to discuss, expose, and denounce any evils they see or think they see in the system that our Catholic friends would like to substitute for the present school system. President Wilson hardly ever said a truer thing than when he said: "Discussion is the greatest of all reformers. It robs principles of any false sanctity and throws them back on their reasonableness." And so, when in this country of ours a man's life is threatened by an infuriated mob because he speaks his mind freely in open discussion, a serious blow is struck at the very cornerstone of our liberties. Did any one ever hear of a mob threatening Col. Ingersoll, though at times he bitterly assailed many things unspeakably dear to the hearts of thousands upon thousands of his fellow-citizens?

There is no hint of sectarianism in this: there is no need for any. It is a matter of American patriotism, pure and simple, like your comment on the matter in Charlotte. It is—or should be—the nature of Protestants to protest, as you say was done in Charlotte; but the protesting need not be limited to wrongs that look in only one direction. Nor is there any occasion to charge the slightest tinge of sectarianism, when we Protestants, holding tenaciously to our political doctrine of entire separation of church and state, do not feel like entrusting too much political power to those whose fundamental doctrine, held as tenaciously as we hold ours, is the union of church and state, and such a union that the state is subservient to the church, and that "the" church is their church. Again, let it be said that they are fully entitled to hold this view. But if any church, Protestant or Catholic, should ever get to be the state, with power to enforce itself on others who do not hold its views, there would be an end to liberty as we now have it in the United States of America.

CULTURAL EDUCATION IN STATE INSTITUTIONS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The interesting and instructive discussion by Dr. Sherman of "Education by the People" in the Nation of May 8 involves a question of great and constantly growing importance—the question, namely, to what extent it is proper and desirable for State institutions to undertake the work of cultural education. The question is vitally involved in the fact that those institutions are under two imperative obligations to the public, which, when strictly observed, greatly affect the scope and character of their work in such education. Those obligations are, first, to refrain from religious instruction of any kind, and, secondly, to refrain from educational work which does not clearly tend to promote the general welfare, i. e., the welfare of the whole people as distinguished from the individual welfare of the particular person educated. The first of these obligations affects the character of their work in cultural education and tends to render it superficial, while the second affects the scope of the work and tends to render it narrow. For want of space, only the first can be considered here.

Recognizing the existence of these obligations and speaking of the one first mentioned, Dr. Sherman says:

> The very obligation which the state is under to refrain from religious instruction should make it appear more imperatively their duty to bring not some but all of their students into quickening relationship with at least the purely human traditions of beauty, wisdom, temperance, truth, and justice.

In what is here said we have, first, an implied recognition that this enforced absence of religious instruction is a serious defect; and, secondly, an express recommendation to seek compensation for that defect in a special cultivation of the things there enumerated. This recommendation is sound in theory, but futile in effect. It is sound in theory because an alternative is needed, and this is the only one imaginable; and it is futile in effect because it is impossible of effectual application. Its futility will appear when we undertake to act in accordance with it, as we thereupon find that all our traditions of whatsoever kind, are "purely human," for the very good reason that, so long as we ourselves are human, they cannot be anything else; and we are therefore left to the conclusion that what is really meant here by "purely human traditions" is purely secular traditions.

But when we set out to cultivate these purely secular traditions as recommended, we fail to find any such; we find instead that there is no such thing as a purely secular tradition of beauty, wisdom, temperance, truth, or justice; that the words "secular" and "religious" do not here connote different and distinct entities, but merely different phases of the same thing, and that this identical thing can never be adequately comprehended from a study of only one of those phases.

Such knowledge of the essential nature of justice, or of the true, the beautiful, or the good, as is derivable from its purely secular phase, would be comparable in thoroughness to the knowledge of the earth and its relations to the heavenly bodies, derivable from the study of agricultural chemistry. Any scheme for the teaching of these subjects which excludes their religious elements is therefore doomed to perpetual superficiality. In its effect upon cultural education this obligation resting on State institutions to refrain from religious instruction corresponds exactly to the wheel upon the farmer's plough-beam, which prevents the plough from ever going deeper than a few inches below the surface, and holds it forever to the task of stirring the soil merely to the depth required for the raising of corn and potatoes.

What is here said of the subjects above enumerated is true also of all the other important subjects of cultural education. When Dr. Samuel Johnson declared it impossible to think deeply on any subject without thinking religiously, he uttered a profound truth, which should always receive full recognition in any scheme of cultural education. The effects of such a limitation upon any plan of cultural education cannot fail to lower its standard and lessen the esteem in which it has hitherto been held.

If we seek to ascertain what has already been its effect in this regard, we shall find, among other things, that, during the past twenty-five years or more, State institutions and their influence have steadily increased, and that at the same time cultural education and the esteem in which it is held have as steadily deteriorated and diminished. Whether this is anything more than a coincidence may not be absolutely determinable, but it is precisely what might have been expected from the conditions above described.

To say this is in no sense an impeachment of education by the people. That public education is in general an inestimable benefit, and in popular governments is a vital necessity for the promotion of good citizenship, cannot be questioned for a moment; but its great excellencies should not cause us to expect too much of it, or to lose sight of its necessary limitations and consequent defects as an instrumentality for the higher education.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN SNOBS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In respect to the distinction brought out on page 17 of the Nation (July 3) between the American and the English use of the term snob, that "an English snob is a man who falls short of the perfect aristocrat through a taint of democratic vulgarity, whereas an American snob is a man who falls short of the perfect democrat through a taint of aristocratic exclusiveness," I fear that it will hardly hold. In a novel just appearing in the London Times, "Color-Blind," by Alice Perrin, the flavor of which is entirely Anglo-Indian, the word snob is used of a woman "with the taint of aristocratic exclusiveness." A returned Indian official, Mr. Fleetwood, is in London, and his daughters complain that their aunt, Lady Landon, has sent an invitation to luncheon to one only of the girls.

" 'We couldn't expect her to ask the whole pack of us,' said Marion.

" 'Why not?' argued her father, who was not deeply attached to his only sister, and always said she was a snob. 'The house is quite big enough.' "

PLURAL MOLASSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your contributor to "News for Bibliophiles" (Nation, July 3) condemns Bartlett's attribution of plural molasses to Western United States, in his "Dictionary of Americanisms," as "this incorrect statement." Some years ago I assisted a corps of civil engineers surveying coal-bearing lands among the tangled knobs of mountainous West Virginia. Occasionally we were invited, in accordance with the hospitable custom of the country, to drop in at a log cabin and eat. The very palatable sorghum syrup that sweetened our meal drew from a native member of our corps the query: "Whah yo' git them molasses, Jimmy?"

Literature

JOHN PAUL JONES.

The Life and Letters of John Paul Jones. By Mrs. Reginald de Koven. Illustrated. Two volumes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $5 net.

John Paul Jones, hero of ten more or less unworthy biographies, has at last found an able and sympathetic expounder. As Mrs. De Koven points out in her preface, this terror of the simple natives of the British coast, this hero of impossible moonlight exploits under the lee of English headlands, became in time a mere myth. His very name was used by nurses to frighten children. He was celebrated in popular song, and took his place with Capt. Kidd in the histories of the pirate kings. In America he has become the dare-devil hero of a single sea fight, of whose sufferings and misfortunes in the American cause there is no adequate appreciation. This whole conception is out of joint, and this new work seems born to set it right.

Jones's, or, rather, John Paul's, career began with a tragedy, the accidental killing of a mutinous sailor on his trading-ship, and though exonerated fully, the cloud of suspicion hung over him; and when again he accidentally killed a second sailor—a fact unknown to all of his previous biographers—he left both ship and cargo in the hands of his partner and entered upon a melancholy period of homeless wandering. This period, lasting from June, 1773, to the winter of 1775, has been one of almost complete obscurity to all his previous biographers, but is here quite clearly accounted for. It was in this period that he served on a "special privateer," as he euphemistically called what seems to have been a straight-out pirate ship. Earlier he had served on the slave-ships, the King George and the Two Friends, and though he soon gave up this uncongenial service, as he did that in the pirate ship, it was sufficient to give an unsympathetic biographer an opportunity to tinge Jones's whole career with the red stigma of the pirate flag.

It was after these experiences that he fell in with the wealthy planter, Willie Jones, who took the waif into his home and gave him his name. Here Jones met his other powerful North Carolina friend, Hewes, to whom he owed his first employment in the new American navy. Of this experience Mrs. De Koven says:

> With the same assimilative genius which gathered an education unusual in those times from the very air about him, Paul Jones quickly adopted the manners of the gentle people he was so fortunate to meet at this period of his career. They formed his standards of true gentility and fitted him to shine in the salons of Versailles. From this time on we begin to see the Paul Jones of history—the courteous and chivalric gentleman, the heroic champion of human liberty. No longer living for himself, except as he might win glory in battle, he was ready to give up every youthful dream and life itself in the service of America. The son of the Scotch gardener, the captain of West India trading ships and slavers, in a few weeks experienced this truly remarkable metamorphosis.

Jones's letters leave no doubt as to the sincerity of his attachment to the American cause. He writes: "Since Liberty hath chosen America as her last asylum, every effort to protect and cherish her is noble, and will be rewarded with the thanks of future ages. . . . When I entered into the Service, I was not actuated by Motives of Self Interest. I stept forth as a free citizen of the World in defence of the Violated Right of Mankind, and not in search of Riches whereof, I thank God, I inherit a sufficiency." Not in words only, but in deeds, did he give proof of his loyalty. In the Texel, with the British hungering for him outside, and the Dutch threatening within, "alone in his one American ship, between warships within and warships without, he kept the Stars and Stripes flying." When a French letter of marque was offered Jones to enable him to escape the Texel, he was indignant. "They insult my understanding. They invite me to insult the Stars of America; they are mistaken, the Stars of Freedom are but rising here. They are not rich enough to buy the Pirate Paul Jones."

In the early days of his service, Jones contemplated with dismay the results of the mania for privateering which had taken possession of the colonists. Every day the Continental seamen were lured away to these privately owned vessels, while half the fleet lay empty in the harbor. Even the members of Congress owned privateers, and winked at the employment of deserters from the Continental navy. Jones was astonished and disgusted by this revelation of character in the people whose cause he had so enthusiastically embraced. After numerous disappointments he received in turn the Alfred and the Providence, with which he made brilliant cruises, though at times his men were "scarcely able to stand the deck for want of clothing." Although America rang with his praises, he then suffered an unjust supersedure in rank due to the wretched democratic politics which were the bane of the times, and over this matter of rank—which, in his noble phrase, "opens the door to glory"—he brooded for months. It is to his credit that he did not leave the service. Finally, Congress made amends with the command of the Ranger, and though it was inadequate and ill-manned, Jones again rendered glorious account of himself. The raids on the British coast towns and the capture of the Drake, "unprecedented, almost incredible, at that time of England's unquestioned maritime supremacy," gave Jones's glory-loving soul the opportunity to bask in its proper atmosphere. Yet, incomprehensible as it is, France, and America, too, allowed this greatest fighting instrument of the time to lie idle for many weary months thereafter, during which Jones "almost half-killed himself" in his efforts to get a command. Again and again he seemed on the eve of obtaining a fine ship, when some ill chance robbed him. At last the old whaling ship, which Fanning says was sixty years old, twice laid up as a hulk, "as many joints in her backbone as a rattlesnake," was fitted up for him, and named the Bon Homme Richard. With a motley crew of Portuguese, Malays, Swedes, and some English prisoners from the jails of Brest and St. Malo, "as bad a crew as was ever embarked upon any vessel," as Jones wrote, he set off to win renown in that fight under the round harvest moon with the English ship, the Serapis.

After that affair, Jones went to Paris, and the city rose to greet and honor the victor. Marie Antoinette and her ladies rushed to the windows of the palace to see him pass, and the King gave him a private audience. At operas and theatres, applause greeted his appearance. He was the favorite of many great court ladies. Marie Antoinette invited him to her box at the opera, and gave him a chain and seal. Louis XVI presented him with a sword, but amid all the acclaim, the universal testimony is that Jones bore himself modestly and well. Moreover, an intimate study of his conduct in the battle with the Serapis and in other positions of great danger, bears out Mrs. De Koven's assertion that "he possessed not one trace of the brutal audacity and unprincipled bravado which belongs to the character he popularly typifies."

In Jones's letters, and in those of his contemporaries, are revealed many interesting personal traits. He shows some little talent for literary expression, and repeatedly reveals an intimate acquaintance with the Bible, Shakespeare, and Milton. In exultation as he sets out with the Ranger, he writes: "The world, as Milton said of Adam, lays (sic) all before me." He had some of Napoleon's gift for heroic expression. "I wish to have no connection with any ships which do not sail fast, as I intend to go in harm's way." "I may not win success, but I will endeavor to deserve it." These and his famous answer to the captain of the Serapis illustrate this talent. When the Maréchal de Biron told Jones that King George had knighted the defeated captain of the Serapis, the instant comment was: "I hope, Monsieur, that I may one day make a lord of him." Fanning asserts that in smoothness of tongue and flattery to seamen when he wanted them, he "excelled any other man I was ever acquainted with." He had seen Jones walk to and fro upon the quay for hours together with a single seaman urging him to sign for a cruise. Of his personal charm the greatest testimony is the warm friendship which he inspired in Franklin, Robert Morris, La Fayette, La Rochefoucauld, Count de Ségur, and many other distinguished persons. The Parisian ladies, too, found him "the most agreeable sea-wolf one could wish to meet with." Mrs. De Koven's account of his love affairs constitutes some of the most interesting chapters of her book. Mrs. John Adams wrote of Jones:

> I expected to have seen a rough, stout, war-like Roman; instead of that I should sooner think of wrapping him up in cotton wool and putting him in my pocket, than of sending him to contend with cannon-balls. He is small of stature, well proportioned, soft in his speech, easy in his address, polite in his manners, vastly civil, understands all the etiquette of a lady's toilet as perfectly as he does the mast, sails, and rigging of his ship.

But her husband, who was Jones's Evil Genius, wrote:

> This is the most intriguing officer in the American navy. Eccentricities and irregularities are expected of him; they are in his character, they are visible in his eyes. His voice is soft and still and small. His eye has keenness and wildness and softness in it.

The research displayed in this work is admirable, and the errors of previous biographers are exposed in a charitable spirit, even (I, 163) the pure fabrications found in Buell's life. But Mrs. De Koven herself is at times uncritical in handling her sources. She credits some very doubtful material on Jones's early life (pp. 10, 11, 43, 45, 304 of Vol. I), and at one point (I, p. 126) seems to prefer an account of a cruise written ten years after the events to a contemporary account because, forsooth, the later one is fuller. She accepts the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence (I, p. 62), though critical historians have long ago disposed of it. She states positively (I, p. 100) that Abraham Whipple destroyed the Gaspee in Narragansett Harbor, 1772; but all we know in support of this assertion rests on Ephraim Bowen's account, 1839, when he was eighty-six years of age. The critical historian does not accept such testimony. There are some actual errors, as "Gadroque" for Gardoqui (I, p. 247), and "Zobly" for Zubly (I, p. 81). In her desire to give importance to Jones's stay in the Texel, she attributes the British declaration of war upon the Netherlands to that fact, but the real motive was England's fear of the Netherlands as a neutral carrier under the protection of the Armed Neutrality League, which the States-General had voted to join. The Netherlands would be less dangerous to England as an enemy than as a neutral. On the whole, the work is scholarly and accurate, and holds the reader like romance.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Catfish. By Charles Marriott. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co.

"At one time the North Sea fishermen brought their cod to market in tanks in the holds of their vessels. In the tanks the cod lived at ease, with the result that they came to market slack, flabby, and limp. Some genius among fishermen introduced one catfish into each of his tanks, and found that his cod came to market firm, brisk, and wholesome." So, towards the end of his book,

Mr. Marriott explains his title. (The catfish in question is evidently not the American fresh-water catfish, mud-cat, or horn-pout pictured on the cover of the present edition.)

George Tracy is son of a well-to-do lower middle class Englishman. As a schoolboy he meets a girl a trifle older than himself, Mary Festing. He is not so much attracted by her as to her. For many years, with few meetings between them, a curious bond persists. At one time he is impelled, and is conscious of the impulse, to ask her to be his wife, but belief in her coldness prevents him. Nevertheless, though he marries another woman, and Mary herself presently marries, and both marry in a sense happily, each continues to need the other. As Lesbia, Tracy's wife, magnanimously grants, there is a part of his nature of which only Mary has the key. It is she who keeps the deeper waters of his nature clear and bright. To her he must turn when his latent and sluggish idealism is in danger of allowing itself to be forgotten. She is his catfish. The tone of the narrative is quiet, sombre, almost elegiac, and the final catastrophe, with its quick and, so far as appears, needless snuffing out of Mary, is an unexpected shock. Tracy is not a romantic hero; he is simply a man. Lesbia and Mary, each in her own way, are richly feminine and richly human. Whatever it may or may not "mean," the story lingers in the mind as a melody haunts the inward ear. It rings true.

Patchwork Comedy. By Humfrey Jordan. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Here is some unusually good workmanship squandered upon an uncommonly worthless plot. We are asked to imagine a lifelike group of wholesome-minded English folk engaged in deadly conflict with a ravening blackmailer. First this finished scoundrel attempts to exact tribute by threats to blacken the memory of the hero's late revered mother. Then a girlish widow who aids in worsting him becomes the object of an elaborate defamatory plot. No pen play could possibly bring within the natural scheme of things a malefactor so polished, picturesque, malignant, and versatile as was the formidable "Monsieur Le Beau," but the other figures of the "comedy" are very pleasant human likenesses. The gentleman annoyed by rumors affecting his legitimacy is a dilettante explorer of some fame, who has courted danger for lack of better occupation, and whom the obligations bequeathed him by a long line of worthy forebears will eventually convert into a useful country gentleman. The persecuted lady is a painter's daughter—therefore reared in Bohemian freedom; her virtue, grown in the open, unsheltered by conventional safeguards, has survived the hazards of an ill-advised marriage, but has not escaped suspicion.

In the course of their troubles with the destroyer of reputations, these principals and two faithful friends travel in France and Switzerland, yet without straying far from the beaten track. The aggressor at length turns fugitive in a misty morning chase, and they are about to carry the pursuit beyond the Alps into Italy when they have the good fortune to lose him for good and all down a crevasse in the Théodule Glacier. Crude as is the handling of dramatic situations, the sketching of the varying scene and of incidental episodes is uniformly excellent. One passage, describing an excursion of idle reconnaissance to a wrecked vessel stranded on the Devon coast, is worthy of a great novel. The best—and the worst—that can be said of its author is that if ever he finds something worth saying, he will know how to say it.

The Monster. By Edgar Saltus. New York: Pulitzer Publishing Co.

"Find the Monster" might have been a good title for this story, since it is decidedly hard to discover him in the picture. The lady is clear of suspicion. There are her first and third husband, and her second husband, and her stepfather, any of whom might be called a monster in the lighter social sense of the word, but none of whom is the "monstrum horrens, ingens" one expects of the title and of the author. The opening situation is not without precedent in fiction. The bride of an hour gets a letter which dashes her from the seventh heaven in an instant. All must be over between them; she can only fly. She flies. The letter of explanation she has left is lost. The bridegroom sets out in pursuit of her without an inkling as to the reason of her flight. A false lead sends him on a wild-goose chase through Far Eastern waters, while she is getting a divorce, and, to put a further bar between herself and the man she still loves, marrying another. The second is a paltry rascal, as the first is a hopeless cad; and when the three finally meet in Paris, there is bound to be excitement of a sort. The upshot is that the news contained in the post-nuptial letter is proved to be false, the second husband is killed in a duel, and the original pair are reunited. The action moves in that atmosphere of mingled Broadway smartness and Oriental mysticism which is native to this writer.

MR. BRYCE'S COUNSEL TO AMERICANS.

University and Historical Addresses. By James Bryce. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.25 net.

We expect little on festival occasions from those who lie abroad for their country but their auspicious presence and a few well-directed compliments and good wishes. Mr. Bryce, however, had formed other habits of speech before he entered the diplomatic service. It was neither his nature nor his necessity to spend much effort on that part of an address technically known as "conciliating the audience." The author of "The American Commonwealth" could assume without testing the friendliness of his hearers, and could hold them without seductive rhetoric, flattery, or emotional appeal. Perhaps the chief secret of his success as a public speaker was just his ability at every presented opportunity to find a connecting link between his own varied and vital interests and the leading interest of his auditors—whether lawyers, university students, architects, or foreign missionaries. When, with an art concealing itself, he had set in the most advantageous light the characteristic virtues or achievements of the association before him, he went quietly on in his serious, lucid, direct fashion to point out its characteristic defects, its dangers, its opportunities. For he apparently thought it unworthy of his distinguished station and his forty or fifty years in public life to talk for an hour and leave behind him only a "pleasant impression." He improved the occasion, and gave without stint the ripe and faithful counsel of a much-experienced friend.

It is one of the high paradoxes of public service and its supreme reward that if you effectively surrender yourself to your country you may ultimately take it captive. After a lifetime devoted to advancing the welfare and the works of others, you may wake some morning in divine peace of mind to discover that a higher law has quite abolished the baser distinctions of property, and that the works and the welfare of others have become, in the most sacred sense, your own. In going through this volume one is struck with the fact that we have treated Mr. Bryce as if he were ours, and we were his. Only upon one of our own people could we have made such extraordinarily frequent and various demands as are represented here. And only one who had entered as by right of birth into the heart of our traditions and institutions and known our land and people from Plymouth Rock to Mt. Rainier could have met them. He has assisted at the commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims, the beginnings of Virginia, and the discovery of Lake Champlain; he has united with us in honoring Jefferson, Lincoln, and Saint-Gaudens; he has taken thought for our national parks, for our higher education, for our literature and art, for our legislative procedure. And though he is unquestionably one of the best Englishmen living, we do not see how he could have put together these twenty-two American addresses—but a tithe, we suppose, of those delivered—without murmuring to himself from time to time, "America, my country."

Mr. Bryce solves the problem of loyalty to two great nations by demonstrating that to be a good American in the long run comes to about the same thing as being a good Englishman. He grounds the proposition upon nothing transitory or sentimental. His is the argument of a scholar, an historian, a jurist, discovering for the layman the deep and radical unity of the two peoples in their common blood and ancestry, in their heroes and their institutions, in their energy and their self-control, in their passion for liberty and their respect for law. He recognizes clearly enough the new spirit of unrest that is stirring at home and abroad. "We are hovering," he says, "between discontent and doubt. The reforming spirit runs so strong that it would sweep off their feet any people which had not, as you have, become attached to their old institutions." Perhaps he praises us for our sobriety and temperamental conservatism beyond our present deserts. Yet nothing certainly at this moment could be more timely for us than that learned index finger of his steadily pointing us back towards our traditions: "It has never been your way either to run ahead of actual needs or to pull up the plant to see if the roots are sprouting." Somehow these simple homely words link one's deeper feelings through the American Fathers to Burke's "canonized forefathers" across the sea, and one is put in the mood to cry, "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

One hesitates to say that Mr. Bryce has not rested in this fine English patriotism, this inspiring Anglo-Saxon loyalty. To declare that he is a cosmopolitan, as the word now goes, is almost an accusation, and yet that, properly construed—as Cicero or Goethe or Newman would have construed it—is his highest distinction. One hesitates, because what passes too currently for "cosmopolitanism" is not an upgrowth and outgrowth of national loyalties uniting at the top in a higher world loyalty, but a downgrowth and undergrowth of personal irresponsibilities avoiding all allegiance. The right citizen of the world is a man who has transcended patriotism simply by virtue of his overwhelming sense of the community of the interests of all good and wise men, dead, living, and yet to be born: a law-abiding, tax-paying, voting, coöperating member of the orbis terrarum. It was just this profound sense of the common interests of human society that made Mr. Bryce the prince of ambassadors, that renders so significant his reiterated pleas at the universities for the preservation or restoration of the humane and liberal studies, and that lends more than a passing solemnity to the closing words of an address delivered but a few months ago, in his seventy-fifth year, before the American Civic Association:

> Let us think of the future. We are trustees for the future. We are not here for ourselves alone. All these gifts were not given to us to be used by one generation, or with the thought of one generation only before our minds. We are the heirs of those who have gone before, and charged with the duty we owe to those who come after.

Readers of Strindberg in English are now furnished with works from his pen more illuminating as to his life and outlook than any which have previously appeared, with the possible exception of the "Inferno." The first two books of the present batch deal, respectively, with the opening and close of his career. Each bears the stamp of his customary frankness. Who but he, for instance, would have emphasized, by a brutal title, his bitterness over the fact that he was the son of a waitress? Strindberg is always frank, but not impartial, though he meant to be. Early in life his mind showed that perverse twist which informs all of his writings. A lack of nervous vitality, coupled with extreme sensitiveness, rendered him unable to laugh off little injustices; and he dwelt on them to such an extent that they took shape in his mind as premeditated villany. Thus, he started life but a short step from that mental state, recorded in the "Inferno," in which he believed himself persecuted by every passer-by. It is this omnipresent taint of nerves which makes it difficult to take Strindberg's work seriously.

"The Son of a Servant" was published in 1886, when Strindberg was thirty-seven. It is a true commentary on the man that at such an age, when a successful career in letters was in sight, he should have turned back bitterly to the faulty beginnings of his education. His father was a shipping-agent, a man of good family who had fallen upon evil days because of his marriage with one socially inferior. In the main he seems to have had high principles, but lacked a proper understanding of children, and thus was often unfair. The mother, who had borne the two eldest children of the family out of wedlock, naturally got little respect from so critical a nature as August Strindberg's. Yet he hungered for her love: "He tried to flatter her [he tells the story in the third person], but he did it clumsily and was repulsed." Even as a child he began "to take pleasure in self-torture; he was melancholy and boisterous by turns." The usual experiences of childhood always assumed extravagant forms in him. He thus describes the effect of his first love, at the age of nine:

> John's love found expression in a silent melancholy. He never spoke to her [she, too, was nine], and would never have dared to do it. He feared and longed for her. But if any one had asked him what he wanted from her, he could not have told them. . . . He felt that he had a secret. This plagued him so that he suffered under it, and his whole life was overclouded. One day at home he seized a knife and said, "I will cut my throat."

In other matters misunderstood shyness was interpreted by his parents as studied dishonesty; and small wonder, for it would have required a rare person to penetrate his queer behavior. Once, when a lad in his teens, he saw "Hamlet" at the theatre, and remembering that he too had a step-parent (after his mother's death, the father had married the housekeeper), he promptly lived the titular part with much enthusiasm and self-pity. Yet despite this absorption in self, he had a wide range of interests: with virtually no assistance save from books, he got the rudiments of several languages and experimented in science. If his mind never recovered from an initial warp, it was at least enormously active.

In 1906, after Strindberg had emerged greatly chastened from his "Inferno," he set about jotting down his views on all conceivable subjects. Issued originally in 1907 with the title "The Blue Book," these now appear in English as "Zones of the Spirit." The only unity which the book possesses is the recognition, forced upon Strindberg at last, of a Deity, and especially of Christianity as a comfortable philosophy. He revolts violently from the irreligious promptings of science which previously had been his guide, denying that science, when so engaged, is logical. Into his arguments we need not go. But their form is significant and characteristic. He saw things always concretely, and here furnishes snatches of vivid reasoning. Under the caption "Thought Bound by Law" he writes:

> The teacher said: "When a young man comes and says he is a free-thinker, say to him: 'You lie. You think with your stomach, your throat, your sexuality, with your passions and your interests, your hate and your sympathies. But in your youthful immaturity you do not really think at all, but merely drivel. What is instilled into you, you give out, and dub your wishes by the name of thoughts.' Moreover, 'free thought' is a contradiction in terms, for thoughts obey laws, just as sound, light, and chemical combinations do. Thought is bound, bound by laws. If you say, 'There is no God,' you speak without thinking. 'Non-existence' and 'God' are two incommensurate ideas which cannot be brought into juxtaposition. If they are, there results an absurdity which is the secretion or excretion of an illogical and confused mind."

The twenty short stories called "Married," which with "The Son of a Servant" were issued in 1886, suffer from the well-known taint. The meannesses of wedded existence are almost always to the fore. Why is it, he asks, that two persons, with apparently great capacity for happiness, and both with high resolves, soon grate on each other? This is one of the large injustices of life, and goes to show how unattainable is the ideal. With but few exceptions, the stories are most unpleasant and, worse, are anything but convincing, remote possibilities being singled out to do service for the typical. Yet throughout the volume the reader will be struck with Strindberg's keen observation and his instinct for the picturesque. All the elements making for stories of great charm and power are present, save a wholesome outlook.

Notes

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell's new novel, "Westways," the scene of which is laid at a country estate of middle Pennsylvania in the fifties and sixties, will be brought out in the autumn by the Century Co.

The same house has in hand Ruth McEnery Stuart's plantation jingles, "Daddy-Do-Funny."

Chatto & Windus have in preparation a book on modern France by the Abbé Ernest Dimnet. It will deal particularly with the changes in French spirit noticeable in the last half dozen years.

"Shakespeare and the Modern: a Defence of the Public Taste," and "A Plea for Individualism" are two essays in Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree's forthcoming book, "Thoughts and Afterthoughts" (Cassell).

In the autumn W. Sanday will publish at the Clarendon Press "The Primitive Church and Reunion," a series of papers which he contributed to the Contemporary Review.

Among September publications of Moffat, Yard & Co. are a novel of New York life, by Reginald Wright Kauffman; a work on the life and times of Louis the Eleventh, by Lieut.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, a brother of the novelist, and Prof. Scott Nearing's "Social Sanity: a Preface to the Book of Social Progress."

The following titles are included in Stokes's announcements: "The Way of Ambition," by Robert Hichens; "Prescott of Saskatchewan," by Harold Bindloss; "Story of Evangeline," by Clayton Edwards; "Many Cargoes," a story by W. W. Jacobs, and a number of juveniles.

Autumn announcements of the Yale University Press include: "Some Questions of Modern Government," by William Howard Taft; "The Monroe Doctrine, an Obsolete Shibboleth," by Hiram Bingham; "The Ethics of Public Service," by Henry Crosby Emery; "The Diary of a Voyage to the United States," by Moreau de Saint Méry, edited by Stewart L. Mims; "From the Letter-Files of S. W. Johnson," edited by his daughter Elizabeth A. Osborne; "Lyra Yalensis," by Edward Bliss Reed; "Life and Letters of Dr. Nathan Smith," by Emily A. Smith: "Earth Hunger and Other Essays," by the late William Graham Sumner, LL.D., edited with an introduction by Albert Galloway Keller; "Yale Readings in Insurance," edited by the late Lester W. Zartman, revised with additions by William H. Price; "Trade Morals, Their Origin, Growth and Province," by Edward D. Page; "The Pulpit and the Pew," by the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst (Lyman Beecher lectures); "The Judiciary and the People," by Frederick N. Judson (Storrs lectures); "The Power of Ideals in American History," by Ephraim D. Adams (Dodge lectures), and "Writings on American History, 1912. A bibliography of books and articles on United States and Canadian history published during the year 1912, with some memoranda on other portions of America," compiled by Grace Gardner Griffin.

A tribute to the natural charms of our national capital is given by former Ambassador James Bryce in the National Geographic Magazine for June. Comparing it with other capitals, he holds that in external dignity and beauty it is the "embodiment of the majesty and stateliness of the whole nation." He suggests that Washington should be the seat of a national university with a "fully equipped school of law, a complete and well-staffed school of political science, and of economics, and therewith, also, a strong school of history," and concludes with some hints as to what still needs to be done for the "beautification of Washington and the turning of its natural advantages to the best account," which are deserving of careful consideration. The rest of the number is devoted to pleas for "our policemen of the air," the birds of our farms and orchards. Extracts are taken, with illustrations, from Mr. Frank M. Chapman's "Bird Life," which no one can read without being brought, as he says, "within the ennobling influences of nature." Pictures in eight colors are given of fifty of our common birds, with information concerning each, furnished by experts of the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture.

It is, perhaps, too much to ask of a United States Senator that he be also a scholar, a jurist, and a philosopher; but we may at least insist that when he enters the field as a publicist, he shall be informed, dignified, and reasonably fair-minded. Judged by this rather elementary standard, we cannot think that John Sharp Williams's lectures on the Blumenthal foundation, published under the title "Thomas Jefferson; his Permanent Influence on American Institutions" (Columbia University Press), will add much to his reputation. Senator Williams has, indeed, made industrious use of Jefferson's writings, has brought together a good many passages illustrative of Jefferson's opinions and influence, and has said many things which are as true as they are familiar. Over against these moderate, though creditable, virtues must be set, however, persistent and indiscriminating laudation of Jefferson, joined to sneering depreciation of Hamilton, Adams, and the Federalists, and of such historians and biographers as have appeared to sympathize with them; a superficial or biassed treatment of such episodes as the Genet incident, only half set forth, or the Burr conspiracy, dismissed with two lines, or the embargo policy, grotesquely distorted into a praise of peace; and a cheap and slangy commendation of "Jeffersonian simplicity." There is one redeeming feature, however; the volume is dedicated, with rare delicacy of humor, to "my wife's mother-in-law."

In "The Masked War" (Doran), William J. Burns tells the story in detail of the detection and conviction of the McNamaras. It is, of course, not a work of art. A writer of fiction would have made much more of the material, a journalist could have "written it up" to far more vivid effect. The many pages of reports of Mr. Burns's "operatives" and "investigators" could have been boiled down, important or picturesque passages chosen, and a good deal of irrelevant detail omitted. But we should not have believed in the product as we believe in the present narrative. Its very crudenesses, its repetitions, digressions, and mere lumber of data, are all parts of its reality; and the twentieth century has no Defoe to invent such things. Defoe would have delighted in the style of this book—the English of the plain, blunt man reared upon American newspapers. When Burns and his detectives are on the way from one place to another, they are always "en route"; an incident that happened before a given date invariably happened "prior to" it; the criminal pursued by the detective is "the quarry"; and so on. To do him justice, Mr. Burns himself often escapes from the bondage of this lingo. If his sense of decorum obliges him to speak of a prostitute as a "courtesan," his common sense has a way of breaking into vigorous speech. It is in the reports of his assistants that the quaintest use of the newspaper vernacular may be found. Two of them go to hunt for a man named Caplan, in an anarchist colony. Their first report to Burns begins, "To-day . . . we proceeded to acquaint ourselves with conditions surrounding Home Colony and its residents. Our pretext as surveyors permitted us to move around without attracting attention. We found that a number of the community occupy residences in places isolated in the timber and not easy of access. . . ." These gentry never go anywhere, they depart. When they leave off work at night, they discontinue. When they watch a house, they "take up a surveillance on a residence"—a process the verbal dignity of which no doubt makes more tolerable a prolonged squatting in the brush or peeping from a window. As a real detective story, the narrative ought to serve as a useful check against the extravagances of fiction. Mr. Burns means it to do more than that; he means it to enlighten the honest workingmen of America as to the sort of vermin who too often get themselves accepted as "leaders" in the army of organized labor.

The record of a career as busy, as crowded with opportunities for meeting and knowing great men as that of Stephen Coleridge, son of the Lord Chief Justice, and great-great-nephew of the poet, should contain two things: a considerable volume of reminiscences, impressions, and biographical anecdotes, and evidence of a point of view—a philosophy of life—acquired and matured during these years. In Mr. Coleridge's "Memories" (Lane), we have both these elements; but neither is of great value, nor strongly expressed. We meet acute men in pages without acuteness; witty men in pages without wit; poetical geniuses in pages without emotion; great thinkers in pages without profundity. In one respect only does the author give satisfaction—to his treatment of religious men he brings a pre-Victorian faith. Whole chapters leave an impression of insipidity. The regret is the greater because his gallery of portraits contains such men as Arnold, Newman, Morris, Meredith, Browning, Lowell, Trench, Ruskin—indeed, all the great figures of the period. In the case of Sir Henry Irving, Whistler, and Lord Coleridge alone has the author really done justice to himself and his subjects. As for the reaction which he has gained from life, it is expressed in a splendid disdain of all the changes of the time. Evolution, rationalism, science receive the same intolerant condemnation as machine-made furniture, modern methods of warfare, and reformed spelling. This lover of "famous men and our fathers that begat us" should have proved a more minute and sympathetically observant historian of the days and men that are gone.

Prof. E. R. A. Seligman has taken advantage of the opportunity afforded by the issue of an eighth edition of his "Essays in Taxation" (Macmillan) to revise and enlarge that well-known treatise. The original chapters have been brought down to date, a process necessitating numerous and extensive additions, particularly in those chapters which discuss the various forms of taxation. The most noteworthy of the eight new chapters are the two dealing with the division of the taxing power among the different units of government. The other new chapters are for the most part extensions of chapters included in the original volume. Two of the new chapters, for instance, carry on the review of the reports of American tax commissions from 1895, the date at which it was left in the first edition. It is to be hoped that the formidable increase in the size of the volume will not result in any falling off in the great influence which the book has exerted in the promotion of rational tax reform.

Obviously enough, Mr. Harold Begbie's "The Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing" (Doran) was not intended by its author to be regarded as primarily a work of belles-lettres. It is nevertheless an extremely well-written book, and there are passages in it which, judged merely as literature, are of extraordinary power. The first two chapters give an interesting account of the founding, by the young Devonshireman, George Williams — later, Sir George—of the Young Men's Christian Association, in 1844, and somewhat broadly set forth the conditions of modern life which in the author's judgment have made some such organization indispensable. Excepting the last two, which are general, each of the eleven remaining chapters gives a somewhat detailed account of the history, spiritual and physical, if one may put it so, of a man whose life and character have been made over through the influence of the Association. As one reads some of these chapters, and notably chapters four and seven, one wonders a little at the infelicitous phrase in the title which stamps these men as ordinary. The "extraordinary thing," it should be said, which happens to all of these so-called ordinary men, is conversion: a somewhat mysterious process through which, and only through which, one gathers, the Young Men's Christian Association can become effectually operative for good on a human life. Here, indeed, is a very odd thing about the treatment as a whole accorded by the author to his subject; a thing which it may, perhaps, seem ungracious to notice in speaking about a book so finely motived, and yet a thing thoroughly characteristic of the attitude likely to be held by the cultivated modern man towards religion considered in the light of a personal as distinguished from an institutional fact. The author, while at every point he shows himself profoundly convinced of the reality of this "conversion," has evidently himself never experienced it; nor does he give any hint that he ever expects or even desires to do so. He is an admiring and sympathetic onlooker, as it were, at the business of individual human redemption. On page 117, he even confesses that he had formerly been vexed and irritated at hearing persons who had been converted talk about the moment when they "decided for Christ"; and the fact that he is no longer so vexed and irritated he does not explain as due to an experience he has himself later shared, but, rather, as resulting from the knowledge which acquaintance with men and the reading of books have brought him.

The forty-volume "Jubiläumsausgabe" of Goethe (Stuttgart: Cotta), which has enjoyed such marked popularity of late, has been greatly enhanced in value by the recent publication of a comprehensive "Register" volume. This embraces, in a single alphabetical arrangement, all the proper names that occur in the edition, all the subjects touched upon, Goethe's typical thoughts, and many of his characteristic words and important quotations. Numerous cross-references facilitate the finding of desired references. As the letters and diaries are not contained in this edition, and only selections from the scientific and critical writings are included, the introductions and commentaries to the several volumes are taken into account in the index, making it in a limited sense an index to the whole of Goethe. The "Register" is the work of the editor-in-chief, Eduard von der Hellen. Even the narrow specialist needs an index to so prolific and versatile a writer as Goethe, and this volume, the first of its kind, is one of the most helpful aids to the Goethe student that has ever been written. As Goethe has influenced almost every field of thought, this index, which makes easily accessible his ideas on every variety of topic, will be welcomed by other scholars than literary historians. As a usual thing, the German savant considers it beneath his dignity and not the proper thing to index his writings, and for this reason, when a scholar of Von der Hellen's prominence devotes so much time to the preparation of an exhaustive index he deserves more than ordinary commendation. It is to be hoped that we may some day soon have a similar index to each of the other important new editions of Goethe, particularly the great Weimar edition, which now numbers 137 volumes, of which but half have indexes of proper names.

Percy Cross Standing's sketches of "Guerilla Leaders of the World" (Houghton Mifflin) are slight but readable. He makes no pretence to give any but a very superficial account of the exploits of those whom he has selected for mention, and thus forestalls criticism on the ground of inadequacy of treatment. When the careers of more than a score of irregular leaders are dealt with in some 250 pages of excellently large type, it can be imagined that the survey is far from exhaustive. The chapters are somewhat uneven in merit and in proportion of space; that on the Tyrol is perhaps among the best, and the one on Garibaldi, to whom the author does considerably less than justice, is certainly the worst. The value of the book is in suggestion rather than in accomplishment. Guerilla warfare is a fascinating study, and Mr. Standing gives just sufficient information about his heroes to make the reader wish for more. Happily, in most cases the means of satisfying curiosity are readily accessible. The author's literary style is marred by an unfortunate addiction to italics and marks of exclamation. The sketches, it should be added, embrace only the guerilla leaders of the past hundred and fifty years.

C. W. Previté Orton, fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, has produced in "The Early History of the House of Savoy; 1000-1233" (Putnam) a study which would have delighted the late Bishop Stubbs. It is a laborious investigation of the documents concerning that period, the number of which is very great, since they include not only Burgundian sources, but those of Piedmont proper, and those which relate to such larger affairs as Frederick Barbarossa's struggles with the Lombard communes. The origins of the House of Savoy possess not merely the interest which attaches to the oldest reigning family in Europe, but to the process by which it crossed the Alps and established itself in the upper valley of the Po. Mr. Orton describes minutely every stage of this advance and the changing conditions of feudalism. Having assembled an imposing array of facts, he sets them in order—a much greater task—and weaves them into a chronicle which can always be read with confidence in its trustworthiness and often with interest. He succeeds also in giving to the principal actors in the drama individual features which lift them out of the category of abstractions. Two maps, carefully prepared, show the dominions of the House of Savoy in about 1080 and 1189.

"Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire," the English translation of Friedländer's "Sittengeschichte Roms," is now completed by the appearance of a fourth volume (Dutton) containing more than 700 pages, about equally divided between appendices and notes. This volume comes from the sixth German edition, though the body of the work had the benefit of a seventh enlargement and revision. An immense amount of scholarly effort is to be seen in some of the appendices, as in the "List of Roman and Provincial Amphitheatres," pages 193 to 255, which gathers up under a geographical arrangement countless items of information on the subject from inscriptions, literature, and actual physical remains; it closes with a table of longer and shorter axis dimensions for seventy-one amphitheatres. The reader is, of course, warned that accuracy in such statistics is not attainable. This work in its English dress ought to find its way at once into all school libraries, where the original text is, of course, beyond most of the pupils and far too many of the teachers.

Charles Chauncey Binney, a member of the Pennsylvania bar, is dead from heart disease at Little Boar's Head, Mass. He was born in Philadelphia in 1855, graduated from Harvard in 1878, and was admitted to the bar three years later. He was a special attorney for the United States Department of Justice, 1897-1901. Mr. Binney was the author of "Restrictions upon Local and Special Legislation in State Constitutions" and "Life of Horace Binney."

Count Tadasu Hayashi, the Japanese statesman, died a week ago at the age of sixty-three, from injuries received in a jinriksha accident. He was one of several students sent by the Government to England to be educated. On his return to Japan he joined a force which fought against the Imperial army, was captured and imprisoned. The Count became Vice-Minister in the Foreign Office in 1891, and remained in that post until 1896, when he was appointed Minister to Peking. Two years later he was made Minister to Russia, being transferred within a few months to the Court of St. James's with the rank of Ambassador, where he was instrumental in bringing about the Anglo-Japanese alliance in 1902. He became Minister of Foreign Affairs, but resigned in 1906, because of differences over the action in regard to the South Manchurian Railway system, which Japan took over as a Government concern. He reëntered the Cabinet in his old post within a short time, however, under Premier Saionji. He was a prolific writer, and had translated Mill's "Political Economy" and Machiavelli's "The Prince." Cambridge gave him the LL.D., and Oxford the D.C.L.

Out With the Birds. By Hamilton M. Laing. New York: The Outing Publishing Co. $1.50 net.

This is an uncommonly good book. Mr. Laing is a close and sympathetic observer, and he writes well about what he sees. His description of the "dancing" of the sharp-tailed grouse, illustrated by photographs taken at short range, is a contribution of considerable value to the literature of that subject; and one must admire his candor in saying, "What that long daily 'hoe-down' means to the birds I am unable to state. At one time I thought I knew. That was before I had learned to get right among the revellers; now after many hours spent with them, I am much wiser but still mystified." Mr. Laing is evidently not one of the kind of nature-students who find it convenient to read their own thoughts into the actions of animals they observe.

In the chapter, The Duck Mothers, Mr. Laing has brought together many interesting facts concerning the curious nesting habits of several species of these shy and clever birds. The same is true of the chapter on Some Little Owls, wherein he records the results of his keen and painstaking observations of the prairie, the long-eared and the short-eared species. In Spying from the Elm Clump, he displays his alertness and his accuracy as an observer, as well as his skill as a writer, by presenting in very readable form many interesting and significant facts concerning a dozen or fifteen species of birds, to say nothing of a murderous weasel which he promptly and properly slew.

Mr. Laing has done some skilful work in the exceedingly difficult art of bird portraiture with a camera, as is shown by several of the thirty-eight illustrations, all of them reproductions of photographs. Some of the best of these likenesses present, in characteristic poses, or with valuable detail as to plumage, such birds as the Canada goose, young burrowing owls (a capital picture), blue-bills (ducks) rising from the water, geese in flight, and especially the pictures of the black-crowned night herons. It is the more surprising, therefore, that the author should have included in his illustrations at least half a dozen which are utterly meaningless because the birds are shown as mere dots, often so small as to be almost invisible. The legend, "They were a gay throng," under one of these collections of dots, sounds jocular. Also, it is a clumsy and annoying arrangement to have the illustrations scattered helter-skelter through the book, often thirty or forty pages from the reading-matter about them, and no hint in the text of their whereabouts.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's "A Plea for the Younger Generation," announced by Chatto & Windus, urges teachers to instruct boys and girls on all matters of sex.

"Around-the-World Cook Book" is the name given to a forthcoming Century publication by its author, Mrs. Mary Louise Barroll, the wife of a navy officer who has travelled in many quarters of the globe.

The following are science books in the autumn announcements of the Yale University Press: "The Evolution of Modern Medicine," by Sir William Osler (Silliman Memorial Lectures), and "A Monograph of the Terrestrial Palæozoic Arachnida of North America," by Alexander Petrunkevitch.

The "Hurricanes of the West Indies" are treated in Bulletin X of the Weather Bureau, at Washington—containing twenty-four pages of text, four pages of tables, and twenty-five charts and diagrams—by O. L. Fassig, whose experience as observer in Porto Rico gave him intimate acquaintance with some examples of these dreaded storms. They are chiefly limited to August, September, and October; the tracks of a large number of them for each of these months are charted, and the point of their origin is indicated; but the text does not enable the reader to determine whether the "point of origin" is really such, or simply the place where the hurricane was first reported. A special account is given of the violent hurricane of August 7-20, 1899, which passed over Porto Rico, where more than 3,000 lives were lost and crops valued above $7,000,000 were destroyed; more than twenty inches of rain fell from this storm in the centre of the island.

On September 26, 1912, we printed a letter from our Paris correspondent, S. D., which dealt at length with Dr. Gustave Le Bon's remarkable study of "La Révolution française et la psychologie des révolutions." We are glad to see that this striking book has been translated by Bernard Miall, and published by Putnams as "The Psychology of Revolution."

Simplicity, common-sense, and a compact style characterize "Crops and Methods for Soil Improvement" (Macmillan), by Alva Agee. The book is of significance even to the cultivator of our Western virgin soils, who feels superior to our Eastern practice of using fertilizers. Mr. Agee warns against unscientific cropping, which will exhaust the best of soils, and explains those practices—whether liming, manuring, or rotation—which tend to build up soil fertility. He is clear and sensible in his treatment of the use of legumes and of lime, while his chapters on commercial fertilizers are the best section of the book. For those who live where barnyard manure is expensive, it is consoling to know that chemicals alone, if combined with a good rotation, will build up fertility. Mr. Agee would greatly simplify the guarantee as to chemical fertilizers and limit their numbers. He would require, to begin with, that instead of the confusing analysis which commonly appears on the fertilizer bag, there should be only the guaranteed minimum amounts of the three essential plant constituents, nitrogen, available phosphoric acid, and potash. No doubt this would help the farmer to know just what he was buying. Again, Mr. Agee advises limiting the number of fertilizer formulæ to ten, or even less, a practice which would save much confusion in the unscientific mind. For himself, Mr. Agee would be satisfied, it should seem, with the formulæ 3-10-6, 3-8-10, and 7-7-7. At any rate, whether or not local soil requirements would modify these particular formulæ, Mr. Agee is plainly right in saying that the multiplication of formulæ gives very little advantage, but rather works to confusion. Like all writers on the subject of fertilizers, he emphasizes the difference between high and low-grade mixtures, and advises some mixing for those who use any considerable quantity. The illustrations in this book are not very appropriate, and the table of contents scarcely does duty for an index; but the plan is as clear as the style, and the reader can easily find a desired passage. We commend this statement of modern theory and practice.

Prof. William F. Ganong's "The Living Plant" (Holt) is thoroughly scientific, yet is simple enough for the comprehension of the lay reader; the style is lively, and humor is not lacking. The method of the book develops the subject progressively, taking up first the essential basis of plant-life in the function of chlorophyl and the process of photosynthesis, then proceeding to give reasons for the existing forms of plants and their parts, such as the leaves. There follow sections on the method and service of respiration; the structure of the cell, particularly the quality and service of protoplasm; the work of the roots, especially regarding their means of absorption of nutriment from the soil; the dissemination and utilization of this nutrition; protective adaptations in plants against hostile conditions or active enemies; reproduction, with a chapter on flowers and their cross-fertilization; and, finally, plant-breeding and the methods of classification. This logical sequence of study is also historical, for Dr. Ganong is not only an evolutionist, but professes a stout faith in the Darwinian doctrine of adaptations, while recognizing that certain features in plants do not appear at all purposeful. One can see that such a treatment must involve many principles and explain many processes true of animals as well as of plants; and that the book is therefore an excellent foundation for biology generally, there being no essential difference in the basal facts between the life of a plant and that of an animal. In this aspect it may be recommended to every young student of natural history, whether he proposes to specialize in botany or not, while the botanist, as such, will find it a most convenient and helpful work of reference. We should like to quote extensively to exhibit the freshness of knowledge and the entertaining facts with which the book abounds, and the way in which aptness of illustration and telling bits of outside lore and philosophy are made to contribute to the value and interest of the subject. The book abounds in diagrams and photographs, which are beautifully done and are very helpful. There is a full index, and the paper and typography are of the best character.

Dr. Horace Jayne, formerly dean of the college faculty of the University of Pennsylvania, died suddenly last week at his home near Philadelphia. He was fifty-four years old. After receiving his A.B. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1879, and his M.D. in 1882, he studied at universities of Germany and at Johns Hopkins. He was a prolific writer, among his works being "Mammalian Anatomy," "Revision of the Dermestidæ of North America," and "Abnormalities Observed in North American Coleoptera."

Dr. Benjamin Lee, assistant to the Health Commissioner of Pennsylvania, died Friday at Point Pleasant, N. J. He was born in 1833 in Norwich, Conn., and graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1852 and from the New York Medical College in 1856. Dr. Lee also studied in Europe. Among his publications may be noted "Correct Principles of Treatment for Angular Curvature of the Spine."

Drama

NOTES ON GERMAN DRAMA.

In the sex-ridden literature of modern Germany a play without a love motive must be hailed as an extraordinary novelty. Arthur Schnitzler's "Professor Bernhardy" (Berlin: S. Fischer) has earned this distinction as well as that of having been prohibited in Vienna. The action of the play deals with a hospital maintained by private sources and conducted by a Jew and free-thinker. Bernhardy objects to the appearance of a priest at the cot of a dying woman who imagines she is getting well and expects a visit from her lover, thinking it would be more humane to let her die while she cherishes this dream than to awaken her to the knowledge of approaching death. Out of this conflict with the church grow serious difficulties for the hospital which had hoped for an endowment from the state. The intricate web of political intrigue entering into the management of public institutions is revealed. Nor does the author spare his profession; the flippancy, the cant, and the opportunism of his colleagues come in for a just share of scathing criticism. There is no unnecessary dwelling on physical facts, no repulsive details are thrust upon the reader. The prohibitory indictment must have been entirely based upon the reflections which the play casts on clerical interference and on the exploitation of professional activity in the interest of politics, which is a nuisance not limited to Austria.

Korfiz Holm has written an entertaining comedy, "Frau Mary's grosses Herz" (Munich: Albert Langen), which deals with the dilemma of a Frau Kommerzienrätin, whose husband is so absorbed in business that he tolerates her numerous flirtations. Frau Mary is the mother of a daughter married abroad, and of another daughter of the awkward age. She tries to postpone the engagement of "Billy," because the prospective father-in-law is one of her own admirers and she would be forced to retire from her field of activity. The women guests of the house belong to the same smart set, and the scenes in which these ladies pointedly allude to one another's affairs abound in amusing situations and sprightly dialogue. The lady in the end throws over all her admirers, consents to her daughter's marriage, and induces her husband to retire with her to their country estate. The play has been favorably received at the theatre.

"Münchhausen's Antwort" (Berlin: Theater-Verlag Eduard Bloch), a one-act play by Hanne von Gumppenberg, effectively handles an episode in the life of the famous German Ananias. The infidelity of a woman he had loved and disgust with conventional society are suggested as the motives of his passion for fooling the world with stories of marvellous experiences. The woman who had dropped him to marry another comes to one of the baron's much-talked-of evenings, apparently to renew her relations with him, but really to flirt with an influential Cabinet Minister, and obtain her husband's promotion. They all plot to lay a trap for Münchhausen, and, while waiting for their host, divide their attentions between the only lady guest and a buxom stable-maid. But the baron has observed everything, entertains them with wonted vivacity, and when punch is served begins a tale in which he fancifully veils the experiences of the lady and the exploits of the Cabinet Minister. When asked for proofs, he sends for the stable-maid! The little play condenses with remarkable cleverness the salient features of a familiar figure, and the plot is admirably calculated to hold attention. The play has been successfully performed at Munich, Stüttgart, Weimar, Karlsruhe, and other places.

Ludwig Thoma's "Das Säuglingsheim" (Albert Langen) is a "Burleske" in one act, and is a racy product of robust Bavarian humor. It deals with a home for poor babies established by a wealthy Jew and willed to the city on condition that its management should be unsectarian. The discussion of this clause with the widow of the testator brings forward the amusing figures of municipal officials, and throws glaring lights upon their mediæval prejudices. The climax is reached when the news arrives that the newly appointed janitor of the building is a Protestant; this disturbs the proportion of representation to which each sect is entitled. Although mainly of local interest, the situations in the little play are funny enough to appeal to any audience, and it is likely to be as popular as the author's "Erster Klasse."

The most important dramatic novelties of recent publication have come from Carl Hauptmann. "Die lange Jule" (Leipzig: Ernst Rowohlt), a village drama in five acts, has been chosen to inaugurate the new royal court theatre in Dresden in October, and is to be performed by Max Grube in Hamburg. It is a powerful tragedy of the passion for possession. The heroine has the old-fashioned peasant's attachment to the soil of the forebears, and is cheated out of the hope of inheriting the old homestead by her widowed father's re-marriage, of which she disapproved as violently as he had done of hers. The difficulties between the two hard, unyielding characters culminate in a desperate scene at the old man's death-bed, when the daughter once more claims her own and is cursed by him. From that moment she has but one aim in life: she buys the mortgage which the widow cannot meet and dispossesses the hated intruder. Her sentiment for the family place, with its numerous associations, relieves to some extent her cruel rapacity; nor is her conscience quite deaf to the message that comes to her through the apparition of her father's ghost. But as the attachment to the property becomes an obsession bordering on madness, her figure outgrows human limitations and assumes uncanny proportions. That the other dramatis personæ are able to hold their own against a character of such calibre, speaks for the strength with which they have been delineated. The action progresses with inevitable logic and has moments of powerful suspense.

Another play by Carl Hauptmann, "Die armseligen Besenbinder" (Leipzig: Kurt Wolff), is to see the footlights in the autumn at the Deutsches Theater of Max Reinhardt, in Berlin. The author calls it "altes Märchen," and it has indeed all the whimsical fancy and elusive symbolism of an old folk-tale. Hauptmann has nursed his imagination upon the folklore of Silesia until its spirit has entered his soul and quickened the poetical concepts of his creative mind. His imaginings quite spontaneously take the quaint and simple forms of the stories that belong to the lore of the Riesengebirge, and as they are much concerned with the dreams and the longings of poor people, the poet thinks in symbols of their life. The poor broombinder who in his direst misery is consoled by the dream of the brother gone forth in quest of treasure is as real as any figure from life; and the other, who has gone forth into the far world of fabulous wealth and comes home laden with treasure, is as illusory a phantom as such figures usually turn out to be in cold daylight. The play opens rare possibilities to the genius of the man who by his scenic realizations is attracting as much attention as the poet by his imaginings. The performance is likely to confirm the growing conviction of not a few critics in Germany that Carl Hauptmann is one of the strongest personalities in German letters to-day.

A. von Ende.

The Yale University Press announces a reprint of the first edition of "Common Conditions," an Elizabethan play which first appeared in 1576. The work will be edited by Charles F. Tucker Brooke.

Music

The Fourth of July was worthily celebrated at Lucerne, Switzerland, by a concert made up of compositions by five Americans—Chadwick, Foote, Hadley, MacDowell, and Louis Lombard. The last-named conducted the orchestra.

Leipzig has increased the allowance for its two municipal theatres from 350,000 marks a year to 700,000 marks. "The motion picture is charged with pandering to a sort of mental laziness, and thus with diminishing the popular support for serious opera and drama. And so the town steps in to fight the 'cinemas,' as they are called."

Wassili Safonoff has been elected an honorary member of the Philharmonic Society of London.

"The Songs of Euripides" is the odd name of an opera by Botho Sigwart which has been accepted for performance in Dresden next season.

An association has been formed in Dresden for the special purpose of bringing about a worthy celebration of the two hundredth birthday of Gluck, next year. It is hoped that some of his neglected masterworks will be revived. In Vienna a society has been organized for the purpose of collecting funds for a Gluck monument in that city. For Vienna he wrote three of his best operas—"Orfeo," "Alceste," and "Iphigenie in Aulis." It was here that he changed his style and paved the way for his Parisian successes, in which he was aided by Marie Antoinette, who studied with him in Vienna. Carl Goldmark is president of this Gluck association.

If the present violin craze continues in England, the piano will soon cease to be the most popular of instruments. At the ninth annual Violin Festival of the National Union of School Orchestras, held at the Crystal Palace, London, last month, the enormous number of 6,200 violinists mustered on the Handel orchestra. At the first of these festivals the number was only 700. Schools in every district in and around London were represented by players, and, it was stated, "one and all of them are whole-hearted enthusiasts, anxious to win all possible guerdons, and, in particular, one or other of the two silver challenge shields offered in competition by the union."

In Felix Weingartner, the Boston opera found a conductor who ranks among the greatest. At first he came over for a few weeks only, chiefly to obtain a worthy support for Mme. Nordica, but next winter he is to be in Boston from January to the end of the season. He will conduct not only the Wagner operas, particularly "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," and "Tristan," but also some of the best Italian and French operas ("Aïda," "Otello," "Il Trovatore," "Faust"). He will also preside over the performances of "Don Giovanni" and "Hänsel und Gretel."

The composite verdict of the critics of Paris, French and foreign, seems to be that while there is much good music in Charpentier's new opera, "Julien," it is not likely to duplicate the success of "Louise," because the libretto, by the composer himself, is marred by too much mysticism, philosophy, and symbolism. One critic remarks that "as soon as he leaves philosophy and Socialism and comes to Julien and Louise and treats them as creatures of flesh and blood, M. Charpentier recaptures the beauty and the pathos which are the chief feature of his earlier opera."

The death is reported of Ingeborg de Bronsart. She was born in St. Petersburg in 1840, her parents, Starck by name, being of Swedish origin. In 1861 she married Hans Bronsart von Schellendorff, like her a pianist and composer. Among her works are "La Déesse de Sais," in three acts, and the one-act "Jery et Baeteli."

Art

Michelangelo: A Record of His Life. As told in his Letters and Papers. Translated and edited by Robert W. Carden. Illustrated. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3 net.

There is no doubt that one gets a vivid human impression from these selections from the letters and papers of Michelangelo, and it is certain also that the picture thus gained is partial and misleading. It is abundantly proved out of the great artist's own mouth that he was a querulous, timid, suspicious person, with all the stigmata of a nervous invalid. His gigantic abilities he devoted chiefly to the task of rehabilitating his ungrateful and unworthy family, concerning whose noble origins he indulged delusions. His brothers preyed upon his generosity. He conferred princely benefits upon them, usually with a snarl. Constantly timorous before all business and official emergencies, he showed himself a poltroon when his dearly beloved Florence was in dire need of him. Yielding to a sudden nervous panic, he deserted his post of military engineer in charge of the fortifications. An ordinary man would have been hanged from the traitors' tower for such an offence. There are a few hints of a brighter side. Quite fatherly and touching are the letters to his favorite nephew and heir, Lionardo, concerning the choice of a wife. Very moving is his grief for his single faithful servant, Urbino, whose infant, his own godchild, the aged sculptor actually thought of taking into his home. Often there will appear a sardonic tenderness under his fulminations. A worthless 'prentice is to be sent back to Florence, but the father is to be told the lad is too high-strung for the rough work. Always one finds a Spartan rectitude, a willingness to take the unfavorable side of a bargain, to compound with a patron to his own hurt.

Such, roughly speaking, is the picture that Mr. Carden makes Michelangelo draw of himself. A true picture, so far as it goes, but how completely inadequate! There could be no more striking demonstration of the fallacy of the documentary method when applied without discretion. The amazing thing is that the materials for balancing the study exist, and have been completely ignored. Are the Sonnets, forsooth, not "papers of Michelangelo"? To have included about half the sonnets at the proper place would have helped to make the impression of the book relatively just. How Mr. Carden has neglected so obvious and necessary an expedient is incomprehensible. We hope it may be done in a future edition, though we are not sanguine of any very satisfactory fruits from an editorial mind so perfunctory and unimaginative. To those who already are familiar with the work of Michelangelo this volume brings interesting and valuable material not readily accessible to the general reader. We heartily commiserate, however, the ingenuous reader who gains his first acquaintance with Michelangelo from this book. To your reviewer it has been a revelation of the paradox that to anthologize may also be to diminish.

"Art for Life's Sake," by Charles H. Caffin (New York: Prang), is an endeavor to show that all life-increasing effort of the individual follows the rule of art. In developing the activities of the individual in the collective state, art is to be of prime importance. The beautiful and the good are merely different aspects of one thing. All utilities, including the skyscraper and machinery must eventually take on or produce beauty. The new collective life being more sensitive and highly ordered than the individualisms of the past will produce a superior order of beauty. "Beauty, so understood, is the urge, the impulse of growth of the Whole Life, the Healthy Life, the Holy Life in all its faculties of sensation, emotion, volition, intelligence, reasoning, imagination and intuition. It is that which impels to the full and free recreating continually of self by self which in the highest sense is Living. On the other hand, Ugliness is that which checks and diminishes the Need of Life and the Desire of Living, tending towards atrophy, the moribund and death." A close analysis of the rhetorical redundancies of this passage will show what ails Mr. Caffin's style and thought. In his enthusiasm everything shades insensibly into everything else, great words and ideas overlap in confusingly penumbral fashion. He traverses the ground recently surveyed by George Bourne in "The Ascending Effort," but leaves upon the mind no such clear impression of the cathartic value of art. We dislike to take issue with a book the general tone of which is wholesomely optimistic and with the particular views of which we often agree, but if this sort of writing is really prophetic, the art of the future is apparently to resolve itself into a iambent flux in which sensation, emotion, and volition may be reflected, but hardly intelligence, reasoning, imagination, and intuition.

Finance

LOW EBB ON THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Last Friday, July 11, sales on the Stock Exchange were only 64,400 shares, the lowest total of any full business day since May 26, 1896. What this means, so far as that branch of financial activity is concerned, may be judged from the fact that the earlier of those dates belongs to what Wall Street has long described as the era of small things on the Stock Exchange. The great forward movement in American finance and industry, which began with 1897, introduced a decade of wholly unprecedented activity, with days when a million shares changed hands a common spectacle, and with one day—April 30, 1901—when 3,200,000 shares were dealt in. The total sales in 1896 were 54,600,000 shares; they were 266,000,000 in 1901, and 131,000,000 even in 1912. For the first half of 1913 they were 23,000,000 less than the year before, and now the daily total sinks to a low level not witnessed since the turn in the tide of American prosperity, in 1896.

What does this shrinkage signify, in the larger sense? It may merely reflect the speculative market's inability to move, in the face of the embargo on credit facilities for the purpose. It may, in line with the Stock Exchange's prophetic functions, foreshadow similar inactivity in general trade. But it may more obviously be interpreted as a sign of the investment community's perplexity and hesitation.

Days or periods of this character are apt to come when the speculative community and the real investors who stand behind it are completely at a loss which way to turn. The presence of such extreme inactivity denotes that the usual buyers and sellers of investment securities will not buy, because they can see so many disturbing possibilities ahead, and will not sell, either because prices are too low to invite such a transaction or because there are elements in the general situation favorable enough to make the holder of stocks and bonds reluctant to part with what he holds. It will be agreed by most observant people that this description fairly fits the present state of things.

Any one who lets his imagination loose in a hunt for prospective trouble will be pretty successful. He will have, in fact, considerable scope in selecting the most formidable danger. He may predict the ebbing-away of prosperity which he has been taught must follow—as it undoubtedly did in 1894—the enactment of a low-tariff bill. He may fix on a coming financial crash in Europe, with or without a "general European war." Or, more vaguely, he may base his predictions on belief in a political Armageddon in the winter session of Congress, with all the crazes of the period recognized by proposals of legislation, or an expectation of a home financial crisis, not yet clearly formulated in ideas, but to be introduced by the abnormal scarcity of capital and by a tightening money market.

All this may easily have persuaded the public in general, and professional Wall Street in particular, not to buy. But as every one conversant with the matter knows, to be unwilling to buy is not necessarily to be willing to sell. There is a state of the financial mind which may be described as stable equilibrium or may be summed up as pure inertia, and it is apt to mean that the bad points in a situation are fairly balanced by the good.

In the present case, the man who has mused on the possible coming dangers, summarized above, will frequently be checked in any disposition to sell his stocks by such considerations as the fact that the markets—financial, mercantile, and industrial—have carefully prepared themselves for any money strain which may be on the way. He will observe, when he has looked into things a little further, that although the business community has for at least four months been complaining of a "hand-to-mouth business" and the "lack of future orders," nevertheless the volume of trade continues surprisingly large. Furthermore, the reports from the various industries show him that the output of manufacturers and producers is not going into heaped-up unsold stocks (as in 1907, for instance), but is moving directly into consumers' hands.

He finds, it is true, that loans at the banks are almost everywhere heavily extended as compared with a year ago; for instance, that they are up $56,000,000 from July, 1912, at the Bank of Germany, $95,000,000 at the Bank of France, and $190,000,000 in the national banks of the United States, and that, except for Berlin, this expansion has not been accompanied by an increase in cash reserves. But when he looks at the present greatly reduced demands on credit, at all the great money markets, for Stock Exchange or commercial purposes, he is apt to conclude that this part of the situation is adjusting itself. And meantime he hears from every experienced authority that, in default of actual disaster, prices of good investment securities are intrinsically low.

There is perhaps one deeper cause of hesitation, underlying all the rest, and not dependent on any idea so concrete and distinct as that of financial calamity. It is the perplexity which pervades the minds of all meditative people, as to exactly what sort of change is coming about in our institutions generally—possibly more in the political and social field than in finance. The feeling that important alterations, temporary or permanent, are shaping themselves in the attitude of society itself towards many fundamental questions of the day, is a sentiment which will naturally inspire uncertainty, even when it does not cause alarm.

This is more particularly true at a time when the casual observer of these phenomena of the day does not always find it easy to distinguish between the large reforms which mark the real social movement of this remarkable period, and the foolish or crazy fads which are proclaimed, not merely by scatterbrained fanatics, but to some extent, unfortunately, by men of character and standing whose mental balance has not been strong enough to maintain an equilibrium. But to lose the sense of proportion, in measuring such political and social tendencies, is to lose all power of reasonable prediction. It is easy to infer that certain propaganda are the surest of success because their advocates are the loudest talkers, and it is easy to assign to the social fermentation more influence on the real prosperity of the day than legitimately belongs to it. It has happened on many similar occasions, during generations past, that the turmoil of agitation has resulted, first in the winnowing of the useful from the foolish propaganda of the day, and afterwards in the settling down of society at large to a sounder and more efficient condition than before.

PITY THE POOR BLIND

"It has an uncommon literary quality and interest . . . the reader, whether he sympathizes or not with its theme, must acknowledge its sincerity and broadly human sympathy . . . a story whose appeal, save to those who also 'having eyes see not,' must be as compelling as its theme is original."

The title is purely metaphorical, referring to blindness regarding God and His laws.

THE AMBASSADRESS

By William Wriothesley

The fascinating life of the inner court circles of the embassies at European capitals mirrored in an animated novel in which an American woman plays the leading part. Net $1.25

EL DORADO

By Baroness Orczy

This is the long promised and eagerly expected novel of the further adventures of THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL—the immortal character creation of the Baroness Orczy. It is a fresh recital of the exciting days of the Commune and of the adventurous part played by this fascinating and bewildering figure during the Reign of Terror. Net $1.35

IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE EVIDENCE

By Oliver Onions

A man plays God to a fellow-mortal in the matter of life and death; appointing himself both judge and jury, he passes silent sentence. Under what circumstances, if any, could such an act be justifiable? In this powerful novel of our modern world, such a man renders his evidence and acquits himself. Net $1.25

THE DEBIT ACCOUNT

By Oliver Onions

Was it a debt and ought it to have been settled? A remarkable book, remarkably contrived, which asks an extraordinary question. Net $1.25

THE ADVENTURES OF DR. WHITTY

By G. A. Birmingham

Through his earlier books, SPANISH GOLD, THE SEARCH PARTY, etc., Mr. Birmingham has contributed to human literature a permanent figure in the inimitable curate, "J. J." But there were certain humorous escapades which could not be decorously carried out by a clergyman and "J. J." makes a gift of all the things he would like to have done, and did not dare to do, to Dr. Whitty. These constitute the adventures of Dr. Whitty. Net $1.20

CALLING THE TUNE

By Justin Huntly McCarthy

This newest novel by the author of IF I WERE KING, A HEALTH UNTO HIS MAJESTY, etc., departs in scene from the gallant days of cloak and sword and paints a picture of life's gaiety and zest, no less gallant or dashing because of its modern environment. Net $1.25

THE HAPPY FAMILY

By Frank Swinnerton

A contrast in feminine types; the selfish and spineless woman—a destroyer of happiness; the sweet, courageous woman who builds her character into her menfolk's lives. The genius of the book is its careful realism. Net $1.25

COURTIN' CHRISTINA

By J. J. Bell

Every admirer of J. J. Bell's quaint depiction of Scottish character and every lover of clean, sweet humor will welcome this book with open heart. The classic little figure of "Wee Macgregor" and odd little Christina and the incidents of their old-fashioned courting furnish the theme of this new novel. Net $1.00

THE MASKED WAR

By William J. Burns

This is Detective Burns' own story of a peril that threatened the United States and how he uncovered the conspirators and sent them to jail. It is the straightforward, unimpassioned story of the greatest of modern struggles between an element of organized labor and capital. It is never unfair to labor. It will claim the careful attention of statesmen, employers, workingmen, and everyone interested in the adjustment of controversies between capital and labor. Net $1.50

FORTITUDE

By Hugh Walpole

"It is not life that matters, but the courage you bring to it"—a book full of fighting quality, romance and that kind of life-knowledge that equips to meet failure with the smile that compels success. Big in conception, big in execution, and magnificent in theme. Net $1.40

GENERAL INFORMATION.

The Instruction given at the School of Political Science is the natural crowning accomplishment of every liberal education. In each of its several branches, the pupil acquires the requisite competency for holding high State Offices (Diplomacy, Administration, Finance), and is also trained for Public Life and Great Financial Enterprises, both in France and Abroad.

The Pupils are admitted without examination, with the approbation of the Director and School Board; no University degrees are necessary.

A special Conference is reserved to Foreign Pupils with a view to facilitate their studies.

Tuition usually comprises 3 years' course, which, however, may be reduced to 2 years. On completing his studies, every pupil who has successfully passed his examination receives his diploma.

SCHOLAR YEAR, 1913-1914.—The Scholar Year commences on 10th November, 1913, and closes on 6th June, 1914. Applications are received at the Secretary's Office from 3rd November, 1913. Application for the whole Course gives right to all the regular and complementary Courses and Conferences, and also access to the Library (about 25,000 Volumes and 160 French and Foreign Reviews and Newspapers) ..... Per Annum, $70.00

A Special Pamphlet giving detailed information on the organization of the School and respecting the Professions for which the Pupil receives special training can be had by addressing:

ARISTOTLE ON THE ART OF POETRY

Translated and adapted by LANE COOPER, Assistant Professor of English in Cornell University.

This amplified version of the Poetics of Aristotle aims to make this most important of all works on the drama intelligible for a first reading by students of English and other modern literatures.

Aristotle's examples, which are often hard to follow in a literal translation, are here expanded and clarified, and additional examples from Shakespeare, Milton, and other familiar sources are supplied, making explicit the principles discussed. A brief introduction on the Character and Value of the Poetics is included.

The Week

Secretary Bryan says that he doesn't mind criticism, including ridicule, we suppose, but it is one thing to be indifferent to personal attacks and quite another not to care when a great office is made the subject of neighborhood gossip. This is the galling thing; and the Americans did not need to hear laughter from across the ocean to feel that Mr. Bryan's talk about his salary and his savings and his ménage at Washington was in shocking taste. It might pass in confidences across the fence in Nebraska, but when it is blurted out in Washington, not only does Mr. Bryan appear as a man without delicacy, but the chief member of the Cabinet seems to be beneath the dignity of his office. Other men have lived and labored in Washington in a kind of honorable poverty, who would have died before doing any blabbing about it in public. Mr. Bryan must somehow be pulled up, or he will soon be telling us the number and cost of his wife's dresses, and what he pays his servants. It is doubtless true that $12,000 will not cover the expenses to which the Secretary of State is put. But there stands the office and the salary; it can be accepted or declined. Once accepted, the pecuniary consequences should be accepted also without whining.

Senator McCumber's assertion, in his address to the Michigan Bar Association, that Col. Roosevelt's friends are preparing to fight for his nomination by the Republicans in 1916, was naturally resented by the Michigan Progressives. They vow that the Colonel will never desert them. Certainly not; but mightn't he take them along with him into a reorganized and purified Republican party? A friend of his is reported in Washington to have made advances to leading Republicans along this line. His talk has the familiar ring. He is, of course, not authorized by Mr. Roosevelt to give any assurances, but it is his conviction that the Colonel could be induced to accept the nomination, if the Republican party were reorganized "on a progressive basis." In that case the Colonel might feel that it was his "patriotic duty to make the sacrifice" and run again for the Presidency. In our opinion, this presents a glittering opportunity to the Republican managers. It would be the easiest possible way in which to reform their party and get a glowing certificate of character. If they nominated Mr. Roosevelt, they would become in the very act progressive, forward-looking, and the only hope of the nation.

There may or may not have been a small amount of corruption in the activities of the Manufacturers' Association, as detailed by the precious Mulhall, but there certainly was a large amount of self-complacency. These agents and secretaries, hovering about the edge of big politics, came to feel that they had their fingers on the very pulse of the machine. They fairly swelled up with the sense of their own importance. This came out amusingly in the letter made public last week, in which Schwedtman wrote to Mulhall in 1908 that Teddy and Taft and Sherman and Foraker and the other big guns were nothing like the equals of Van Cleave, Parry, Kirby. Since the House doorkeeper wrote home to Texas that he was "a biger man than old Grant," there has been nothing quite like these frogs bursting their skin in the belief that they were oxen.

Both the man and his equipment will inspire gratification in the selection of Paul S. Reinsch as Ambassador to China. His work in the department of political science at the University of Wisconsin has left its impress on legislation in the Middle West, while as writer and Roosevelt exchange professor in Germany he has made his reputation international. As a delegate to the Pan-American conferences and a student of international law he possesses a good degree of diplomatic training. Above all, his sympathetic interest in the welfare of the Chinese people, and grasp of their difficulties, is manifest in authoritative studies of Oriental politics and intellectual currents. His appointment succeeds fitly our recognition of the Chinese Republic, and coming at a critical moment for China, gives her a third good friend from abroad besides Professor Goodnow and Dr. Morrison. Professor Reinsch should serve well in a post presenting many national and international complications, and requiring both ability and special knowledge.

The annual report of the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace for 1912 has been awaited with particular interest, since it covers the first full year of their activities. Mr. Carnegie made his superb gift in December, 1910. The work of organization naturally extended far into 1911, but 1912 saw the propaganda for peace well under way, just as it witnessed the beginning of the horrifying war, or wars, in the Near East. In the handsome volume before us may be clearly read not merely the activities of the various divisions of the work, but the policy of the present trustees. This, it is plain is chiefly along the line of improving international relations by stimulating existing peace periodicals, by supporting worthy societies and associations here and abroad in their efforts to end war, and by bringing them into harmonious coöperation. In other words, it is chiefly an educational function which the trustees have set for themselves. The only direct action reported is in connection with the general arbitration treaties submitted to the Senate in 1911, and defeated by that august body.

Aside from the secretary's office and the general administration of the Endowment, the work is divided into three sections: those of intercourse and education, economics and history, and international law. The first of these divisions has opened headquarters in New York and Paris, and there is a notable advisory council in Europe to supervise the work from the Continental and English point of view. A subvention of $24,000 for the year 1912-13 largely supports the work of the Berne International Bureau of Peace, with a view to demonstrating its value as an agency of propaganda. To the Brussels Central Office of International Associations a sum of $15,000 has been allotted, with the purpose of helping to build an international museum, the publishing of its organ, La Vie Internationale, the holding of international conferences, etc. Four of the more important European periodicals, Die Friedens-Warte, of Berlin, Vienna, and Leipzig; La Paix par le Droit, of Paris, and the Arbitrator and the Herald of Peace, both of London, have received subventions ranging from $6,000 to $250. Four distinguished special correspondents abroad have kept the division well informed as to the movement of European opinion. A considerable volume of literature has been directly distributed, or placed on sale in cheap form—Norman Angell's "The Great Illusion" has been translated for circulation in Germany, France, Italy, Japan, Spain, Spanish America, India, and China. Finally, exchange professors and distinguished visitors, like Charles W. Eliot, have acted as messengers of peace and interpreters of nations to one another.

A bill introduced by Senator Gore shows that the poor Indian of Pope's day is more than ever an object of envy to his white neighbors. As usual, his comparative wealth prompts them to a step of no unselfish sort. At a time when the farmers of the Southwest feel urgent need of money for the development of their vast new country, the 120,000 Indians of Oklahoma possess great wealth. The trust funds of the tribes in the United States Treasury and Oklahoma banks amount to $28,500,000; $6,000,000 more are due them on deferred land payments; the pending sale of segregated coal fields will add $10,000,000 more; and the tale is not even then told. Oklahoma statesmen are anxious to have these great sums placed in State banks in such manner that they will be available for farm loans. They argue that the nation will recoup the interest it now pays on the Indian funds, reaching nearly a million yearly, that the farmers will benefit immeasurably, and the Indians will lose nothing. This should leave the simple tribesmen, whether in contented ease or laboring upon their own farms, somewhat puzzled. A paternal Government throws open their lands to the whites, and, collecting the money returned, holds it in trust; and then the whites borrow the purchase price again to develop their new holdings.

As a State whose woods began to disappear with Braddock and Duquesne, Pennsylvania may boast that she now leads in forestry legislation. Those who realize the complexities of land taxation will regard the bill pushed through the last Legislature with respect. Forested lands are admitted to an auxiliary reserve, subject to a minimum tax at a valuation of $1 per acre. The hardship which this loss of revenue places on mountain counties is met by a second bill, providing that the school and road tax on such lands be paid by the State. When the lowlands denied the equity of this, they were silenced by the statement that their cities and factories had long used untaxed water from the taxed hillsides. With all interests thus attended to, ex-Gov. Stone's wish that the woods, as a source of timber and water, and "the people's outing grounds, upon which they can enter as owners, not trespassers," might be preserved or restored, seems half realized. One defect in the bill is apparent. The power to place land in the auxiliary reserve, as rendering an essential public service, is vested in a State Commission; but the law does not state that no good agricultural land, better adapted to other crops than timber, shall have the benefit of inclusion in these reserves.

There is little that is "forward-looking" in the reports from Washington in reference to the Chicago postmastership and other places upon which the politicians of both Democratic factions in Illinois have their eyes. Mr. Campbell has two years still to serve as postmaster, but it is questioned whether he will be able to resist Mayor Harrison's pressure for his resignation. For Roger Sullivan, it is explained, has suffered a defeat in the fight for the spoils, and no less a person than Chairman McCombs has urged Postmaster-General Burleson to appoint the man whom Harrison wants, instead of Burleson's personal choice for the place. The parcelling out of the posts is said to have been arranged in detail, and we have lists of the offices which have fallen to Senator Lewis and to Gov. Dunne. To ignore Sullivan absolutely is inexpedient, and so he is to have the filling of the appraisership of customs, a position which does not pay as much as some others, but is credited with "enormous influence." It is a pity that there should be even thought to be any grounds whatever for these circumstantial reports. In particular, to allow Postmaster Campbell to be hounded into resigning would be inconsistent, not only with the good of the service, but with the avowed policy of the Department.

In the friendliest spirit the Richmond Times-Despatch is devoting helpful editorials to the condition of the colored people in that city and asking for them "more schools, better sanitation, fair rents, and more breathing spaces." It quotes from the Richmond Planet, a negro newspaper, the following statement of what the colored population has to face:

> There are not enough sewers, the drainage is defective, the crematory and ash dumps are within smelling distance and regularly send up their perfumes during the sultry nights of a torrid summer. In this section, too, decayed fruit and vegetables and other eatables, sold at low prices, attract the poverty-stricken, and they eat and—die. Hundreds of colored people, too proud to beg and too honest to steal, deny themselves the necessities of life and drag out a wretched existence from day to day until tired nature will stand no more, and they are found stiff and stark in death.

Naturally, the Times-Despatch concludes that there is something wrong with the civic conscience. The existence of such conditions and the fact that 5,000 colored children are said to be growing up in Atlanta in idleness and ignorance in the streets because there are no school sittings for them have their light to throw upon the oft-repeated assertion that the South should be let alone to deal with the negro, as it knows what is best for him. True, in our Northern cities conditions are not so much better as to warrant them in taking any pride, while the difficulty of obtaining work for the negro is much greater.

The riots in Seattle discredit everybody concerned. The Times of that city has unquestionably violated journalistic proprieties more than once, but the Mayor followed a bad Paterson precedent in endeavoring to suppress this newspaper. Suppression of free speech is no business of a Mayor, whether he be the head of the government of Little Falls, Lawrence, or Seattle. The violence of the sailors, if actuated by a desire to protest against Socialist and I.

W. W. methods, shows them to have been as devoid of judgment as of respect for the law. If they have regained their senses by this time, they must realize that their actions can only have the result of awakening sympathy for those whom they attacked and of discrediting the uniform they wear. Were the I. W. W. and the Socialists much worse than they are, they are still entitled to organize, to open headquarters, to agitate, to hold property free from lawless attack. As for the Secretary of the Navy, he is apparently the victim of an outrageous misquotation; should this Seattle experience lead him to choose his words a little more carefully, it will do no harm. They are joking about some of his utterances abroad; it will not do for him to say things which lend themselves readily to misconstruction even by young sailors who are full of patriotism and perhaps of righteous indignation at men who seem to them bent on overturning society.

In the annual report of President Garfield of Williams College, an effort is made to show what has been the approximate effect of the increased cost of living upon student expenses. Figures are available for the classes from 1885 to 1887, which show that the average annual expenditure in these three years was $652. Statistics compiled in the same way for 1910-1912 yield an average for that three-year period of $927. The increase, something more than 42 per cent., is thought by President Garfield to be "not materially different from the estimated increase of cost of living elsewhere than at college." But it is not upon the resulting hardship to students or their parents that he puts so much stress as upon the unfortunate position of college professors. Their salaries have not been enlarged at anything like their enlarged rate of expense. President Garfield thinks that Williams should pay her professors $4,000 a year, and partly to that end, partly in order to establish new professorships, he is calling upon the alumni to raise a fund of $1,000,000.

Every returning boat is bringing to our favored shores a wealth of dramatic material that is bound to make the season of 1913-14 one of the most brilliant in the entire annals of the stage. Has any new genius appeared in Europe since our playhouses closed a few weeks ago? His name is at the bottom of a contract in the pocket of one of our enterprising producers. Have the well-known dramatists of the Old World done anything since the first of the year? You will see it on some Broadway stage this autumn. Tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, and all the rest of the Polonius list, along with some kinds he never imagined, are to be spread before our dazzled eyes. Have you a fancy for something that will take you out of the twentieth century? Here is "Robinson Crusoe"—with some alterations, of course, such as that of a negro comedian for the part of Friday. Are you in more serious mood? Well, the managers doubtless have something to suit even that, although they do not think it worth while to announce it. It is a bit cruel to cast any shadow upon so glowing a prospect for both our managers and ourselves. Yet if most blessings brighten as they take their flight, those in a theatrical manager's scrip seldom look lovelier than at the moment of their arrival. With the actual course of the ordinary season in mind, one is tempted to ask whether all this enormous loading up is not a kind of insurance. Half of the masterpieces being transferred from the liners to the producers' safes may fail to tickle the public palate, and yet enough will be left to keep the houses going.

Some Englishmen have thought that in these hard times they were displaying a noble sentiment in seeking to raise a million dollars to save the Crystal Palace. But the contrary-minded Bernard Shaw does not agree. Other men have recalled the Great Exhibition of 1851, when Prince Albert believed it opened an era in which industrial competition would supplant armed strife; and the Victorian attempts to make it a great home of culture. But to Shaw it is an unsightly glass and iron structure, the chief utility of which is as a summer playground for Phil May's 'Arry and 'Arriet. The point of his caustic words is a comparison with the slow progress of the National Theatre. "If the Shakespeare Memorial," he says in effect, "held races and games with its annual Stratford performances, our dramatic enthusiasm would pass all bounds." The Crystal Palace and its grounds should be saved, but this criticism of the English sense of proportion is apt. The London Times especially should feel it. It has lately broken its rule not to ask subscriptions, in order to help save this site, "offering unparalleled advantages for such concourses as the Olympic Games."

An educational announcement of interest is embodied in the final report of the Royal Commission for the organization of the new University of London. The movement to weld the separate institutions of the metropolis—University College, King's College, many technical and medical schools—into a great seat of learning, has resulted in the framing of a constitution which joins the scattered colleges into one University, and yet leaves each home rule, as at Oxford and Cambridge. But in this constitution Americans will be most struck by the confident pronouncement on research as an academic function. England's new attitude is, according to the account in Science, thus expressed:

> The higher work of the university should be closely connected with research. Teaching and research should be combined. The greatest evil in the present organization of the university is that this is not the case. It is not possible to get the best men as professors if they are restricted from doing their highest work. Research should not be exploited by individual capitalists; and the professor can give the best instruction only if actively engaged in advancing knowledge in his subject.

We think of research in England as conducted privately; in Germany, under the auspices of a university. Charles Darwin on his secluded estate at Down, Lord Rayleigh or Sir William Crookes in private laboratories, Mill and Morley working in leisure husbanded from their regular vocations, are more typical of the British searcher for truth than J. J. Thomson or George Saintsbury. England has not had men like Kant at Königsberg, or Mommsen at Berlin, and few even like James at Harvard. The reason is that British universities have recognized slight partnership between research and the training of youthful minds. To reverse this policy, even under metropolitan pressure, will seem to some an unwise compliment to German and American practice—unwise, at least, in its binding definiteness.

NICARAGUA AND AFTER.

Mr. Borah appears to be the only prominent Senator at Washington flatly opposed to the treaty making the United States the protector of Nicaragua. With his prediction of unhappy consequences, we should not be willing to go all the way. It would not necessarily follow from this treaty that the American flag would go up over all the territory between us and the Panama Canal. Senator Borah speaks of the "irresistible logic" of the case, but we know that the world is not governed by logic. What the Nicaraguan proposal calls for, in our judgment, is not sweeping assertions or confident prophecies, on one side or the other, but comprehensive and prudent study. In one thing at least every man with the instinct of a statesman must agree with Senator Borah; this is his saying: "I am unwilling to take the first step until I have weighed all the consequences of the last step." Anything like a light-hearted rushing into a path of which we cannot see, we will not say the end, but even the first turn, cannot be too severely condemned. We know what happened in 1870 to Ollivier with his "light heart."

A reminder from our own more recent past should give pause to rash embarkers upon untried seas. Fourteen years ago we took the Philippines. If the thing were to be done over again, how many Americans would vote to annex the islands? It was done unadvisedly, with the slightest foresight of what was to come. We found to our surprise that we had bought a bloody and shameful war. In a burst of rhetoric we acquired what President McKinley called "the gems and glories of the tropic seas," only to discover in a short time that, as President Roosevelt said, they were "a great burden." If the country could have foreseen one-tenth of the vexation and expense and bloodshed entailed by the purchase of the Philippines from Spain, it would have preferred to pay ten times the money to induce Spain to keep them. It is given to no mortal to see the end from the beginning; but a people still smarting from one gigantic mistake in national policy may reasonably be expected to stop and look and listen before plunging into what may be another.

President Wilson and Secretary Bryan will doubtless resent the inferences which many are drawing from their approval of the Nicaraguan protectorate. Senator Lodge is bestowing suspicious praise upon the project. To his mind it is an extension of the Monroe Doctrine which will soon make us the Big Policeman of this hemisphere. We shall be undertaking the duty of keeping order and paying the foreign debt in every republic to the south of us. The President would surely repudiate this interpretation. But he must see that an endless number of such dangerous meanings will be read into the Nicaraguan treaty. How can it be kept apart from the extremely delicate question of our relations with Mexico? With this still unsettled, the publication of the plan to assume a protectorate over Nicaragua was most untimely. For thousands of Americans with property interests in Mexico will at once ask why, if we go to Nicaragua to safeguard a few thousands, should we not at once take steps to protect endangered millions just across our Southern border? And there will be great numbers of easy-going and hasty-concluding Americans to say: "Why, that is so. If we won't let anybody else do it, we must do it ourselves. The Monroe Doctrine prevents foreign nations from calling the Dagoes to book, and so it is our business to make them quit fighting and pay their debts."

Of course, a slight examination of either the Monroe Doctrine or international law will show that nothing of the kind is true. The case does not come down to this facile either-or dismissal. There is, to-day, just as there has long been, an alternative policy. About twenty years ago, a British squadron seized the custom-house of Corinto—a port in this same immune Nicaragua—to enforce payment of an indemnity, and the Monroe Doctrine looked on unmoved. Later a German fleet sailed to discipline Venezuela in a similar manner, and although none other than Roosevelt was then on guard, no objection was made by our Government. As for the collection of private debts by public force, that is a step which the British Government has steadily refused to undertake; and the doctrine that this should never be done has now good standing in international law. All these spectres, therefore, of European fleets swooping down upon Mexico or Central America to demand payment of bonds held abroad, are purely imaginary. Yet the threat of them is used by the capacious Imperialism of a Lodge, and will be made to seem real to many ignorant and careless people. Such a popular sentiment is highly perilous, like inflammable stuff, and it is obvious that it is directly increased by such grandiose projects as the proposed Nicaraguan protectorate.

That this treaty is in better form than the one urged by President Taft, is frankly to be admitted. Nor does it wear an air of aggression. Ostensibly, at least, the Nicaraguan Government is freely entering into the agreement, and seems even actively to desire its consummation. But what do we really know about conditions in Nicaragua? If we cannot find out the truth about Mexico, how can we be so confident that all is what it is represented to be in Nicaragua? We know that of recent years it has been a country of what Senator Borah happily calls "kaleidoscopic government." Dictator succeeds dictator; one army chief supplants another. And certainly, until we have conclusive evidence that the treaty has the approval of the majority of the people of Nicaragua entitled to have their opinion consulted, we should go very slow in adopting it.

FALLACIES ABOUT "RECOGNITION."

It appears to be true that strong representations have been made to President Wilson concerning the desirability of according full recognition to the Huerta Government in Mexico. The diplomatic corps in the City of Mexico seems to have agreed that such action by the Washington Administration would help matters. That there are large financial interests of the same mind is clear. They can be so without necessarily falling under the suspicion of being only selfish or scheming in their attitude. It is a fair question whether a full survey of all the facts should not soon lead President Wilson to appoint a new Ambassador to Mexico, thus implying a more complete recognition of the Huerta régime than he has as yet been willing to make. The matter is one to be maturely considered in view of the whole Mexican situation, of diplomatic precedents, and of our wisest public policy at this juncture. Whichever way the decision fall, there will be no occasion for violently denouncing it, just as there is no reason at present to attack either those urging or those deprecating the step which the President is pressed to take. But it is important, to-day and later, to clear our minds of the fallacies about the effect of a recognition of Huerta, which are current in so many quarters.

It is assumed by some, for example, that the attitude of our Government is that of having nothing whatever to do with Gen. Huerta. The implication is that all our official business in Mexico is at a standstill. But this is not the case. There has been a recognition of the Huerta Government as de facto. This may not have been publicly made, but it has been tacitly, and in practice. Any representations which our Embassy in Mexico has had to make, have been made at the National Palace. That the head of the actually responsible Government of Mexico is lodged there, we have taken for granted. Appeals to give due protection to American residents, claims for damages, and other routine matters, have been brought to Gen. Huerta's attention. For a time, he made a pretence that all this was wholly irregular; and that, in default of full and hearty recognition, friendly diplomatic relations could not be maintained, and that he would ignore all efforts to do business with him. But he soon saw the folly of that attitude, and abandoned it. Whatever our Government has to say to him, or to his Minister for Foreign Affairs, can be said under the existing de facto recognition, and Huerta must needs give heed to it. There is no such deadlock between the two countries as has been imagined.

The strange notion that the establishment of peace and order in Mexico merely waits upon American recognition of Huerta will not bear examination. It seems to be thought that, if President Wilson were to send an Ambassador to his great and good friend in Mexico City, Carranza and the other revolutionists in the North would instantly lay down their arms. But that is a wild supposition. Our full recognition of Diaz did not prevent the rebellion which overthrew him. The fact that Madero was recognized by the American Government as President of Mexico did not save him from siege in his own capital or from assassination. It is possible that Huerta might extract personal satisfaction, and even some moral assistance, out of recognition by the United States, but that it would yield him an atom of material aid is not to be thought of for a moment. Muddy ideas may argue that recognition implies active help; that we should be bound to call upon the rebels to quit fighting, or even to supply Huerta with funds and guns; but this is preposterous. As long as the revolutionists continue determined to fight the man whom they regard as a murderer as well as usurper; as long as roving bands find it possible to defy the Federal troops and to burn and rob and destroy, mere recognition by the United States of the Provisional President could not essentially alter his military difficulties. It could not, that is, unless recognition meant intervention. The fact that some would like to have it mean this is doubtless one of the reasons why President Wilson has gone so slow.

That the Mexican problem may speedily become so acute as to demand a new line of conduct on the part of our Government, is obviously among the possibilities. The difficulty is painful and enormous. It sometimes looks as if Mexicans were making impossible any settled government in their country. The vicious old habits of revolution and brigandage seem to be asserting themselves with redoubled power, after lying dormant for a generation. It would be folly to grasp that hornet's nest rashly. The suggestion has been made of some form of joint international appeal to Mexicans to throw down their weapons on both sides, and to choose a President in an honest election next October, and then hold up his hands, so that the land might have a breathing space to recover from the harrying of the past two years. This was the plan of Mr. Sherrill, our former Minister to Argentina. He would confine this sort of combined warning and offer of help to the countries this side the Atlantic. But there is no reason why Germany and France and England should not be asked to join in such a movement. They have large interests in Mexico, and there is nothing in the Monroe Doctrine to prevent their attending to them. It is possible that President Wilson may be able to work out a plan of this sort, which need not at first go beyond united diplomatic action. This certainly would be far more significant and telling than any act of mere "recognition" of Huerta.

A RESIGNATION AND A MORAL.

Even those who have been compelled to criticise severely President Mellen's management of the New Haven, will receive the news of his resignation with mingled feelings. In them gloating over his misfortunes will have no part. There is no occasion for anything like personal animus against him. Nor is there any reason for denying him marked ability. He has displayed initiative and force; and if the term of his presidency had fallen in other times, or if he had been able to add to his great driving power certain other qualities of leadership, he might have been thought of as a conspicuous success. No one will now think that; and his retirement may well raise the question why he failed. Was he a victim of conditions too powerful for him? Or was he the architect of his own disaster?

The judicious will hesitate to answer these questions dogmatically. The exact apportionment of praise or blame in such matters is difficult. Yet we did not need to wait for the damaging report on the New Haven by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be aware that Mr. Mellen had come far short of what is nowadays expected of the president of an important railway. In a sense, he appeared as a sort of survival from an earlier period. Particularly was this the case in his general attitude towards the public which he served. In addition to appearing far too indifferent in the matter of the equipment of his road and in seeking to meet the convenience of his patrons, he contrived to give the impression of a manager who would pay no attention to protests, and was content to wrap himself in a kind of complacent isolation. This recalls the typical old-time railway man. It was for him to do whatever he thought best in the way whether of financing or operating his lines, and the outside public must neither meddle nor complain. But this air of superiority and Olympian aloofness no longer sits well on railway presidents; and President Mellen's clinging to it, perhaps half-unconsciously, was undoubtedly one of the causes of his unpopularity and of his downfall.

There were larger causes, of course, and these are now wholly evident, though they may have seemed obscure for some years. Chief of them was the obvious intent of the New Haven management to obtain a monopoly of transportation in New England. This purpose was not necessarily nefarious in itself. But monopolies are kittle-cattle. They have to be handled with great skill, or there will be trouble; and it is abundantly clear that the attempted New Haven monopoly was not skilfully handled. First of all, it was not a financial success. All kinds of little monopolies were loaded upon the back of the big one, and it was not broad enough to hold them. New Haven stock had for many years been thought of very much like Government bonds for security. But the succession of immense investments by the road—some of them made at notoriously inflated prices—soon depressed the price of New Haven stock ominously, and then dividends had to be reduced. As the stock was widely held, the resultant feeling of apprehension and of complaint against the management became extended. This was blunder number one by the monopolists. In the vulgar, they bit off more than they could chew.

The second great blunder lay in President Mellen's relation, not to his stockholders, but to the New England public. As his securities fell in price, so his roads declined in efficiency of service. It has been said that the New Haven monopoly might have been put beyond successful attack if it had met three conditions. The first was that it should be highly successful financially. The second was that it should serve shippers and passengers in a demonstrably superior manner. The third was that the management should have an appearance of great frankness and cordiality in all of its dealings with the public. But President Mellen failed at all three points. He lost money for his stockholders. He increased the numbers of complaining patrons. He provoked an intense public feeling against himself and his road. This was more than hostility to the idea of monopoly as such. If the monopolistic management of the New Haven had been a glittering success, there would doubtless have been those to object to it and possibly to attack it on legal grounds and as a matter of public policy. But they could scarcely have made headway had not the would-be monopolists played unwittingly into their hands. If the various districts of New England had been served as never before; if the merger with the Boston & Maine had removed, instead of intensifying, long-standing complaints against that road; and if the New Haven had cultivated friendly relations with the people and sought to ingratiate itself everywhere—why, Mr. Brandeis and the others might have protested, but the mass of railway patrons would have said: "Well, call it monopoly or what you will, we know that we are getting better facilities at lower cost and we like it." This was the great chance of the New Haven, but it missed it.

The moral of all this does not need to be labored. Mr. Mellen has shown railway presidents how not to do it. His directors must take their due share of the blame, but it is the president who embodies to the public the spirit of the management, and it is that spirit which now stands discredited along with Mr. Mellen. It is idle to say that senseless clamor or the wicked misrepresentations of newspapers brought about his resignation. It was the dead weight of the facts that finally dragged him down. And we may be sure that wide-awake and younger railway men, more sensitive than he could be to the present-day conditions under which they must do their work, will be careful to avoid walking in the path which Mr. Mellen has blazed with failure.

JUDICIAL FITNESS AND THE RECALL.

The story of the Cohalan case is sure to be used by our Progressive friends as an argument for recall of judges by popular vote. That it presents a tempting opportunity for this purpose is evident. The very fact that the case for his removal by the Legislature, under the Constitutional provision which empowers that body to remove judges "for cause," is not clear beyond question, gives point to the plea for the more indefinite and more arbitrary process of recall by vote of the people. The Progressive leader in the Assembly last week voted to sustain the committee report dismissing the charges, but at the same time stated that, under the recall system, which he favored, Cohalan would properly come within the class of judges who should be removed from office by popular vote. We believe that there is a certain amount of confusion of thought in this view of Mr. Schaap's; the Constitution as it stands gives the Legislature discretion amply covering the case. It permits the removal of judges "for cause"; and while a vote to remove on grounds that are really partisan or personal, and upon a mere pretext of bona-fide "cause," would be in violation of the intent of the Constitution, and would be altogether abhorrent, the determination whether the facts brought out in the Cohalan case are, or are not, sufficient cause turns essentially on the standard of judicial fitness entertained by members of the Legislature. Nevertheless, it may be freely admitted that the system of popular recall would introduce a greater latitude of judgment, and would, in its natural exercise, permit the removal of some judges whom it would not be proper for the Legislature to remove under the existing system.

The trouble about the advocates of the recall is that they fix their minds on the advantage that might occasionally be gained in this way, and shut their eyes to the far broader and more pervasive evils that their proposal is calculated to bring about. Even in the particular matter of the recall of judges accused of improper conduct, it is far from clear that the advantage would outweigh the disadvantage. A scoundrel like Connolly might easily find means of blackening the reputation of a more worthy judge than Cohalan; and, if that judge happened to have rendered himself in any way unpopular, what chance would there be of a careful and impartial sifting of the evidence by the mass of the voters? We do not say that many would vote to sustain charges which they thought were false. But for one man that would do that there are ten thousand who will, without proper evidence, believe charges to be true against a man towards whom they entertain a dislike; and a mere suspicion that the charges are true will suffice to cause them to cast their vote against him under a system which not only relieves them of any avowed responsibility for their action, but is expressly advocated on the ground that it leaves them free to vote without reference to any clearly defined principles of action. Whether the danger of injustice to upright and honorable judges under the recall, would not, upon the whole, be greater under the recall than the danger of immunity for unworthy judges under the existing system, is at least an open question.

But all of this is only a very minor phase of the whole matter. The demand for the recall is essentially based upon the opportunity it would afford of getting rid of a judge not on account of acts arising out of his life off the bench —either before or during his tenure of the judicial office—but on account of his acts in the seat of justice. It is the rightfulness or wrongfulness of these upon which it is desired to give the people the power to pass summary judgment. Whether the objection to them is made on the ground of corruption, or of favoritism, or of insensibility to popular demands, the people are to have it in their power to say at any time that he does not satisfy their notion of what a judge ought to be, and peremptorily to terminate his career. There is no doubt that by this process some undesirable judges would be got rid of who now remain on the bench. But the idea that this is the way to elevate the general standard of judicial fitness is not only crude, but childish. Such little good as might be done by the occasional recall of a bad judge for good reason would be vastly more than counterbalanced by the indisposition of lawyers of the highest type to accept judgeships from which they might be removed without good reason. To go on the bench means, for such men, a pecuniary loss as it is; but the dignity of the office, under a secure tenure, makes a compensating attraction. And when we add to this potency for keeping strong men off the bench, the natural tendency of the recall to lessen the independence, on the bench, of any but the strongest men, we see that the recall, so far from curing the deficiencies of the American bench, is calculated to produce a diametrically opposite effect.

Both the recall of judges and the recall of judicial decisions are happy-thought devices for getting immediate "results" by easy-going methods which ignore the fundamentals of the matter with which they deal. If the judges should not have power to settle the interpretation of the Constitution, let them be deliberately deprived of that power; to give them the power, but subject it to reversal by popular vote, would be to turn it into mockery. And as for the tenure of judges, it is singular that in all the criticism of them which is so fashionable in Progressive circles, one never hears a word about the extraordinary fact that the kind of complaint made about our courts is peculiar to this democratic country. Nothing like it is heard in England or France or Germany. What we want here is judges as capable, as fearless, and as efficient as those who administer essentially the same law in England; but in England they get them by appointing that kind in the first place, and appointing them for life. If we want good judges, or good legislators, or good mayors, we have got to take such steps as are necessary to procure them. We shall never get them by merely shouting, "Let the people rule!"

THE NEW LAUREATE.

There will be disappointment in some quarters over the selection of Robert Bridges as Poet Laureate. Those who by their much speaking have appeared to have poetry most at heart and have hoped for a new order and expression, may be excused if they feel some bitterness. To their minds poetry, like all other things in this age, must be progressive and leave off singing of Arcady and pretty, outworn loves. Surely, they reasoned, the general reproach which followed the appointment of Alfred Austin would forestall for the present the singling out of another obscure figure. Yet they are asked to do obeisance to a new Laureate who is scarcely known to English readers at large and whose work reveals no pronounced elements of the pressing present. It has none of Masefield's colloquial passions, nor the abounding young visions of Alfred Noyes; it has not Kipling's downright force. In some respects Robert Bridges is not so modern as Tennyson, for his moral judgments are less explicit and have not that sweet sting of sentiment for each occasion which the Victorian has accustomed English readers to expect of the poet. Though not a pagan, like Swinburne, Dr. Bridges is given to looking backward, and has sought inspiration from such ancients as Homer, Æschylus, Terence, Apuleius, Calderón, Lope de Vega, Stendhal. If he must be pigeonholed, his sympathies relate him not a little to the confident days of the late Renaissance.

His very versatility points in that direction. Now in his sixty-ninth year, a graduate of Eton and Oxford, for many years a practicing physician, he has to his credit a large body of lyrics, including some three-score sonnets in sequence, called "The Growth of Love," a long poetical version of "Eros and Psyche," librettos for oratorios, a masque, above half-a-dozen poetical dramas in various manners, experiments in classical metres, an essay on Keats, and a study of Milton's prosody. Here is a body of verse which the fluent Mr. Noyes may perchance never exceed; and if its interests prompt our moderns to cry out "old fogy!" it is significant that the author does not lend himself easily to comparison with any but poets of recognized importance, in style quite as much as substance. He stands deeply rooted in the great tradition, and the genuineness of his poetic feeling cannot be gainsaid. Besides, he perpetuates some of the finest English associations, especially of country life, which he sees full of warmth and color.

In spite of the preponderance of dramatic form in his work, Robert Bridges is essentially a lyric poet, showing in this capacity the natural instinct and finish of a Jacobean. Perhaps that is the reason for the charge brought against him that he lacks the outcries of passion, and that he deliberately purges his work of all excitements. He is not a Burns, it is true, yet the lyric mood embraces many manners, and it is a narrow critic who fails to find it strong and true in this writer. Quotation of whole poems is not necessary to show his facility:

> So sweet love seemed that April morn,
> When first we kissed beside the thorn,
> So strangely sweet, it was not strange
> We thought that love could never change.

The following passage, which opens one of his sonnets:

> Since not the enamour'd sun with glance more fond > Kisses the foliage of his sacred tree
> Than doth my waking thought arise on thee, has something of the spacious surface beauty and precise, if old-fashioned, imagery of a romantic description by Shakespeare.

In one poem, "Nightingales," Dr. Bridges has caught the other-worldliness dear to Keats, with a simplicity of language which the latter seldom knew:

Beautiful must be the mountains whence ye come;
And bright in the fruitful valleys the streams, wherefrom
Ye learn your song:
Where are those starry woods? O might I wander there,
Among the flowers which in that heavenly air
Bloom the year long.

Lest the impression be given that the world has concealed all these years a luminary of the first rank, it is only fair to say that not all of Dr. Bridges's poems maintain the standard of the portions quoted. Especially in his dramas he is often the victim of his virtuosity, and becomes garrulous, though like Shelley not always unpleasantly so. The dramatic situation moves him less than its poetic content. Yet where he is characterizing the shading and complexity, the vaunt of human impulses—matters which only poetry can fully catch—he reaches noble heights. So, in the following speech of Petronius in the second part of "Nero," the resemblance to Shakespeare is again striking:

You little think What charm the witching night hath for her lovers;
How her solemnity doth deepen thought,
And bring again the lost hellenic Muse
To sing from heaven; or on moonlit swards
Of fancy shadows in transfigured scene
The history of man.—Thus, like a god
I dwell; and take the early morning cries
For calls of sleep; and from divinity
Fall to forgetfulness, while bustling day
Ravages life; and know no more of it,—
Your riot and din, the plots and cries of Rome,—
Than doth a diver in Arabian seas, Plunging for pearls heneath the lonely
blue:
But o'er my slumhering head soft airs of dreamland
Rock their wild honey-hlooms, till the shy stars
Once more are venturing forth, and I awake.
Is not that something?

That the new Laureate will take easily to celebrating patriotic occasions is not probable. In one sonnet he has sung of the steel ship in befitting terms. But if, as seems likely, peace more and more shall have her victories, it is hard to think of any one better suited to make of her an alluring picture. Finally, it may be wondered whether Mr. Asquith got a penny's worth of pleasure from appointing one who in these days has dared to write, even in a triolet:

All women born are so perverse
No man need boast their love possessing.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

When, in these columns (August 15, 1912), Mr. Axon transcribed from the Christian Reformer for March, 1835, George Dyer's short memoir of Charles Lamb, he recovered for us an obituary notice which was, in all probability, unknown to all students of the present day. Whether any of their predecessors were aware of it is problematical; certainly none of Lamb's editors, no inconsiderable number, have referred to it. The credit of this interesting discovery must, therefore, be placed to its finder's account. No sooner had we done felicitating ourselves on this pleasant though, perhaps, slight acquisition to our knowledge of the best beloved of authors than there turned up in one of the London salesrooms an unpublished letter written to George Dyer, in which the writer refers to two memoirs by the old blind scholar—one, undoubtedly, that brought to light hy Mr. Axon, the other, as I hope to prove, establishing the authorship of a contribution on the same subject to the Gentleman's Magazine for the same month and year in which the memoir in the Christian Reformer had appeared. The letter runs thus:

Dear Sir,

I was much gratified on hearing that you and Mrs. Dyer were going to dine at Amen Corner with Mr. Tate. At the same time I learnt that you have entirely lost your sight, which must sadly detract from your enjoyments, though perhaps the gradually increasing decay may have finally reconciled you to total deprivation.

You would, I think, be well pleased with your visit. The Canon has the traits to win your regards—fine scholarship, vigorous understanding, a kind heart, and generous sentiments. Though you could not now, alas! see your welcome in his honest face, you would feel it in the grip of his hand, hear it in the tone of his voice, and at once fall into free conversation. . . .

The chief purpose of my letter is to thank you for the two little memoirs of your amiable friend Charles Lamb, dictated by yourself: but I have also something more to say about him. His death and the comments on his character and writings revived recollections of the disquiet that was at first caused you by the appearance of one of his essays in the London Magazine* and the correspondence to which it gave rise while we knew not who Elia was. To your mind also this event may have brought back similar remembrances, and an anxiety may have very naturally arisen, which you perhaps have too great delicacy to avow, as to the fate of the long confiding letter which you wrote to me respecting your "commencing life" &c. as Elia phrased it. You may be wishful that the particulars should not he lost, and yet be fearful about any imprudent or improper use of the little sketch. It has never been shown to any one, and now, as the blotted original could hardly be made out so as to be fluently read to you, I have destroyed it, after first making the single fair copy which I send you. . . .

Make my best respects to Mrs. Dyer, & believe me

Yours, my dear Sir, most sincerely—

WM. KING.

Richmond, Yorkshire, 21 March, 1835.

*"Oxford in the Vacation." Lond. Mag., October, 1820, the charm of which is largely due to the details—biographical and other—concerning George Dyer, "born without original sin I verily believe."

The writer of the foregoing letter was the friend who, on the appearance of the Elia essay containing the references to himself to which George had objected, wrote to the editor of the London Magazine. In the following number the editor evidently replies to William King's letter in the following words: "W. K. will see we have made use of his paper; and we trust he will excuse the liberty we have taken with the communication. We had long been regarding the subject as calling for notice." Apparently the "liberty" the editor had taken was to send the letter to Lamb for his comments thereon, for in the December number there appeared the well-known reply of Elia which has been frequently reprinted by Lamb's editors. Dyer's letter to King, the details of which we suppose the latter embodied in his "paper," was printed, on George Dyer's death, in the Mirror, November 13, 1841. So much is, perhaps, necessary in explanation of some of the references in King's letter.

I now come to the proof of George Dyer's authorship of the notice in the Gentleman's Magazine; and as a complete set of that journal is not likely to be in the possession of many, nor, perhaps, easily accessible for reference, it is here transcribed:

Dec. 27. At Edmonton, after a short illness, aged 60, Mr. Charles Lamb, a gentleman well known to the public for his many pleasing works in prose and verse.

Mr. Lamb was a native of Lincolnshire. In his 8th year he was sent to Christ's Hospital, where he derived his taste for general literature, and his fitness for the pursuits of commercial life. He continued there till 1789, about which time he obtained a situation as clerk in the East India House, where he continued till the year 1825, and then retired, with a handsome annuity, on the superannuated list.

Mr. Lamb's principal works were as follows:—A small volume entitled "Blank Verse," printed in 1798 in conjunction with his friend Charles Lloyd; "Specimens of the English Dramatic Poets," 1808. Two dramatic pieces, "John Woodvil," a tragedy, and "Mr. H.," an afterpiece. "Rosomond Grey," a beautiful pathetic tale, and "Old Blind Margery" (sic). The works of Charles Lamb, 2 vols., 1818. "Elia," 1823, a collection of Essays which were the most admired of his works, and appeared originally in the London Magazine. "Album Verses," 1830. "The Adventures of Ulysses," and "Tales from Shakespeare," 2 vols. The last essays of "Elia," 1833. Subsequently to his specimens of the English Dramatic Poets, he published a second series, which appeared in Mr. Hone's Every Day Book, under the head of "Garrick Papers," extracted from the valuable collection in the British Museum, and that work is illustrated with very valuable notes by Mr. Lamb. To the list of his productions may be added a small poem entitled, "Satan in Quest of a Wife"; and he also aided his sister, Miss Mary Lamb, in her elegant little work, entitled, "Mrs. Leycester's School."

On considering Mr. Lamb as diligently engaged in the pursuits of commercial life, it might surprise us that he could find leisure to write so much for the public; but the truth is, his faculties were extraordinary. The wit that he brought with him from school continued to flow uniformly and to increase through the whole course of his life. It was almost as natural with him to say witty things as to breathe; he could not enter a room without a joke, and he may be said almost to have conversed in extemporaneous humour. Nor did his discourse consist of merely sportive pleasantries; they had often the force of eloquence joined with the solidity of argument, enlivened and softened by a humanity and benevolence which invariably beamed in his countenance. Perhaps, too, they were a little increased by his infirmities; for he had a defect in his utterance, which gave a somewhat of quaintness and peculiarity of tone to his conversation. Overflowing as his spirits were, they never exceeded the bounds of propriety and decorum; and towards the fair sex, though he was never married, he never failed to evince the kindest feeling and purest respect.

Mr. Lamb has left behind him no other relation but a sister already mentioned, who is as amiable in disposition as himself, and who shares a considerable share of literary talent. They were similar in their characters, their manners, and their studies; and there cannot be well conceived a more perfect example of fraternal and sisterly love, and untiring friendship, than that which existed between them, and which Mr. Lamb has elegantly alluded to in one of his poems, and likewise in one of his papers entitled "Mackery End," wherein he says, "I wish that I could throw into a heap the remainder of our joint existences that we might share them in equal division—but that is impossible."

The present tribute of respect to the memory of this estimable gentleman is offered by the same pen which gave a previous account of Mr. Lamb's works in the Gentleman's Magazine.

Although the article was not signed, as was the one in the Christian Reformer, the use of many of the same phrases, the similarity in the general arrangement and of its tone, with the repetition of the same blunders, such as "Rosomond Grey" for "Rosamund Gray"; "Satan in Quest of a Wife" for "Satan in Search of a Wife"; "Mrs. Leycester's School" for "Mrs. Leicester's School"; and the statement that the "Garrick Papers" (sic) appeared in Hone's Every Day Book instead of in the Table Book seem to point to a common authorship. But, undoubtedly, the most important evidence is to be found in the concluding sentence of the article, which states that the writer is the one who reviewed Lamb's works in the Gentleman's Magazine; for, when George Dyer died, in 1841, it was mentioned in the obituary notice in that journal that "his contributions to the various periodicals of the time were numerous, more especially to the New Monthly . . . and to the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he reviewed the works of his friends, Admiral Burney and Charles Lamb."

It may be of some interest to add that Matilda Betham, the common friend of the Lambs and of George Dyer, contributed to the Christian Reformer for September, 1841, "some biographical particulars of the late George Dyer, B.A."

Correspondence

THE HUERTA GOVERNMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The refusal of the United States Government to recognize the Huerta Government in Mexico may be magnificent, but it is doubtful if it is good diplomacy. Presumably such action is based on the disapproval of the murder of Madero (a fact) by Huerta, Díaz, and Mondragón (a questionable supposition). Presumably the purpose of this refusal of recognition is to deter the Mexicans from the commission of such a crime again. We are the (self-constituted) guardians of Mexico and the Latin-American republics, and we take this opportunity to let them know that we don't like the way they manage their politics. We protect them from exterior aggression (without being asked), and we frown when their private, domestic quarrels do not suit us.

The practical effect of such refusal on the part of the United States has been to jeopardize American lives, ruin American property, to irritate the governing powers in Mexico, and to furnish ground for our critics in Latin-America to call us hypocritical when we are not puerile. The official disapproval at Washington has about as much effect on crimes of violence in Mexico as Mrs. Partington's mop had on the Atlantic.

Can it possibly be that Mr. Bryan does not understand Mexican history and political habits? Madero was overthrown by Felix Díaz by force of arms. Madero seized the Government from the hands of Porfirio Díaz when the latter was too old and feeble to fight. Don Porfirio settled the succession between himself and Lerdo on the field of battle. Lerdo was the (for a while) peaceful successor of Juárez, who certainly had to fight for the Presidency. Bloodshed has accompanied change in administration since the days of the last viceroy.

Nor is Mexico alone in this respect. Excepting, in recent years, Chili, the Argentine, and Cuba, a change in Spanish-American rulers has almost always been accomplished by force of arms. We elect with ballots; they elect with bullets. We learned to govern ourselves little by little through a thousand years of experiment; they virtually had liberty thrust on them a hundred years ago and have not learned yet the lesson of orderly self-government.

Don Porfirio gave Mexico the best government it ever knew: just, clean, and favorable to Americans. Madero seized the government and failed disastrously to govern Mexico. The Huerta-Diaz faction represents old Porfirio's party—undoubtedly the most stable and enlightened element in Mexico. They are our friends and we are deliberately stabbing them in the back.

CATHOLICS AND INTOLERANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of July 17 appears a letter from Prof. Addison Hogue, of Washington and Lee University, on Catholics and intolerance, in which certain peculiar and erroneous statements are made. He says:

> Now it is perfectly well known that the Roman Catholics cherish an intense dislike to our public-school system.

Again:

> Nor is there any occasion to charge the slightest tinge of sectarianism, when we Protestants, holding tenaciously to our political doctrine of entire separation of church and state, do not feel like entrusting too much political power to those whose fundamental doctrine, held as tenaciously as we hold ours, is the union of church and state, and such a union that the state is subservient to the church, and "the" church is their church.

I am a Catholic; I have a son at a public school; many of his schoolmates are Catholics; several of his teachers have been Catholics; I believe in our public-school system; I am utterly opposed to a union of church and state; I have not been forbidden by the church to hold these views; I share them with a great majority of American Catholics, as I believe. So far as union of church and state is concerned, I know no American Catholic who believes in it.

A COMPLACENT BRITISH REVIEW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the last number of the Journal of Hellenic Studies, there appeared a brief, though not unfavorable, review of the recently published "Columbia Lectures on Greek Literature." One remark in the review is rather interesting as a survival of that patronizing "condescension in foreigners" which, in the past generation, gave Lowell the material for his essay, and which still seems now and then to lurk amid the hedge-rows of English scholarship. The reviewer says: "A pleasing American weakness—a somewhat exaggerated national pride—appears in an amusing form in one passage. On page 38 we find the Greeks described as 'a highly gifted people whose civilization, if measured by the standard of the number of perfected men it produced, may well be pronounced not inferior to our own.'"

Now, of course, no person who did not himself possess a somewhat exaggerated sense of nationality could fail to see that Professor Smyth meant by "our own" not American, but modern civilization in general. Probably the homme sensuel moyen in this country is almost as prone as ever, and as prone as many a London "tripper" to the Continent, to wave his country's flag in inappropriate places, but to imply that this is done by such persons as the writers of these lectures is amusingly wide of the mark. The American scholar of to-day is more commonly accused of forgetting the solid achievements of his country in his impatience with certain of its crudities.

The reviewer speaks of "archaic forms" used by the writers. It would have been interesting if he had cited a few of these, because of the undoubted fact that one finds, even among well-educated people here, older forms of the language in daily use. Considerable care, however, is needed in detecting such forms of expression, lest one fall into the error of an English reviewer of Professor Shorey's "Horace," who unfortunately picked out as a specimen of transatlantic vivacity a phrase which was quoted from Tennyson.

THE GEORGE BORROW CELEBRATION IN NORWICH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For a man who was generally believed to be dead long before he died, George Borrow has suffered no very long neglect; and the spectacle of a cordial commemoration of his life and genius in the ancient city of Norwich is full compensation for the brief indifference and delay. Born in 1803 and dying in 1881, he was for the greater part of his life a wandering, restless man engaged in distributing Bibles and studying the habits and language of the gypsies. Whatever repose he may have had, for at least thirty years he found in Norwich; and the house in which he lived with his father and mother has now been bought by Mr. Arthur Samuel, the present Lord Mayor, and presented as a Borrow shrine to the corporation. It was more particularly to celebrate this generous deed that Borrow lovers from all over England and from points as remote as Australia and the United States gathered on July 5 and 6.

In company with the Lord Mayor and others of the committee, the visitors were taken on a stroll of two hours or more to most of the scenes of Borrow's life in Norwich. In the Castle Museum one room was wholly devoted to Borrow mementos—portraits, autograph letters, manuscripts, and sketches. Close by, the Horse Market, with its nervous, stamping animals, presented a scene that must have been quite the same as that which Borrow often saw and recorded. The walk continued then to the grammar school, where, between his whispered and thrilling tales to the boys, young George learned Latin; to the old Crown and Angel Inn, where his father took him when he was recruiting men for the army; to that other ancient hostelry, The Bowling Green, or what remains of it, where he met "the bruisers of England, men of tremendous renown," and frankly endeavored to add to their glory; to Tuck's Court, where Borrow was articled to the law; and finally to the Borrow house in Willow Lane, now cleared of its tenants and soon to become a memorial museum. The house sits in a retired spot overlooking a tiny court with brilliant beds of English blossom, and opening from its rear windows upon the playground presented to the town by Jenny Lind.

In the great hall of St. Andrew's, the people of Norwich and the visitors gathered in the afternoon for a programme of several things. The Lord Mayor in his scarlet robes, and the mace-bearers, with their golden braid and historic trappings, were there to bestow and accept the gift. Sir Robertson Nicoll and Mr. Clement Shorter were there to pay tribute to both Borrow and the benefactor, and a band of genuine gypsies, procured by the Gypsy and Folk Lore Club of London, were there to sing in gypsy vernacular the wild, strange songs which Borrow himself had so often heard and learned.

In the very ancient inn, The Maid's Head, a dinner was given in the evening, at which the Lord Mayor presided; and seventy or more Borrovians, as they are pleased to be called, assembled to do festive honor to the lord of gypsy lore. It is something to record that England's gifted writer and statesman, the Honorable Augustine Birrell, responded eloquently to the toast "The Immortal Memory of Borrow"; that Sir Sidney Lee, representing perhaps the great Shakespeare Memorial of Stratford, of which he is a trustee, came down from London to answer for "Borrovians All Over the World"; that sitting next to Sir Sidney was Mrs. Knapp, the widow of Dr. Knapp, Borrow's American biographer, the great authority on all things Borrovian. And it is still more worth remembering that on the following day, Sunday, July 6, in the hallowed and echoing spaces of Norwich Cathedral, the Very Rev. the Dean of Norwich preached to a great congregation on "Borrow the Seer and Interpreter of Life."

All this may mean that Borrow has come into his own and that his works are at last to be accorded a permanent place in the rich continuity of English letters. But while only a frail emphasis was put upon Borrow as the apostle of the open air, it is this doubtless that explains his new clutch upon the hearts of the English world. To live on the heath, to rejoice in the black night of stars, to taste the wind and breathe the fragrance of the open road, to be glad of all life and living things, both man and beast—this, above all things else, denotes the spirit of Borrow. In the mystery of the English twilight we walked with one who knew the man, out upon the dark rolling Heath of Mousehold above Norwich. It was there in a sheltered hollow where the gypsies pitched their tents, and it was there beneath the stars where Lavengro and Jaspar spoke together in the lines so often quoted.

TOURIST CHARGES AT ANCIENT RUINS

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is not necessary to have visited Greece or Sicily many times to perceive how misleading are Professor D'Ooge's statements in the Nation of June 5. He complains pathetically of the two francs fifty for entrance to Pompeii and of the extra tips incurred for opening locked gates and doors. If he had shown any adequate reason, the director of excavations would have furnished him immediately with a free card of admission for Naples, Pompeii, Herculaneum, Paestum, etc. In regard to his remarks on the conditions in Sicily (the only portion of Italy in which there are Greek remains of great importance), it is not true that a charge is imposed for entrance to the temples. There is no charge whatever at Taormina, Girgenti, Segesta, Selinunte, and most of Syracusa. No payment is asked in Greece because but a handful of tourists, or even Greeks, visit the monuments outside Athens. Wait until tourists invade Greece in the same numbers as those which overrun Italy. Then there will be a change.

Yes, the inns of Delphi, Nauplia, and Olympia "are more than tolerable." In similar resorts in America there are no such decently managed hotels at such prices, although these are about a hundred per cent. above ordinary Greek rates.

It is quite true that if you go to a bank or money changer, you will find no exchange given for moneys of other countries. But Mr. D'Ooge omits to say that in some places in Greece even Greek money is refused; that banks charge a commission, place a tax stamp of two francs on checks, and if you ask for gold charge an enormous rate of exchange; while steamship companies, at least those by which I travelled, refused Greek money altogether, and some fellow-travellers who tried to exchange it out of Greece were charged, I believe, 50 per cent.

As to the restorations of the Acropolis, I should call them rebuilding, but I am not an archæologist. As to the care of remains, why, at Delphi every stone is numbered! And the director, when not peddling or permitting embroideries to be peddled in the museum, takes cheerfully six cents for showing you the door. At Corinth—a condition which the American School is responsible for—a museum has been erected with a blank wall utterly hiding the historic view of the Temple. If the American School did not commit this vandalism, they allowed it to be done, and are equally guilty of artless vulgarity. At Epidorus a Swiss châlet has been erected in the purest style of American jig-saw work bang in front of the theatre, while a luncheon bar in the same style of art decorates one side. It may be Mr. D'Ooge did not visit these spots or Ægina; or it may be he was one of the other two foreigners who the guide told me had been there—at Ægina this year. Although there was no entrance fee at Epidorus, I had to pay forty francs for a carriage; fifteen francs to the man who got it; five francs to the driver; two francs to the guardian of the theatre; I had to carry dinner for the three people, and I forget what else. This is typical. No, they don't charge admission in Greece, they "do" you in more magnificent fashion.

"THOSE MOLASSES."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: To the communication in your issue of July 17 on "Plural Molasses" may be added the testimony of Professor Gildersleeve (American Journal of Philology, Vol. 32, pp. 234f.): "'Molasses' in certain parts of our country is a plural. During the Civil War it was a scarce article, and, as I have noted elsewhere, the plural might have been set down as a pluralis maiestatis, and there are those who can bear witness to the curious extension of analogy to the once familiar and always dire substitute for molasses. The same people who said 'those molasses' said also 'those sorghum.'"

In this group of works we find science and philosophy seeking to make room for the conceptions of religion, theology ready to meet the demands of modern thought. This reunion of philosophy and theology in the discussion of identical problems is one of the very recent signs of the times.

"The Value and Destiny of the Individual" is the second series of Bosanquet's Gifford Lectures. In the Nation's review of the first series ("The Principle of Individuality and Value," August 8, 1912), it was suggested that, in Mr. Bosanquet, absolute idealism is in danger of falling over backwards into materialism. This impression is confirmed by the second series. An individualist whose imagination has been stimulated by the titles will sympathize with the English farmers who bought Ruskin on "Sheepfolds." The principle of individuality, he will learn, is just the opposite of the principle of individualism; and as for the value or destiny of the individual, that is precisely not his affair. For that matter, no materialist could show us a universe more indifferent to all that is specifically human. You, my friend, are but a finite fragment of the whole, and all that really matters is the whole.

Yet the argument is, as any idealistic argument is bound to be, a humanistic argument. For Mr. Bosanquet the absolute is a "spiritual membership" the nature of which is to be deduced from what is finest in human character and in the social relations of men. What, then, is the finest? Mr. Bosanquet's reply is: the self-surrender of greatness. For him, then, no vulgar "happiness"; in other words, no vulgar longing for personal immortality. The absolute tolerates but one individuality, and that is its own. Christianity is indeed "a great world-experience," but Christian theology (to borrow a phrase from Mr. Moberly in "Foundations") is "a piece of anthropomorphic picture-thinking." Yet we may ask whether the supreme detachment of the absolute is not itself an anthropomorphism—the detachment, namely, of a mind too great in ideas, but again too limited in scope of attention to care for individual destinies.

In any case, the point of the argument lies in the interpretation of the social relation as a spiritual fact. In the logic of things spiritual Mr. Bosanquet is easily a master; yet to the reviewer it seems that at the crucial point in the argument—in a crucial illustration—he has missed the point. Individualistic justice, with its claims and counter-claims, is, we are told, a conception doubtless suited to the economic world, but "the great world of spiritual membership to which really and in the end we belong, takes no account at all of such finite claims." For example: "we feel that to make a great poet, say, the richest man in his community would be irrelevant and self-contradictory"; among other things, "it is not what he wants." But "not what he wants" is a rather damaging irrelevancy. To make the case concrete, since poetry is not just now a "going concern," let us substitute the college professor. When comparison is made between the income of the most distinguished scholar and the many thousands earned by men of high rank in the more paying professions, the reply is rightly made that the desire for great wealth and splendid living is hardly in accord with the scholar's pretensions. They are not what your true scholar wants. In the meantime there is a scheme of things embodying what he does want, and among them a reasonable leisure, including pecuniary leisure, which will enable him more freely both to live the life that he enjoys and to do the things that he can do best. If we have read the "Republic" rightly, this specially individualized claim is what Plato, the Messiah of Mr. Bosanquet's philosophy, would have been disposed to recognize. It looks as if Mr. Bosanquet had been guilty of measuring the personal claim by the desire to fill one's purse, and thus of supposing that the only alternative to pecuniary greed (the "individualism" of popular thought) is self-sacrifice and self-surrender. But, as he is fond of remarking, "it takes all sorts of men to make a world"; and, if the sorts are real, then each has his claim, not according to quantity, but according to individual quality and significance. Mr. Bosanquet thinks that in surrendering these claims we transcend any merely finite self-consciousness. Our question is whether a transcendence of self which obliterates self is not a retreat from idealism to materialism.

The spiritual membership greets us again, but in a more approachable attitude, in Prof. Royce's Hibbert Lectures on "The Problem of Christianity"; again the central problem is the value and destiny of the individual; and again the argument is based upon what seems finest and best in the relations of men. The present work is less impressively solid than the author's "World and Individual." The ideas are fewer, and there is less ground for the attitude of leisurely suspense. The work is none the less a notable contribution to the interpretation of Christian ideas. The style is perhaps too stately, but masterly from the standpoint of clearness of exposition and often eloquent. And it must be said that the main purpose has been achieved, namely, of showing that the problem of Christianity is a problem deeply rooted in human thought and human nature.

"The Christian Doctrine of Life," treated in the first volume, presents three leading ideas: (1) The idea of the community, historically represented by the Church—it is mainly Pauline Christianity that Professor Royce expounds; (2) the idea of the lost state of the natural man; (3) the idea of atonement, with the more general idea of saving grace. In the history of the race the deepest and most universal need of man is for salvation from the burden of sin. Modern thought, to be sure, discounts the idea of sin; yet even modern thought may see the point if we ask how a corrupt and treacherous man can ever become genuinely honorable. Now, the meaning of Christianity is that salvation cannot be reached through any merely human knowledge or culture. No calculation of mutual advantage can bring about a whole-hearted faithfulness. At its very best, culture leaves the individual isolated and unsatisfied. Salvation comes, then, through a loyal devotion of self to a leader, a cause, a community; and the type of such community, the universal community, is the Church as expounded by Paul. Thus it appears, not unexpectedly, that Christianity is "the religion of loyalty"; and thus far, but hardly further, Professor Royce is a Christian. Yet thus far it may seem that he has hardly advanced beyond the rather banal substitution of "society" for God. The position is saved by the argument that the genuine community is as truly a person as the individual. Nations have their personal distinctions as well as men. But the community is a wiser as well as a more powerful person—so, at least, Royce claims—and thus worthy of our reverence. The universal community, the final object of all human aspirations, is God. "There is a sense in which all the tragedy and the attainment of an endless past and future of deeds and of fortunes enters into my own life." One who can say this finds himself in the universal and beloved community with the saints and sages of all times and in communion with God.

This power of the community to lift a man out of himself is the Christian's "saving grace." Here we should note two striking chapters on guilt ("Time and Guilt") and atonement. In reply to Matthew Arnold's disparagement of the Puritan contemplation of sin, Royce insists that a steady gaze upon the fact of sin is not a weak, but a resolute, attitude. Except as I take my past act of dishonor precisely for the fact that it was, I cannot now claim to be a genuinely honorable man. Atonement, again, is a distinctly non-natural fact. No merely good deed in the present can reconcile me to the fact that I wilfully betrayed a trust; it must be a "creative deed," by which the world "is better than it would have been had all else remained the same, but had the deed of treason not been done at all." And, according to Royce, such creative deed can issue only from the community; in other words, atonement must be vicarious.

The second volume on "The Real World and the Christian Ideas," contains some interesting analysis of the logic and metaphysics of the communal relation. Some of this suggests criticisms, which we omit in order to state once more the main issue. Can a man by nature wicked be regenerated by culture? Or—can a man regenerate himself? When Professor Royce tells us that such regeneration is an act of creation, we are reminded of other creations, such as the conception of evolution or the Eroica Symphony. Either of these is as difficult to explain by a natural process of cause and effect, or by the rules of formal logic, as the moral regeneration. Yet shall we deny that Beethoven created the symphony—that his genius was individual? Of course, it may be contended that genius itself comes from above, or from the community. However this may be, the cases are clearly similar. Nor is this the only point in which culture appears to perform the functions of "grace." For while it is true that refinement of individual taste makes sympathetic appreciation often a difficult problem, yet this very refinement, if not spurious, implies an insight which takes men out of their individual isolation and brings them to an understanding. If not this, what is the interest and significance of literature? In any case, Professor Royce has stated truly the issue between the church and the world. Whatever else is implied in the Christian idea, it clearly means that salvation comes only from above, through a power that transcends the ordinary processes of culture.

"Foundations," by seven Oxford men, fellows and tutors, is "a statement of Christian belief in terms of modern thought." The writers are N. S. Talbot, R. Brook, B. H. Streeter, A. E. J. Rawlinson, R. G. Parsons, W. Temple, and W. H. Moberly. The purpose of the essays, together with the uniformly high quality of scholarship, style, and thought, makes the work one of more than ordinary significance. The reader will find many points of contact with the ideas that we have just been considering. In "God and the Absolute" Mr. Moberly is rather deferential to Bosanquet's idealism, but makes it clear that his absolute is not yet the Christian's God.

"The Concept of Sin," Mr. Tennant's third work on sin, is an excellent piece of psychological analysis, but the style is rather severe. The purpose is to rescue the concept of sin from the fashionable tendency to identify sin with ignorance or disease. He makes a good point in showing that modern psychology is prevented from grasping the meaning of sin and moral accountability by a blind adherence to an objective standpoint, but his analysis of the subjective, or personal, standpoint—"psychic" in his own term—leaves something to be desired.

Prof. J. Y. Simpson's "Spiritual Interpretation of Nature" is the work of a biologist who is not only a theist, but even a rather old-fashioned orthodox Christian. The book is mainly a theistic interpretation of evolution. As might be expected, the writer shows a certain leaning towards writers such as Driesch and Sir Oliver Lodge, whose scientific orthodoxy is doubtful; and he goes so far as to entertain, in a footnote, the absurd suggestion that between the crucifixion and the resurrection Jesus may have occupied four-dimensional space. Yet, on the whole, his tone is sober, and neither his science nor his philosophy is superficial. One sentence reminds us how the theistic argument has changed: "The days are past when the unknown, the gap in our knowledge, was emphasized as the sure abode of the divine. Rather is it realized that the whole process is instinct with divinity."

CURRENT FICTION.

[IN COKAIGNE.]

Mixed Grill. By W. Pett Ridge. New York: George H. Doran Co.

The Happy Family. By Frank Swinnerton. The same.

Success. By Una L. Silberrad. New York: The same.

Cokaigne is a land of inexhaustible material for story-tellers. W. Pett Ridge is among the most successful of those who are just now dealing with the lighter humors of Cockney life. This group of stories, or sketches, borrows a motto from a city waiter: "If you can't make up your mind what to order, how about trying the mixed grill? You may not like all of it, but what you don t care for, you can easily leave!" The ingredients of the dish are less varied than the advertisement suggests, but they are all "tasty." A number of them, in their celebration of the practical joke, suggest the yarns of W. W. Jacobs. A few approach the treatment of character in contrast with type—the "character" of the stage. But perhaps their chief merit as a group lies in the fact that the author does not appear to be laboring for any sort of effect, serious or comic. If the tales suggest a series of "turns," they are the turns of a spontaneous performer, who enjoys himself in the process of holding an amused audience.

The two Cockney novels we have in hand are of serious type. Mr. Swinnerton's title should not mislead those readers who insist that fiction shall be pretty and agreeable. His is a happy family such as may be seen at the zoo, an incongruous assortment of breathing creatures condemned to live together, after a fashion, in one cage. That the members of the present group are linked by ties of kin and kind does not increase their charm as a composite picture. The Amersons are of the lower middle class. The head of the house is manager of a printing concern, a well-meaning man of limited ability and no outlook. He has married a fool and a sloven, who has brought into the world a family of children with just sense enough to despise her. They are all weaklings but one, "poor Mary," the Cinderella of the household, who by drudgery and management does what can be done towards giving the ménage some semblance of decency, with small thanks for her pains. A selfish prig of an elder son, a careless fribble of a younger, and their counterparts in two sisters, complete the group. The Amersons, discordant as they are, bow down to the clan fetich. They take for granted that the world is composed of their own inner circle and of the outer circles, near and remote, of their blood-relations. Even Mary, with her sound nature, grew up in the common creed, "had to believe what the other Amersons believed, and what her numerous cousins believed. And she was filled, as they were filled, with thoughts of family affairs only. . . . To her as to them, the greatest festivity imaginable was a party—a family party, to which all the most remote and stranger cousins should be summoned because of a tie that bound their diverse spirits more closely than any legal agreement." Her awakening is to come, slowly and with pain; and finally the revolt and secession which alone can give her a chance of happiness. Her figure and that of her lover apart, the picture remains a sombre one to the end. In the quiet relentlessness of its analysis the story is akin to Mr. Bennett's "Old Wives' Tale."

"Success" is a novel equally deficient in the commodities of popular romance. Its young man is a genius, to be sure, but not in the ordinary line; being merely a mechanical engineer, he cannot be charged with that famous "temperament" with which novelists, especially feminine novelists, are so fond of dealing. And, though something of the sort is threatened in the opening chapter, entanglements of sex have nothing to do with the story. There is a girl, and she is devoted to him and he to her—in every way but one. They understand each other perfectly, turn to each other instinctively in joy or trouble. There is no other man in her life, and no other woman in his. But that does not mean that there never may be; does not in itself constitute an argument for their marriage. There is nothing less conventional, nothing more sound, in the story than their conscious withdrawal from the brink of a union led up towards by circumstance, but not warranted by the love of those who wed truly. Annarly is a striking portrait of the genius which achieves by single-minded effort towards a specific end. But Nan Barmister, quiet connoisseur of antiques in her shop at Soho, faithful daughter and perfect friend, is, for reasons too subtle even to be suggested in a review, a figure still more likely to be remembered.

No display is made of her, she seems to do little and to talk less; but she manages to do what is, after all, a very rare thing in the pages of fiction: she lives.

Wallingford in His Prime. By George Randolph Chester. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co.

The Wallingford of this volume is a big, "jovially smiling" man whose "round face bore the color which could only come from years of fastidiously selected food and drink; moreover, his haberdashery, though striking, was correct and up to the minute'—and yet withal a blasé Wallingford weighed upon with heaviness and utterly consumed—at times—with weariness, who makes his moan, "looking gloomily down sunlit Broadway: 'I wish I were broke. I've got back that house on the Avenue for Fannie, and laid in a couple of bales of bonds for her and the boy, and I've bought about everything that money will buy for a man who doesn't care to be a Senator. The fun's all gone.'" Upon Blackie Daw the boredom of well-being lies even more oppressively. "'I wish I could be a sucker,' confessed Blackie sadly. 'Why, Jimmie, many and many a time I've looked at a gentle come-on being led up to the harpoon and envied him the happiness in his face.'" Not necessity, then, but that pressing need to exercise their peculiar talents which all true artists know, now takes these genial birds of prey afield, out of the safe ways of legitimate business, and sends them swooping hither and yon, seeking whose wealth they may appropriate.

This new cycle of exploits renews Wallingford's claim to being the "most enjoyable thief at large," and also recalls an earlier query as to whether he is to be regarded as a modernized Robin Hood, or as more closely akin to Buster Brown, Foxy Grandpa, and other natives of those realms of riotous burlesque of which the cartoonist is chief interpreter. The likeness of the American promoter and his loyal comedian support to the famous Sherwood robber and his good harper is superficially furthered in this volume by Blackie's acquisition of a saxophone. Indeed, the differences between them are just about the differences between a saxophone and a harp. More essential resemblances might be pointed out in several instances of financial chivalry, and in the fact that Wallingford's chief asset is always the greedy credulity of his victims. Still, it is a little hard to explain Wallingford in any way as an embodiment of outlawed justice, or (however fully he may embrace in his person all that other nations curse under the name American) as in any sense a national hero. At most, he is merely a distinctively American type of incorrigibility, lately renowned as the leading exponent of the Broadway myth.

THE BOYHOOD OF HENRY JAMES.

A Small Boy and Others. By Henry James. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50 net.

Procul, O procul este, profani! This is the inner shrine, and it may as well be said at the outset that except for the very devout there is little in it, and except to the deeply initiated it will prove almost impenetrable. Let none of rude appetite approach the volume with a hope, born of the winning title, that Henry James has reverted to his less intricate manner or has attained the serener simplicity of age. One winds into the labyrinth to a tune that makes Walter Pater sound like martial music. Yet as a child watches the milk slowly suffusing the mounded sugar on his morning cereal, so one follows with a certain fascination the capillary creeping of Mr. James's thought up the cumulated phrases, along the hair-breadth hyphens, through insidious parentheses, and ambushed shadowy digressions till it touches at last with almost lifeless finger the breathless periphery of the period.

The opening sentence announces with engaging candor "some particulars of the early life of William James." In about ten seconds William glides into the wings and Henry takes his place, but he, too, is swiftly swept off the stage by the somnambulic drift of Albany cousins, vague airs and atmospheres, dim pedagogues, ghostly odors of old book shops, dissolving scenes of old New York, faint records of social "awarenesses," hesitating perceptions, dubious apprehensions, glimmerings and fadings of consciousness. All is phantasmal; one gropes in vain for a three-dimensioned body. One closes one's eyes; direct vision is useless; one must perceive, not see, by a light that reaches the object through endless anfractuosities. One says in one's haste that the author does not care a straw what he recalls from the abysses of memory; how his mind is functioning in the process of evocation—that alone appears to preoccupy him. By dint of reading, say, every third sentence thrice, one fights one's way through the rolling vapors to about the author's fourteenth year, and, brushing the mist from one's eyes, sees just ahead on page 419 the blessed signal, THE END. Then, as one looks back, wearied and grateful, the astonished question leaps to the lips: "The Boy, oh where was he?"

Somewhere far back in the vast middle of the book one did hear for a single thrilling instant a boy's voice, clear, bright, emphatic: "I play with boys who curse and swear." That was the voice of the future Professor William James declining his brother's company on "some planned excursion." That curt sentence rings through the palled and painful stillness of the novelist's solemn edifice with the startling violence of an oath in an ancient church, reassuringly persuading us that we are not the last of the living. There was a token of the thinker who was more than half-sick of shadows and patterns and aspects, whose passion it was to feel the arterial blood warmly throbbing through the dry channels of philosophic thought. One raises, so to speak, a mental shout of demand that the young "stellar" halfback of pragmatism be put into the game. How he would enliven the field! What stunning contrasts he would contribute to the spectacle! But we Philistines, so judges the austere Master of Ceremonies, have long enough played in our crude way with the psychologizing romancer and the romancing psychologist, and William remains blanketed and silent on the bench.

Nor is our business much with that other boy, so inconceivably detached, speechless, inactive, wide-eyed. But when one abandons the search for a boy as boy, one may by indefatigable attention learn what moments precisely in the first dozen years of Henry James's life, what almost imperceptible "breathings," to use his own word, seem to him, sixty years later, to have counted ultimately towards his culture and the development of his fictive power. It is a subtle affair, this tracking back one's full-blown passion for the colors, and fragrance, and total social aspect of Europe to its first faint stirrings and intimations far away amid the unredeemed rawness of the American scene. With infinite tact Mr. James does not tell us, but only makes us aware that the land of his birth offered to his aspiring youth little in the way of native products, but the stony food of business, oratory, ice-cream, Mrs. H. B. Stowe, and Barnum's Museum. Yet all the more paradisiacally came the sacred appeal of the Old World through French schoolmistress, travellers' tales, actors, imported pictures, and the smell of English books. One heaves a sigh of relief when the half-starved boy is free at last to mix with the "fond" of his inward life the "thicker civility" of London.

Now come the high points of this literally incomparable narrative—the minor Pisgahs of a consecrated youth. The boy, we suppose in the neighborhood of his twelfth year, lies stricken with malaria in a London room with a "window open to the English June and the far-off hum of a thousand possibilities. I consciously took them in, these last, and must then, I think, have first tasted the very greatest pleasure perhaps I was ever to know—that of almost holding my breath in presence of certain aspects to the end of so taking in." Another similar moment of "sacred consciousness" befell the boy in the presence of Géricault's Radeau de la Méduse in the Louvre, a moment containing a "foretaste (as determined by that instant as if the hour had struck from a clock) of all the fun, confusedly speaking, that one was going to have, and the kind of life, always of the so-called inward sort, tremendously 'sporting' in its way—though that description didn't there wait upon it, that one was going to lead. It came of itself . . . it came just there and so; there was alarm in it somehow as well as bliss."

Though this authentic note of high and thrilling experience is not often sounded in these pages, we would not leave the impression that there are not ether rewards by the way—occasional brilliant flashes of characterization, from time to time a passage of fine cold humor, plentifully scattered phrases of shining felicity, and even an entire quivering sentence or so that makes the heart dance with delight. We would mention in particular a spot in the final chapter concerning the various social aspects of Boulogne-sur-Mer, where the light comes crashing down upon the page:

> The general British show, as we had it there, in the artless mid-Victorian desert, had, I think, for its most sweeping sign the high assurance of its dowdiness; whereas one had only to glance about at the seafaring and fisher-folk who were the real strength of the place to feel them shed at every step and by their every instinct of appearance the perfect lesson of taste. . . . To hit that happy mean of rightness amid the mixed occupations of a home-mother and a fish-wife, to be in especial both so bravely stripped below and so perfectly enveloped above as the deep-wading, far-striding, shrimp-netting, crab-gathering matrons or maidens who played, waist-high, with the tides and racily quickened the market, was to make grace thoroughly practical and discretion thoroughly vivid.

Here again for a moment we have English, not broken on the wheel, but undefiled and jubilant, stepping out like the avant-courrier of Aurora. A moment before, we had—well, one was breathlessly wondering whether the samphire was worth the gathering. Having followed the high calling of letters with a pontifical majesty now upwards of forty years and in these latter days with a princely indifference to readers, Henry James is unquestionably entitled to write whatever book he pleases for his own delectation and in his own fashion. Yet when one considers the memoirs that he, perhaps better than any man of his time, is qualified to write, one cannot but regret as a kind of defrauding of legitimate expectation that he should have spent any part of his memorializing age upon, relatively speaking, such trivial fond records as these.

Our Neighbors: The Japanese. By Joseph King Goodrich. Chicago: F. G. Browne & Co. $1.25 net.

There is room for a handy, up-to-date book on Japan, by a writer thoroughly acquainted with the country and people. The "Japan" in the History of the Nations series, contributed by the late Dr. David Murray, excellent in its time, is now out of date; and the same may be said of Dr. G. W. Knox's "Japanese Life in Town and Country." The history of Japan in the last ten years has been too remarkable to be neglected in any adequate survey. Longford's "Japan of the Japanese" is too entirely British in its outlook, and leaves untouched some vital subjects, like Education.

Mr. Goodrich had therefore a fine opportunity in this attractive series. He first saw Japan in the sixties before the Meiji era began; he served in a government school in the eighties, and he has revisited the country within the last few years. Several of the fifteen chapters of his book handle their topics in an interesting and instructive way; such, for instance, as ix and x, The Farmer and The Fisherman, and xii, The Ainu. Mistakes in Japanese are almost entirely absent; "Tayotomi" (Toyotomi)—p. 80—is one of the rare exceptions. But the author has no sense of his own limitations; and when he enters the field of historical and philological discussion his lack of adequate training and scholarship becomes only too manifest. The description of himself on the title-page as "Sometime Professor in the Imperial College, Kyoto," is surely misleading; ought it not to read, "Instructor in the Higher Middle School, Kyoto"? The Imperial University of Kyoto was not founded till 1897, and its president in 1910, when Mr. Goodrich last visited Japan, was Baron Kikuchi, with whom he seems to be unacquainted, for he speaks of him on page 79 as "Mr. Kikuchi," in an uncomplimentary reference. There was certainly no "Imperial College" at Kyoto in the earlier Meiji era. His attack on the Baron's admirable "Japanese Education" is evidently based on a superficial reading of recent historians, like Murdoch, whom he quotes patronizingly on page 82.

The style at times is oddly pretentious and garrulous, with a plethora of unnecessary "I's." In chapter iii, The Japanese Family, he gravely informs us that "the first thing to say about the Japanese, and it is really astonishing, is to tell of adoption. . . . Sometimes a less pleasing way of securing a son is resorted to. It is scriptural, but I am glad to say is becoming less frequent in Japan than it was thirty or forty years ago. It is for a man to take a concubine if his true wife has no children. . . . In Japan there was nothing wrong in this semi-Mormonism."

In his chapter on the Ainu he lays claim to having contributed, in two articles that appeared in the Popular Science Monthly of the year 1888, "the first careful and thorough study of these people which had up to that time been given in English." This is a wilful misstatement, for at the close of these very articles he mentions among a list of authorities, Chamberlain and Batchelor's monograph on the Ainu aborigines, which appeared in 1887 as Part I of the Memoirs of the Literature College of the Imperial University of Japan. It was the fortunate combination of the trained philologer, Prof. Basil H. Chamberlain, and the painstaking C. M. S. missionary, the Rev. John Batchelor, which gave us "the first careful and thorough study of these people." In the Bibliography at the close, containing about seventy names, no mention is made of this monograph; and there are other significant omissions. Mr. Goodrich's subsequent two pieces of journalistic work, embellished with cuts taken from Miss Isabella Bird's "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan"—which appeared in 1880, by the way, not in 1878, as given in the Bibliography—have little or no importance.

Colbert's West India Policy. By Stewart L. Mims. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2 net.

Professor Mims presents in this careful and readable monograph the results of a study of an important and too much neglected phase of Colbert's colonial and commercial policy. He points out that Colbert was led to develop the West Indies largely because the enterprising Dutch were rapidly taking advantage of the rich possibilities of these French possessions. This is sound doctrine, for the unexampled prosperity of Dutch maritime investments was undoubtedly responsible for many phases of Colbert's policy and activity. But, although Professor Mims thus rightly lays emphasis on the significance, in the seventeenth century, of the "ubiquitous Dutch trader," he leaves some very important things to be said in respect to the larger interests, political and commercial, which were at stake between the French and Dutch. It is impossible, even in the special case of the West Indies, to neglect, as he has done, a broad consideration of Colbert's attitude towards Holland.

Colbert's policy, aiming to stimulate French activity by eliminating foreign competition, began with the West Indies, as in other cases, by the organization of a Company to which were liberally granted monopolies and the privileges of high protection. Professor Mims records at length and in perhaps too much detail, the rise and fall of the Company—omitting, however, a most essential aspect of the subject. No institution of this sort can be adequately estimated without some consideration of the character and temperament of the people upon whom it depends for support. Considerable light can be thrown upon the failure of this institution, as well as upon several other phases of French economic history, by examining the contemporaneous Frenchman. Abuse and corruption contributed, as Professor Mims indicates, to the fall of Colbert's system of monopoly, but it must be added that the French themselves were not keenly interested in the Company; as shopkeepers they were still some way behind the English, or as merchants behind the Dutch. It is entirely too charitable to regard the Company's fail, "not as a check in Colbert's commercial policy, but rather as an indication that enough progress had been made to render such a Company as no longer necessary."

Several chapters of the book deal with Colbert's experiments in stimulating particular branches of commercial activity. Professor Mims is inclined to picture him as compelled by hard necessity reluctantly to impose restrictions and tariffs. He quotes Colbert's declaration: "Commerce must be left free unless there is an indispensable necessity to commit it into the hands of a company or of a few contractors." Now, we do not think that this places Colbert among the free-traders: we think, in view of Colbert's character and acts, that it amounts to saying, "Commerce can be free so long as it conforms to my system and fulfils my intentions." Colbert was sure that he alone knew what was best for France and her trade. Like his royal master, he wished things to work as he determined. It may be true, as Professor Mims says, that "the dominant note of his industrial and commercial policy was patriotism," but it does not follow that this affected his conviction as to the value of high protective duties. Whatever his ideals may have been, he acted as a protectionist, and he expected all Frenchmen to show their patriotism by acting as he directed.

The results of Colbert's West India policy were more considerable than is generally recognized. Here Professor Mims is clear. By 1683 Colbert "had driven the Dutch from the field and more than two hundred French vessels were trading annually at Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Santo Domingo. He had advanced the ports of La Rochelle, Bordeaux, and Nantes, especially, to new life, and the West India trade became henceforth a source of much profit to their merchants and traders and served as a base of their whole commercial development in the eighteenth century."

The critical and fairly extensive bibliography at the end of the book is curiously defective. It does not include many printed books cited at length in the text, and it does contain several which could have had very little connection with the subject. It is not a complete list of all the material consulted, and when it discriminates it is not always successful. The index is very exasperating: it omits a large number of proper names as well as several important titles or subject headings. Both bibliography and index fall below the scholarly level of the rest of the book.

Notes

The Oxford University Press (Frowde) will publish in a few weeks "Rustic Speech and Folk Lore," by Mrs. Joseph Wright, who was one of the editors of the "English Dialect Dictionary."

The same house has in preparation "The Early Life of Mark Rutherford (W. Hale White) by Himself." These autobiographical notes were written when Mr. White was seventy-eight years old, not primarily for publication, but "to please two or three persons related to me by affection." The volume has been seen through the press by Miss Mary Theodora White.

Forthcoming books of Doubleday, Page & Co. include "Laddie—A True Blue Story," by Gene Stratton-Porter, and "Gold," a novel by Stewart Edward White.

Henry Holt & Co. announce for publication in the autumn "Bransford in Arcadia, or the Little Eohippus" by Eugene Manlove Rhodes.

"The New Man," a story of New York life by Jane Stone, is one of the titles promised by Crowell for autumn.

Among the autumn announcements of the Century Co. are: "The Jack-Knife Man," by Ellis Parker Butler, author of "Pigs is Pigs"; Dr. C. V. Legros's "Fabre, Poet of Science," a biography; "The Thirteenth Juror," by Frederick Trevor Hill, and a volume on international trade by James D. Whelpley.

We have several times stated our belief that for the purpose of the Loeb Classical Library (Macmillan) a prose translation is more serviceable than one in verse. This is indisputably true when, as in the case of the lyrical portions of M. Edmonds's Theocritus, the English follows the Greek at a very long interval. It is true to a certain extent of Dr. Arthur S. Way's Euripides, but in the same editor's Quintus Smyrnæus, the latest of the Library to reach us, we must admit that the use of verse has been singularly successful. Dr. Way has here succeeded in following the language of the "Posthomerica," or "Fall of Troy," as he calls it, so closely as to render easy and quick assistance to any halting reader of the Greek, and at the same time has thrown a surprising amount of spirit and variety into his lines. Quintus was not a great poet, but he made a good story of the siege and final overthrow of the sacred city, with the episodes of Penthesileia and Philoctetes and the fatal horse of wood, and at times his language has the old haunting spell of Homer. If only he had been wise enough to let well enough alone, and not to pile horror on horror, and metaphor on metaphor! As an illustration of the better manner of Quintus and of the style of his translator we may take a few lines from the ninth book, which relate how Philoctetes was appeased of his wrath by Odysseus, and how with his comforters he sailed back to Troy:

"Thy woeful wound, thine anguish, shall be healed,
If thou but come with us to Achæa's host—
The host that now is sorrowing after thee
With all its kings. And no man of them all
Was cause of thine affliction, but the Fates,
The cruel ones, whom none that walk the earth
Escape, but aye they visit hapless men
Unseen: and day by day with pitiless hearts
Now they afflict men, now again exalt
To honor—none knows why; for all the woes
And all the joys of men do these devise
After their pleasure." Hearkening he sat
To Odysseus and to godlike Diomede;
And all the hoarded wrath for olden wrongs
And all the torturing rage, melted away.
. . . . . .
Then came
The balmy night, and sleep slid down on them.
Till rose the dawn they tarried by the strand
Of sea-girt Lemnos, but with dayspring east
The hawsers loose, and heaved the anchor-stones
Out of the deep. Athena sent a breeze
Blowing behind the galley taper-prowed.
They strained the sail with either stern-sheet taut;
Seaward they pointed the stout-girded ship;
O'er the broad flood she leapt before the wind;
Broken to right and left the dark wave sighed,
And seething all around was hoary foam,
While thronging dolphins raced on either hand
Flashing along the paths of silver sea.

Miss Alice Drayton Greenwood, who has already won her spurs (if the phrase is not too militant) in the field of the eighteenth century by her lives of the Hanoverian queens, has now written a volume on "Horace Walpole's World" (Macmillan). It is fairly cast in the conventional mould of these mixed memoirs, but it shows the hand of the professional writer and much more knowledge than is found in the ordinary amateurish exploitations of the age. Naturally, the book is largely composed out of Walpole's own voluminous correspondence, but some of the best and freshest illustrative matter is taken from the publications of the Historical MSS. Commission. This is notably the case in what is, perhaps, the best chapter in the book, that which deals with Modern Taste. Here Miss Greenwood draws largely on the diary of the second Viscount Grimston, who, in 1768, "endured a tour in order to study the beauties of his native land." To the noble traveller's task beauty consisted in the familiar and the regular. The coast of Wales, admired to-day by artist and "tripper," was to him merely "romantic" and hateful: "The entire road [from Aberayron to Aberystwith] is by the side of the sea, which shows a dreary prospect on one side, and the uncultivated mountains equally so on the other." This whole chapter is an illuminating treatise on the "picturesque" and the "romantic" as these epithets were applied to wild nature and to gardening.

When Miss Greenwood deals directly with the correspondence of Walpole she is, it seems, a little drawn aside by her amiability. Any one who has read through that correspondence, as the present reviewer has done with unflagging interest, will agree with her kindly estimate of the man and appreciate her exposition of his honesty in the age of Henry Fox. But it is hard to follow her when she brushes away the rôle of scandal in Walpole's letters. Indecency he seldom descends to, but scandal!—it hisses, and roars, and whispers, and gesticulates through his correspondence in a way that can only be described as magnificent. Miss Greenwood's chapter on The Legend of C. J. Fox is on the whole better than her portraiture of Walpole himself. Her serious homily, based on Mme. du Deffand's estimation of Fox—"Qu'est ce que l'esprit sans jugement et sans un grain de bon sens?"—might seem to break through the frame of her design, were it not that she attributes to Fox, and in a measure rightly, "the débâcle of the sacred Whig system" which was really "Walpole's World." And her characterization of Fox, as a type of the closing years of the century, is in itself masterly.

The Rev. Albert H. Currier, D.D., for twenty-six years professor of homiletics in Oberlin Theological Seminary, in a volume entitled "Nine Great Preachers" (The Pilgrim Press), sketches briefly the life and work of distinguished Christian homilists from Chrysostom to Phillips Brooks. The studies are made with a practical purpose, to call attention to the methods of sermon preparation and to cultivate pulpit power. This endeavor to improve the experiences of the various divines for the benefit of young theologues somewhat mars the chapters as biographical essays. The analysis of the distinguishing characteristics of the preachers selected for treatment is discerning and fair. The author is an earnest evangelical, but that does not forbid sympathetic treatment of Bernard of Clairvaux, Bousset, and F. W. Robertson. One may perhaps question the inclusion of John Bunyan and Alexander McLaren in a volume devoted to so small a number of pulpit orators. Besides those above mentioned, the volume treats of Richard Baxter and Henry Ward Beecher.

John J. Underwood's "Alaska: An Empire in the Making" (Dodd, Mead) is the work of an Alaskan enthusiast, whose zeal for his subject, when he gets headed northward from Seattle, warms up in proportion as the mercury goes down. To him the clear gain to the United States from the acquisition of Alaska is measured simply by subtracting the amount paid out by the Government for purchase and maintenance from the total output of Alaskan industries—$460,000,000 minus $15,500,000 leaves $444,500,000. "And Alaska could be sold to-morrow at a profit of several billions of dollars on its visible assets." After this, one is not surprised that he is able to figure that the United States could save the cost of a new battleship each year by procuring coal for its Pacific fleet in Alaska rather than West Virginia. But the reader is duly warned that "the fabulous values placed on some of these coal lands by irresponsible people who are ignorant of the facts are extremely ridiculous." Through its reindeer industry Alaska is to break the power of the Beef Trust, a reindeer cut even now being served for seventy-five cents in one Seattle hotel which charges two dollars for a porterhouse steak. In some of Mr. Underwood's outbursts of descriptive eloquence the array of adjectives is suggestive of his own picture of the wild reindeer crowding through Caribou Crossing, or the pack ice grinding its way through Bering Straits. The book cannot serve as a source of trustworthy information, and it is noticeably tinctured here and there with an anti-conservation bias.

Mr. Herbert Fisher's "Napoleon" in the Home University Library (Holt) is an admirable brief biography. In simplicity, directness, picturesqueness, insight, and brief comprehensiveness it reminds one of that other biographical gem, Einhard's Life of Charlemagne. It is, in fact, the excellent kind of a book which one expects who has read Mr. Fisher's unequalled chapter on the Napoleonic Code in the Cambridge Modern History or his essays on Bonapartism. He omits no phase of Napoleon's many-sided activity. Though he here gives us nothing strikingly novel—and one does not expect novelty in such a summary account—he nevertheless, by his abundant use of happy adjectives and by his trenchant style, imparts freshness and interest to every one of the two hundred and fifty small pages. The chapter on The Qualities of Empire, in which, as a subject of the British Empire, he makes suggestive comparisons between the Roman, Carolingian, and Napoleonic Empires, is of real originality and unusual interest. As is inevitable with any one who studies carefully the career of Napoleon, Mr. Fisher is an admirer of Napoleon's genius, but with more qualifications than Mr. J. H. Rose. Mr. Fisher's apt and just conclusion is that Napoleon "took glory as his end, found it in conquest, and was too often prone to measure it by destruction. So with the grandest intellectual endowments ever vouchsafed to man, and despite many services to law, to administration, to the moral and intellectual progress of France, he remains the great modern example of that reckless and defiant insolence which formed the matter of ancient tragedy and is at war with the harmonies of human life."

In "Letters and Character Sketches from the House of Commons" (imported by Dutton), Sir Richard Carnac Temple has collated and edited a number of letters and notes written by his father, Sir Richard Temple, while he was a member of the House of Commons from 1886 to 1895. Sir Richard Temple was a man of shrewd judgment and untiring industry, and these qualities he applied to the observation of men and measures in the House of Commons. He wrote a daily journal in the form of letters to his wife, which grew gradually into eleven quarto manuscript volumes. From this mass of material the son has made a judicious selection of letters dealing with the exciting period of Irish obstruction in 1886 and 1887. The student of English politics will find much that is of value in Sir Richard Temple's notes on the questions of the day, but far more interesting are his character sketches of various members of the House who for one reason or another attracted his attention. Besides carefully studied summaries of the leading men of the day, we have his impressions of the promising young men, then on the threshold of their parliamentary career, whose names have since become famous. In general Sir Richard's estimates were shrewd and impartial, despite his sincere conviction that the Tory party alone was the trustee of England's greatness. It is interesting to note his indulgent impression of the youthful Sir Edward Grey as "one of the most presentable young men of the Radical party." The present Prime Minister is to-day particularly distinguished for the lucidity with which he can present a complicated proposal, but Sir Richard, while praising him as "a debater and an assailant," is unprepared to commit himself as to what Mr. Asquith would be "in making a constructive speech, explaining proposals, expounding a system, arranging facts, figures and arguments." Lord Morley even in those days was "Honest John," for we are told that "his rapid rise . . . is partly due to unshakable consistency of opinion joined to sterling honesty of character." Lloyd George "speaks well by natural aptitude, and has plenty of self-assertion," but he "does not seem to carry weight with the Liberal party, nor has he, so far, found his way to the esteem of the House at large." These pages are unrelieved by many touches of humor, for Sir Richard Temple was one who took himself and the House of Commons with great seriousness, but they serve to give a very vivid picture of men and events at an interesting period of parliamentary history.

Mr. Frank A. Mumby has been so encouraged by the reception accorded to his "Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth," that he proposes eventually to illustrate the whole history of England in the "gentle and familiar way" of contemporary letters. If his latest work ("The Youth of Henry VIII, a Narrative in Contemporary Letters"; Houghton Mifflin) is a fair sample of those that are to follow it, the series as a whole promises to be far less satisfactory than the initial volume. The plan here pursued is identical with that of Mr. Mumby's earlier book—a number of contemporary letters, strung together by brief and on the whole sensible comments. But the letters here chosen are far less well selected than in the "Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth," and all of them have been printed before. Some of them are transcribed from ancient and notoriously inaccurate compilations like Joseph Grove's "Life and Times of Wolsey." In others whole paragraphs are omitted, without the slightest indication of the fact (the letter of Sir Brian Tuke to Richard Pace printed on pages 221-226 is a case in point). No attempt, apparently, has been made to preserve the original spelling, yet we occasionally run across a curious archaism (e. g., "opulant," p. 226). It is not easy to recognize the real recipient of Henry VIII's letter of April 12, 1513 (p. 166)—namely, Christopher Bainbridge—under the title, Cardinal Remus, which Mr. Mumby applies to him. The index sheds no light on the matter, and is, in general, a strange mixture of inaccuracy and ignorance. By far the best thing in the book is the portrait of Henry VIII as a child (to face page 14). A good look at it will explain vastly more than the average character sketch. Mr. Mumby has embarked on an interesting and promising enterprise, in his attempt to introduce the "average reader" to the "sources"; but if his future volumes are to attain real success, he must take more pains in finding and transcribing his letters, and above all he must learn more about the people who wrote them.

"The Story of Santiago de Compostela" (Dutton), by C. Gasquoine Hartley, is one of the many modern books which attempt to combine a smattering of history and architectural description with practical hints to the tourist. It is prettily illustrated, and easy to read. It tells at length, without any attempt to test their authenticity, a majority of the legends and stories which have clustered around the famous shrine of Spain's patron saint. A characteristic paragraph discusses at length the question whether or not the "ethnology [sic] of Compostela is to be found in the Latin word compostum, signifying a site reserved for interments." The descriptions of the Cathedral and other buildings of the city are mediocre. The last chapter, Information for the Visitor, is considerably less valuable than the corresponding pages in Baedeker. For more than a century Spain seems to have possessed a peculiar fascination for writers of books of travel and description interlarded with observations on history, politics, and art; and the present work is a fair specimen of its class as at present produced. But comparison with earlier and classic samples of the same species, as, for instance, the masterpieces of Richard Ford and George Borrow, suggests gloomy prospects for the future.

An English publicist, Mr. Frank Fox, of the Morning Post, reviews the political and strategic conditions affecting maritime supremacy in a fluent little volume entitled "Problems of the Pacific" (Small, Maynard & Company). Discussions of this sort are supposed to excite amusement among trained diplomatists, who realize better than the uninitiated how fortuitously the fate of nations is ordered, but within reasonable limits they offer material of value to the common man to think about at home. Their usefulness, however, varies in proportion as they deal with facts or elaborate predictions. To give an accurate summary of conditions in all the regions bordering upon the Pacific basin is a laborious task, to divine their future prospects is pleasant and easy. In this performance of Mr. Fox there are indications of his having expended some labor and derived a good deal of pleasure. Just ten years ago Colquhoun's "Mastery of the Pacific" made a more elaborate adventure in the same region of prophecy; but the defeat of Russia, the confederation of Australia, and the Panama Canal have left the descriptive portions of that excellent work its only claim to a place on the library shelves. Mr. Fox endeavors to be fair—to the white man. He does not believe in the staying power of the Japanese or in the reality of a Yellow Peril. He concludes that "the Pacific will fall as the Mediterranean did, as the Atlantic did, to the rule of the white man." Probably the politicians of New Rome in the seventh century thought the same thing about their sea, but it has taken twelve centuries for the Caucasian to regain the hold which Rome lost over that water before that century ended.

We have no present reason to fear subjugation by any Asiatics, but a political programme that virtually ignores them and parcels out the Pacific among the white nations seems to be based upon premises which deny the Malay-Mongolian races any prospect whatever of further development, and arrogates to the European all the advantages of initiative and invention. Furthermore, we must remember the fact that Asia has thus far been the source of all religious impulses of the first magnitude. While we are estimating strength in terms of Dreadnoughts and trade reports, can we be sure that Asia will never produce another Sakyamuni or Mohammed to upset our calculations? Mr. Fox's book is frankly imperialist and Anglo-Celtic—to use his favorite term for the English-speaking peoples—but his is not a blatant imperialism. It will do no harm. But there are too many slips in his statements to inspire entire confidence in him as a guide to the careful imperialist. The Satsuma rebellion occurred in 1877, not 1884, and Argentina does not occupy 3,954,911 square miles, but 1,135,000, while Chili has 292,580 instead of 2,474—to mention only three of them.

Bacon's admonition that "there ought to be gardens for all the months of the year" is more easily acted on in England than in our country; but that there is something to do every month for gardeners, amateur as well as professional, is shown in "Success in Gardening," which is divided into twelve sections bearing the names of the months, each being further divided into four weeks, none of which escapes its share of the work. Some of this subdivision is necessarily rather arbitrary, yet in the main the author succeeds in finding the best moment for each of the multitudinous acts that go to the making and maintaining of a flower garden. The winter months are the time for planning, getting the necessary tools, and buying the seeds, in the choice of which the writer urges the selection of "the new and beautiful varieties which one misses in so many gardens. "Why not try two or three new varieties each year, and through selection and elimination attain individuality?" To facilitate this, lists are given of the best varieties of annuals and perennials, together with the names of trustworthy seedsmen and growers of shrubs, trees, and bulbs, all of which are duly considered in their place and season. Incidentally, there are many hints as to how to help along the plants; two of the most frequently neglected of such suggestions relate to the cutting of withered flowers (which the author regards as more important than weeding), and the use of wood ashes as a fertilizer, not only on the lawn, for which they are usually recommended, but in the garden, too.

The author of "Flower Gardening" also dwells repeatedly on the important work to be done in months during which the gardener is usually supposed to be idle. Much, in particular, can be done in the autumn that will lighten the labor of springtime. While annuals are not neglected, there is a bias throughout this book in favor of hardy gardens filled with perennials, partly because these involve less labor after they are once planted, but chiefly because of the distribution of their blooming season through the greater part of the year. In chapter xi an ingenious plan is unfolded for having something to admire in the garden as many weeks of the year as possible. Shrubs and evergreens receive due attention, and there are also chapters on the making of flower pictures, flowers for cutting, shaded gardens, floral hobbies, and birds in the garden, with directions for luring birds and frustrating the evil designs of the cat. There is an index, the absence of which in "Success in Gardening" is regrettable. Both these books are freely illustrated.

Exceptionally commendable are the numerous flower pictures in E. H. Jenkins's "Hardy Flower Book"; they have the advantage of being printed on very heavy glazed paper. In England, as in America, there is a growing interest in hardy gardens. Mr. Jenkins, who is a member of the Royal Horticultural Society, has devoted his whole life to this branch, and his advice on planting and watering, on the fallacy of big clumps, on what to do with shrub borders, on errors in waterside gardening, and a hundred other points, is decidedly valuable. Favorite perennials, like the peony, phlox, larkspur, are considered in detail, while Part II discusses more briefly, and in alphabetical order, all of the hardy herbaceous plants that are worth growing. In Part III lists are given of hardy plants desirable for many special purposes. The varieties that bloom in spring, in summer, in autumn, in winter, are tabulated separately, and these lists are of particular interest to those owners of gardens who are able to spend only a few weeks of the year among their flowers and who naturally wish the gardens to appear at their best during those particular weeks.

"Suburban Gardens" is a little volume without pictures, and with only 207 pages, which contain, however, much that will interest owners of suburban homes, especially if they agree with the author that, while there should of course be flowers in abundance, these ought never to crowd out the edible plants. She has no sympathy with the ideal which sees in the suburban home a country home in miniature, being convinced that a kind of "landscape" gardening is often attempted "in the vain hope of creating an illusion of the spaciousness and splendor which the truly suburban place cannot, in the very nature of things enjoy." What should be done, instead, she attempts to show in detail with the aid of diagrams. Again and again she emphasizes the economic side of the garden question, deploring, among other things, the neglect of fruit trees, which brings it about that "all the thousands of acres of suburbs in the United States are non-producing; and fruits and foods are proportionately high." To her the garden is the thing; and "all that goes to make up the garden is secondary—even the trees and shrubs and flowers." Many will disagree with her in this attitude, which puts her in a class with those music-lovers who place form above content, yet she stops short at one point, remarking that of all gardening offences the flower-bed is surely the worst, and that "better no flowers at all than a flower bed." She forgets how convenient and useful such beds are to those whose time and means are too limited to permit them to attempt florally decorated grounds.

While the authors of the first four books on our list frankly and fearlessly offer hints to help readers, the writer of "A Farm in Creamland," who is a novelist, does his best to conceal the fact that his is a useful book. Such it is, nevertheless; but the helpful hints are hidden in the narrative of how he and his family tried to find out if it were possible to make farming pay in England. The result of seven years' trial was that he felt inclined to advise none to attempt such farming as a means of livelihood, unless he has been specially educated and trained for the life. And yet he himself, though "as ignorant of agriculture as the shoeblack at the corner of St. Paul's, made a small farm pay." He gives the figures in the last chapter ("which may be skipped"). The garden takes up one of the chapters, and of the others there are some that are not connected with farming as such, but deal with English country life in general—fishing, birds, snakes, rabbit-shooting. "Pigs as pets" is an unusual subject which the author treats with quite a show of feeling.

"The Infancy of Animals" (Holt), by W. P. Pycraft, is about equally balanced in its excellences and shortcomings. It contains a very great number of extremely interesting facts which are offered from a novel point of view; but the arrangement is poor and the diction is inadequate. There is little attempt at logical sequence, and the general looseness of construction is betrayed by such chapter headings as Early Days and Early Ways, Colors and Coloration, and again three chapters farther along, Coloration. Although meant for a popular work, it is sometimes made obscure by technical theories and casual references to scientific problems. The book deals almost wholly with vertebrates, the title being thus misleading. As might be expected, the generous portion of the text relating to the life and problems of young birds is by far the most satisfactory; Mr. Pycraft has done his best scientific work in this field. Such subjects as play, directive color spots in the mouth, feeding habits, and evolution of the plumage are absorbing even in this unemotional, matter-of-fact method of presentation. The evolution of maternal instinct deserves a chapter to itself. By searching through the volume we find such delicate gradations as the origin of this phenomenon among the reptiles; its fluctuating manifestation as in the kangaroos, where the young are placed in the pouch at the approach of danger, but thrown out by the mother in the last extremity of a race for life. Among birds we find the most absolute devotion to the young on the one hand, and again a degeneration to total neglect, as in the mound-builders, whose chicks are orphaned before they are born, and the cowbirds, whose offspring must enter upon life as changelings. Coloration is touched upon in almost every chapter and with commendable moderation in these days of extreme, ill-balanced theories on this subject. "Movements will betray the most cunningly devised mantle of invisibility" is perhaps the most illuminating sentence in the book.

The chapter on Young Birds and Records of the Past deals with the evidences of evolution as shown in the organs and tissues of young birds and in adults, and here Mr. Pycraft excels, making us feel the mystery of the æons of slow change which have perfected, or ultimately caused to degenerate, structures such as wings, nostrils, palates, tails, and plumages. He shows in how many ways we can see revealed, dimly but unmistakably, in the structure and form of embryos and nestlings, the adults of past ages, such as the tern-like bill of the young skimmer, the open nostrils of nestling cormorants, the usable fingers and claws of the juvenile hoatzin, and the possible teeth of the young tinamou. Of the chapters relating to the lower vertebrates, Concerning Tadpoles is excellent; while the scant thirty-odd pages treating of crabs, caterpillars, and invertebrate Puzzles and Paradoxes might well have been omitted. The illustrations, mostly photographs from life, are good; the text paper is light and dull finished; the index should have been twice as large. If the book had been written with the care and vivid description which mark the quotations from Wilson, the Antarctic traveller, on pp. 83-86, it would have been a classic. But the trail of the museum lies upon the text, whereas the subjects demand the freedom of treatment of the field naturalist.

Francis Gotch, professor of physiology since 1895 at Oxford University, died last week in London. He was born at Bristol, England, in 1853, and was educated at Amersham Hall School and University College, London. He became demonstrator in the physiological laboratory, Oxford, in 1883; Holt professor of physiology, University College, Liverpool, in 1891, and delivered the Croonian lecture on researches made with Prof. V. Horsley into the central nerve system in 1891. He had published several papers in scientific journals.

WESTERN PLAYS IN JAPAN.

Tokio, June 2.

We Japanese have no language to express our modern thought and imagination; I mean simply by that that our old Japanese language, homogeneous, simple, with the beauty, if it has any, of decorative impossibility, or romanticism, and with the power, if it has any, of taciturnity, but not of eloquence, has lost its own dignity through being unable to match our modern requirement. Indeed, it is the case, is it not, of the old Japanese brocade which finds itself quite out of place against the Western dress. We present Japanese wear a sack-coat, frock-coat, even "swallow-tail," however ill-fitting and absurd they be for us dark-skinned, short-legged people; and we forget the old brocade inherited from our fathers. And so with the language—a devil's language, as once a certain Western missionary remarked a few hundred years ago; and we use the new Japanese language created by Western writers. Some of our present Japanese, I mean the intellectual Japanese, use the language of Turgenieff or Tolstoy; some of them the language of Maupassant or Gorki; and the language of Oscar Wilde was quite a fashion here a year or two ago. And what we are most pleased to use to-day is the language of Ibsen or Bernard Shaw.

When we began to use this new language, "the Western language with a Japanese sound," ten years ago, we had only a little encouragement from the general public; but when book after book had been written, as we saw, in fact, in this language, the public began to be reconciled with us, and even to find no small interest in our attempt. And let me say that it was they who called us to the stage to act the new play in the new strange language; even the general public, after all, has begun to be modernized, that is, Westernized. To speak from the history of the Japanese drama, Ibsen's "Bork-man," Japanized three or four years ago, staged under the auspices of the Liberty Theatre Society, was, in truth, the real dawning of a new stage art in Japan. What is most interesting to dwell on is the fact of the great influence it has had in Westernizing the Japanese public of the common run; certainly you will be amazed if I tell you that the audience who barely filled two nights as in the case of "Borkman" Japanized are numbered now more than enough for the play, whether it be by Shakespeare or Shaw, by Sudermann or Ibsen, to run fifteen nights.

And here I have seen lately a more striking phenomenon in the fact that a certain English dramatic company, Wilkie, or something, had quite a prosperous one week at the Imperial Theatre, Tokio; the time is not far off, I dare say, to see a Bernhardt or a Tree coming to play before the Japanese audience. Certainly we shall soon have a large enough audience here to extend an invitation to the well-known Western players. And you will see the general tendency of thought and taste of our intellectual class when I tell you that what Wilkie offered most pleasing to us was not "Hamlet," but "Salome" and "Mrs. Warren's Profession."

Formerly we could not help applying the so-called Japanese honorification in address, even when playing the Western play; but to-day it has ceased to be uncivil or barbarous to make a wife call her husband a John or a Frank; and shaking hands is now, in fact, one of our Japanese customs or etiquettes which we are pleased to practice in daily life. And there is no one among the audience to-day who will blush when beholding the kissing scene; the remarkable thing is, above all, how the Japanese actors have learned to kiss neatly. "The West conquered Japan in literature long ago; and now she is Westernizing us even in life's ways and customs," I always exclaim when I see the Western play on our stage. And I had occasion to explain it again a few nights ago when I saw Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler" Japanized at the Yurakuza Theatre.

I think that "John Gabriel Borkman" was staged in Japan at the most appropriate time (let me admit the cleverness of a Japanese manager), and as a result it made quite a forcible impression upon our mind; because, in the year of 1909, our modern literature was reaching almost to the height of naturalism, after a Western fashion, and we, like young Erhart in Ibsen's play, were pleased to cry: "For I am young! That's what I never realized before; but now the knowledge is tingling through every vein in my body. I will only live, live, live!" This importation of naturalism made us awaken to the very consciousness of so-called true life; and, as in the West, we thought it proper to go to the extreme of individualism or Ibsen's egoism for solving that question of life. And the Japanese women, too, were not slow in their rise; when they found, as the phrase goes, their own selves, they were more often than not the victims of modern vanities and selfishness; it is surprising to see so many more "new women" in Japan than one ever dreamed of. I thought natural enough when I was told by Mr. Iba, the stage manager of the Kindai Geki Kyokai (the Modern Play Society), and the actor who most cleverly acquitted himself as Assessor Black, that there was hardly any woman who, when seeing the play, this "Hedda Gabler," in the Kozo Chiba's translation, complained of its dulness; and women more than men, even in Japan, would appreciate it. "That is because the modern Japanese women are more or less Heddas," I explained to myself.

The acting was quite an advance upon the day of "John Gabriel Borkman," when I even laughed over the awkward attitudes of Japanese players around Western tables and their faltering manner of carrying on the long dialogue; I should say it was no mean achievement, this "Hedda Gabler," when the actors and actresses, quite at home with tables, chairs, and sofa, showed a good order and general harmony. It is very difficult to discuss the real merit of Ibsen, but not so hard to think about what Ibsen means in Japan. What effect does he produce on our minds? Above all, why do Japanese play his dramas? I asked these questions of Mr. Iba, who makes a unique figure himself, as I said before, as Assessor Black.

"It is difficult," he remarked, "to play Pinero, for instance, because he is too English. There's nobody to say that Ibsen is too Scandinavian: I mean that he is universal. Besides, he is a splendid teacher for us on the stage; we have become wiser and saner in life; as a dramatist, he clearly shows where we actors have to put emphasis and force to make acting turn smoothly. We play him, because he teaches us so much, and he is easy to play."

"So you thought him easy," I exclaimed, "and you played him. You thought him easy, indeed—is it not the reason why we thought him very difficult in seeing your 'Hedda Gabler'?"

And then he laughed. That vague laughter means that we had to study him more before we could speak on him authoritatively even as Ibsen in Japan.

YONE NOGUCHI.

The Shakespearean summer season at the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-upon-Avon, England, by the F. R. Benson company, will begin August 2 and close August 30. The programme will include three of Shakespeare's plays from English history—"Henry the Fourth," "Richard the Second," and "King John"; the tragedies of "Hamlet" and "Romeo and Juliet," and six of the comedies—"The Merchant of Venice," "As You Like It," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Twelfth Night," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor." In addition, the plays will include Lord Lytton's "Richelieu," John Masefield's "The Tragedy of Pompey the Great," and G. Bernard Shaw's "The Devil's Disciple." The Norwich Players will be seen in "The Drama of Job," the Bedford Players in "Glastonbury," the Dunmow Players in "The Tinker's Wedding," and the townsfolk of Stratford-upon-Avon in "The Harvest Masque." There will also be morris dances, sword dances, and country dances in the gardens.

Thomas Tait, formerly lecturer on elocution in Melbourne University, has published an excellent little volume (Doran) on "How to Train the Speaking Voice." He has nothing new to say on the subject, of course, but the advice that he gives is generally sound, and is set down in plain language. Most essayists on this topic indulge in quasi-scientific elaborations which confuse ordinary students without enlightening or helping them. He explains, briefly and clearly, the rudimentary principles of the art, and tells how to practice and profit by them. His directions concerning the proper pose of the speaker, the management of the breath, the production of the vowel sounds, the study of emphasis and intonation, and the avoidance of vulgarisms and slovenliness are clear and pertinent. On the necessity of prolonged and intelligent study of passages of prose or poetry before any attempt is made to speak them aloud he is particularly emphatic and judicious. He realizes, as many professed teachers of elocution do not, that a full and sympathetic comprehension of an author's meaning is as essential to competent vocal interpretation as technical skill in utterance. But he seems to be a victim of the all too common delusion that an actor, to be completely successful, must "feel" his part, that is to say, must undergo in his own person the emotions which he is counterfeiting. This is just what all our second-rate performers do or try to do, thereby expressing the most diverse characters in the one inelastic mould of their private individuality. Here is the reason why true versatility is almost unknown upon the modern stage. Acting, in its highest estate, is governed by the intellect, not the emotions. It is doubtless true that very few actors in the history of the theatre have succeeded in completely merging their identity in the fictitious character, but all the great players have come very near to the achievement of this notable feat upon particular occasions. The Salvini of Othello, for instance, was scarcely recognizable, even by his bulk, in the Salvini of Conrad in "La Morte Civile." The object of the true artist is first to determine how the personage to be represented might be presumed to behave under certain circumstances, and, secondly, to materialize the conception thus formed by the resolute suppression of every personal habit or impulse that might conflict with it. The requirements to this end are thought, intuition, will, and executive ability, all of which are inconsistent with individual personal emotion.

Equally ambitious and interesting is the list of the grand operas to be sung at the Century Opera House next season, beginning on September 15, and lasting till the middle of April. With but few exceptions, each opera is to be given for a full week of eight successive performances, as follows: September 15, "Aïda"; 22, "Gioconda"; 29, "Tales of Hoffmann"; October 6, "Louise"; 13, "Madama Butterfly"; 20, "Romeo and Juliet"; 27, "Trovatore"; November 3, "Lakme"; 10, "Thaïs"; 17, "Lohengrin"; 24, "Jewels of the Madonna"; December 1, "Lucia"; 8, "Manon"; 15, "Bohemian Girl"; 22, "Carmen"; 29, "Tristan and Isolde"; January 5, "La Bohême"; 12, "The Huguenots"; 19, "Tosca"; 26, "Königskinder"; February 2, "Faust"; 9, "Tannhäuser"; 16, "Traviata"; 23, "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci"; March 2, "Samson and Delilah"; 9, "Rigoletto"; 16, "Secret of Suzanne" and "Coppelia"; 23, "Rheingold" and "Walküre" (three days each); 30, "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" (three days each); 6, "Parsifal." All of these are "subject to change."

From Rome comes the report that an overture written for "Aïda" by Verdi, but supressed by him, has been found and submitted to Toscanini, who pronounced it important. It may be played at the Verdi centenary festival in Milan next month. It is believed that Verdi decided to omit the overture because of its great length. The score covers seventy-six pages. It is dated December 23, 1872, which would indicate that it was not written or completed till after the first performances of "Aïda" in Cairo and Milan.

Italian newspapers contain pictures of the extraordinary incident of the six-year-old boy Ferrero conducting Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture at the Augusteum in Rome. He did it without looking at the score, in presence of a crowded audience, including many prominent musicians. His remarkable talent was discovered accidentally.

Kenyon Cox's interesting address on "The Illusion of Progress" is printed in No. 6 of the "Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Letters." In it he says regarding music:

> In melodic invention it is so far from progressive that its most brilliant masters are often content to elaborate and to decorate a theme old enough to have no history—a theme the inventor of which has been so entirely forgotten that we think of it as sprung not from the mind of one man, but from that of a whole people, and call it a folk-song.

The prix de Rome of the Paris Conservatory has been won this year by a girl of nineteen named Lili Boulanger. Nearly all the great French composers won this prize during their conservatory days. On the other hand, not all of the students who won it became famous.

David Popper, whose seventieth birthday was celebrated in Budapest recently (though Riemann says he was born on December 9, 1843), shares with Piatti the honor of having done for the violoncello what Paganini did for the violin and Liszt for the piano in developing its technique to the utmost conceivable point. His pieces are extremely effective and idiomatic. From a purely creative point of view, to be sure, they are not equal to those of Bach and Beethoven, and of Rubinstein, whose second sonata and "Trois Morceaux" will be better known in concert halls some day than they are now.

Art

Lawrence. By Sir Walter Armstrong. With 41 plates. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.50 net.

On first opening this well-illustrated volume, one is inclined to regret that Sir Walter Armstrong has devoted his fine critical perceptions to an artist who, after all, is only third rate. As one reads the mood changes, Lawrence's stereotyped uniformity as a portrait painter has been a challenge to the critic's adroitness. Where artistic interest lags, personal considerations atone or sagacious comment on the times or on things in general. In short, Sir Walter seems to justify Sainte-Beuve's predilection for a minor personality as the best subject for criticism.

About Lawrence as artist there is very little to say, and in his estimate our author achieves a surprising blend of severity and amenity. At six the boy could catch a likeness with the chalks. In his 'teens he was the support of a shiftless father and a numerous family. At eighteen he regarded himself as hors concours in the Academy schools. At twenty-one he exhibited the engaging portrait of the actress, Nelly Farren, now loaned by the Morgan estate to the Metropolitan Museum, and in his remaining forty years of tireless effort he never surpassed it. In his rare early chalk drawings Sir Walter discerns a promise which Lawrence was never to fulfil. His technic in oils, after a brief aping of Sir Joshua, was to degenerate into a dry and textureless formula. The Nelly Farren already has its perfunctory and metallic passages. Worse yet, his naturally great gifts as a draughtsman were to resolve themselves into rather cheap conventions. The famous Lawrence eye, with its fixed vivacity, is as recognizable as the hot and hard Lawrence flesh. His tricks, Sir Walter Armstrong rightly observes, are more flagrant in his favorite portraits of women. If he ever approaches greatness it is in a few of the lightly sketched heads, like that of the little Duke of Reichstadt, and in a handful of the political portraits, for example, the Curran and Warren Hastings.

It is a shrewd and just observation of the author that Lawrence really stands out of the British tradition of good color, and finds his affiliations rather with such academic French painters as Gérard, Ingres, Bonnat—Cabanel might have been added. And, in fact, Lawrence's steely sense for the stigmata of resemblance, his blindness to individual refinements of color, his firm yet insensitive draughtsmanship, his international clientèle, and productive tours abroad—all relate him to the modern peripatetic tribe of capable portrait manufacturers made in France.

As in the modern case of Bonnat, personal defects of technique did not prevent an exquisite connoisseurship. There was a moment when Lawrence, though ever financially embarrassed, had bought up virtually all the important drawings by old masters in the European market. The mere nucleus of his private collection is now the pride of the Oxford University Galleries. In the Parliamentary hearing which resulted in the purchase of the Elgin marbles, no one gave such terse and emphatic testimony as to the incomparable worth of the Pheidian sculptures as Lawrence. Many of the most important pictures of the Angerstein collection, now in the National Gallery, were found by Lawrence and bought at his suggestion. Indeed, these mediatorial services may in the long run seem a more important contribution to the cause of art than his painting.

What is always admirable about the man is a fine British candor and a rather un-British clearsightedness and absence of illusion. Of passion and prejudice he had less than a great artist's share. As a boy, on seeing a Rubens for the first time, he exclaimed: "I shall never paint like that." So just a prevision in a precocious and ambitious lad is of evil omen. At the height of his fame he wrote to his brother: "I can never expect that the labors of my pencil will have so great an interest at any future time as they now have, or their superiority be so generally acknowledged." Again, an amazing self-estimate in a painter who had stood applauded before kings. Indeed, the only shred of illusion in the man's character seems to be a belief that under favoring circumstances he might have been a great historical painter. It was a delusion entirely natural in a contemporary and friend of Benjamin West.

In Lawrence's failure to attain greatness there is, according to our author, after all only a very simple mystery. Lawrence was badly handicapped by his precocity. In any art there is peril in gaining the means of expression before one has anything to express. Under these conditions only copyism or empty displays of dexterity are likely. But Lawrence had an even sorer drawback in a curious hesitancy of character, which may be illustrated by the irresponsible way in which he fell in and out of love with the two Siddons sisters. Possibly, the assertiveness of his methods is merely the protective mask of one without much initiative and resourcefulness who does with telling emphasis just what he is accustomed to doing. Sir Walter Armstrong finds a further disqualification in Lawrence's lack of persistency. In almost every portrait the attack is superb, and there the interest is wholly exhausted, while the conception is successively attenuated through processes irksome to the painter, and, naturally, slurred. Which comes to saying that Lawrence was never a whole-hearted painter, lacking joy in manipulation and zest in color. Had he never passed beyond the chalks of his early period, he might well have left a deeper impress on the history of art. As a blameless, kindly, and serviceable personality his title to gratitude and remembrance is clear. Clearer possibly in England, which he loyally served in many capacities, than elsewhere.

Sir Walter Armstrong's delightful essay is accompanied by a list of works, confessedly incomplete, which comprises nearly one hundred quarto pages. How large a part in this great output Lawrence's famulus Wyatt may have had is a question that Sir Walter does not raise. It is about the only point at which his vivacious yet densely packed pages fail to satisfy your reviewer's curiosity.

Finance

AS TO A TURN FOR THE BETTER.

It is too early yet to say whether or not the sudden revival of activity and strength on the Stock Exchange, which assumed rather definite proportions last week, marked the turn from the excessive financial gloom and despondency of the past six months. A few months ago, such a demonstration as then occurred would have been taken as an ordinary incident of Wall Street. It was the fact of the complete inertia and disheartenment that had preceded the recovery, and especially the occurrence, in the preceding week, of the smallest full day's Stock Exchange business in the seventeen past years, which brought last week's stock market movement into so strong relief. Consciously or unconsciously, Wall Street had come to look at the 64,000-shares of July 11 as typifying the character of the financial situation generally, and as foreshadowing what the Stock Exchange has ahead of it for a very long time to come.

Yet it is a very well-defined tradition of the financial community that a day of utterly abnormal dulness, following gradual and progressive shrinkage of activity, is itself a sign that a turning-point is near. This tradition is not based on calculated logic, but on almost unvarying experience. On the face of things, there would appear to be no reason why one sixty-thousand-share day should not be followed by a dozen or a hundred like it. But it never is. The stock market, like all other complicated machineries, has ways and habits of its own. One of them seems to be that when the wheels, after long revolving in one direction, slacken their pace of revolution and at last cease to move entirely, they are about to start turning in the opposite direction.

It would be easy, even supposing this to be the case in the present instance, to indulge in unwarranted expectations. The public, on which all depends, is still mistrustful, suspicious, and timid. It has grown used to finding more inviting opportunities for investment in securities outside of the Stock Exchange than in it, and perhaps the strongest stimulus to its return would be news of the absorption of the unsold new security issues, and an advance in their market price above the price of issue. That this happened in the case of a few important securities of the kind last week, is not to be overlooked.

The public's mind must also be disabused, and by convincing evidence, of the carefully cultivated notion that Europe will lend no money here to "move the crops" this summer, and that therefore a crushing strain will be imposed on domestic money markets. The doctrine, lately preached in influential quarters, that we incur a debt of half a billion dollars every year to Europe, and that Europe can draw it out in cash whenever it sees fit, must lose what hold it may have had on the popular imagination. So must the pleasing theory that this is to be a "panic year," either because it is twenty years since 1893, or because the fatal number 13 appears in its title.

Something else, which has also stood in the way of financial recuperation, has been the twin belief that a tariff-revision year necessitates hard times, and that "Congress in the winter session" may be preparing to do things which will undermine all the pillars of finance. In these matters we approach the realm of the psychological; also the field of disputation where entirely opposite and conflicting reasons will infallibly be assigned for the same event.

If, in the vicissitudes of fortune, we actually were to have a "panic" this next autumn, history would preserve two perfectly developed and in all respects mutually inconsistent theories in regard to it. The Wall Street oracles, gazing at the wreck of their own pet projects, would point angrily to Congress and its legislation as the author of the mischief, while the Congressional oracles, basing their conclusions on precisely the same phenomena, would shake their fists at Wall Street as the deliberate and revengeful planner of the financial crash. Such is the habitual experience of economic "argument." A year ago, a President of the United States was going up and down the country, telling his audiences how the panic of 1893, and the low price of wheat in 1894, were caused by the tariff legislation of the latter year. Last week another echo of the past, in the shape of a speech by a Senator from Colorado, described how the whole 1893 collapse was due to a wicked conspiracy by the banking "magnates," provoked by the movement for a silver standard.

It is true that some minds devote themselves rather to inquiring what must have been the cause of such events, than to guessing what might have been their cause. There were commonplace people, after 1893, who recalled that London's "Baring crash" of a little while before, and the subsequent overspeculation in our West, had led very naturally to the crisis of that year. There are people now who ascribe the financial reaction of the past six months, and who would ascribe an even more serious reaction in the coming months, to the outbreak of the Balkan War on the top of a situation, in European finance, which was already ripe for a serious reckoning. These plain matters of record and chronology may have in them the making of sober history. But they do not inspire imagination among the market oracles of the hour. If, through the decree of a kindly Providence, a vigorous financial and commercial recovery were conceivably to mark the autumn of 1913, which philosopher would get the wider hearing in the newspapers and in Congress—the one who ascribed it to the country's agricultural good fortune and the careful retrenchment of its banking interests, or the one who awarded the whole merit of it to the reduction in the tariff and the proposals for currency reform?

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF

Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of the Nation (1865-1906)

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait. Price $1.50 net, postpaid.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait. It likewise preserves the notable letter of appreciation addressed to Mr. Garrison by more than two hundred contributors to the Nation on the completion of his fortieth year of service, and his acknowledgment thereof.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 31, 1913.

The Week

Washington dispatches state that the Republicans in the Senate are, after all, going to consume all the time they can in debating the tariff bill. Their motive is avowed. They have no hope of preventing the final passage of the bill. Nor are they under any illusion about the state of public opinion, being fully aware that it is not possible to get the people to take any interest in their speeches against the tariff. But by taking advantage of the rules—or lack of rules—of the Senate, they can delay and obstruct under the guise of debating; and in this way they think that they can head off the passing of a currency bill at this session. It is confessedly for this reason that the decision has been come to that the "debate" must go on. The plans of the Progressive Republicans in the Senate, as reported Monday, promise to add a new terror to Senatorial debating. Two sets of amendments are to be offered to the tariff bill, one by Smoot and the standpatters, the other by La Follette and his Progressive following. In the long run, the practical effect will be to divide still further the Republican opposition, and to make the Democratic majorities on contested clauses larger yet. La Follette will not support the Smoot amendments, and vice versa. But in the meantime, what devastating floods of futile oratory must we face in the Senate! Speeches will increase as the square of the amendments offered, and the efforts of our Senatorial giants of debate will be to use a hundred words where one would more than suffice. Their motto is that of the mediæval Schoolman who said, at one point in an unbearably long treatise: "This I say, lest anything be left unsaid." But in spite of the dread of suffering from suppressed speech, which seems to afflict Senators, some way must be found to make their "debates" something besides devices for destroying both time and mind, and for ending them when their life has long since fled.

It is evident from the visit made by all the members of the United States Civil Service Commission to the White House on Monday that the practice of reducing the grade of meritorious Republican employees in the classified service in order to make desirable openings for Democrats has reached serious dimensions. Now that the abuse has been called to the President's attention, it is to be hoped that it will be stopped, or at least kept within narrow bounds. But this is not the only manifestation of the spoils spirit in the dominant party that has been brought to public notice within the past few days. Last Friday, Senator Sterling, of South Dakota, presented a memorandum of the National Civil Service League in opposition to paragraph O of section 2 of the tariff bill. This paragraph, which was inserted in the House bill by the Senate Finance Committee, provides that for a period of two years after the passage of the act "the force of agents, deputy collectors, and inspectors" authorized by the income-tax section of the act shall be appointed "without compliance with the conditions prescribed" by the civil service law. The reasons for condemning this provision as vicious are too obvious to need stating. The Civil Service League does, however, give them, briefly and effectively; but the most effective thing in its memorandum is this quiet statement: "We can find nowhere in the report of the Committee on Finance as printed in the Congressional Record any reasons stated why this large force should be recruited outside the civil service law." Mr. Sterling gives notice that he will call up the League's protest when paragraph O is reached in the discussion of the bill. We trust that the Republicans will make a determined fight on it, and compel every Democrat to stand up and be counted as for or against this indefensible assault on the civil service.

That some strong feeling exists in the House Banking and Currency Committee, to the effect that the powers of the proposed Federal Board are not adequately defined or restricted, has been made plain enough in the Committee's discussions. The dispatches have seemed to agree that, while the suggestion was made that certain of these powers ought to be conferred only with specific limitations, the nature of such proposed restriction was not indicated. Yet it appears to us that the way for doing it is reasonably obvious. The two powers of the Federal Board which are altogether too sweeping and unregulated as the bill now stands, are that whereby the Board may "in time of emergency require Federal reserve banks to rediscount the discounted prime paper of other Federal reserve banks," and that in virtue of which the Board may "suspend for a period not exceeding thirty days (and renew such suspension for periods not to exceed fifteen days) any and every reserve requirement." Both powers are manifestly of the largest sort; the premature or mistaken exercise of either might very gravely jeopardize a financial situation; nevertheless, save for the very vague stipulation that the first shall be employed "in time of emergency," there is not a word to indicate when or how or why they should be resorted to.

The comment, suggested by all experience in banking crises, is that the initiative in such cases must come from the banks themselves, because it is they that are directly confronted with the peculiar necessities of the period. Therefore, the power to require rediscount of one regional central bank's paper by another ought to be limited, first, by provision for formal application by the regional bank which desires its paper to be thus rediscounted. Such an application ought unquestionably to be passed upon by a responsible body or committee, representing the other regional banks, and that could easily be provided for if Chairman Glass's proposal of a committee advisory to the Federal Board, such committee to be elected by the several regional banks, were to be adopted. We are decidedly of opinion that some such committee should be formed, and that the law should demand submission to its consideration of such vitally important actions as the requirement of loans by one regional bank to another, and the suspension of all reserve requirements in an emergency. "Suspending the bank act" is an expedient not unknown to English banking practice; but it must not be forgotten that the Government merely offers or authorizes such action, never requires it. In the Baring panic of 1890, the Exchequer offered to suspend the act, and the governor of the Bank of England rejected the proposal. The result proved beyond dispute that the Bank was right and the Government wrong.

Another Central American President has made public his unwillingness to accept for his republic anything like the proposed American protectorate over Nicaragua. Salvador joins Costa Rica in politely putting away the suggestion. President Meléndez of Salvador telegraphs that he has no power to negotiate such a treaty, since it would be "contrary to the aspirations of this country as a free people." Of course, these Central American nations are not refusing anything that has been offered them. For that reason they are all the more free to speak their mind. And their statement of their own position, together with implied criticism of the Nicaraguan proposal, cannot fail to have effect in both Nicaragua and Washington. What they say is that surrender of their own control of their own public debt and their own foreign relations and, virtually, their own independence, would be intolerable to a free people. This is only the natural attitude of a self-respecting Government, and an enormous burden of proof is put upon the Nicaraguan Government and the State Department at Washington, to show why that attitude should be departed from in this case. Thus far it has not been shown.

Most Americans have an impression that the rush to Northwestern wheatfields has populated Western Canada with Yankees. But this is rudely dissipated by the latest Canadian census bulletins. Of the 11,086 homesteads entered in the three prairie provinces during the five months ending May 31, 1911, nearly three-fourths were taken by Canadians or emigrants from the British Isles. Figures now available show that 55 per cent. of the Dominion's population is of British origin, while in the last few years the French inhabitants have fallen from 30.71 to 28.51 per cent. of the whole. In the last census period the number of English in Canada rose by 562,251, or 44.55 per cent.; of Scotch by 800,154; of Irish and Welsh by 73,628. All this has far more than offset the current of American immigration. The ties of tradition, sentiment, and blood which bind five-sevenths of the Canadians to Great Britain are thus broadening, not narrowing. When it is considered that more than a million Canadian-born have recently found homes in the United States, these 1911 bulletins throw new light on the old assumption that the Dominion is in danger of absorption by her southern neighbor.

Something besides Mrs. Ella Flagg Young's reputation as an educator, and prominence as the first woman to be the head of a great city's school system, gives her resignation at Chicago wide interest. Her motive was to end friction with a wing of the School Board which she accused of blocking any measure she advocated, regardless of its worth. This meant withdrawal from all but a clerical performance of assigned duties. With the issue thus one of executive responsibility and the hold of politics upon school administration, not of the Superintendent's ability, the merits of the case seem clear. So thinks the Chicago press, the great body of newly enfranchised women, the president of the School Board, and Mayor Harrison. No matter how the affair ends, the prompt public indignation which Mrs. Young's resignation has provoked, and the pressure exerted to have her reconsider it, can scarcely fail to improve conditions for her successors.

The interesting thing about the anti-tipping ordinance that has been adopted at St. Louis is not that it is an attempt to stop tipping by law, but that it originated in the desire of the waiters themselves. The tip-giver has no means of knowing whether the system to which he conforms when he makes his ever-recurring offering is a benefit to those whom it seems to favor, or the reverse. The tip-taker has a better chance of knowing, and it seems to be the verdict of the St. Louis takers of tips that they would be better off without them. So far as concerns the waiter who spends a considerable amount of time in attending to one's wants and gets a small fee in acknowledgment, it is at least a possibility that what he gets he is allowed to keep; though even then one may be sure that something like the average amount of his tips is taken out of the wages he would otherwise get. But where the standard tip is a big sum, or where the ridiculous practice exists of tipping—even though it be but with five cents—for a service that occupies but a few seconds, it is clear that what you give ostensibly to the servitor really goes into the pockets of his employer.

The success of the American tennis players in carrying off the Davis Cup gives ground for national satisfaction. In what is one of the cleanest and best of sports the team has won a clear-cut victory after the hardest kind of struggle for it. To defeat the Englishmen anywhere would be a remarkable achievement; to defeat their veterans on their own ground, after beating the Germans, Canadians, and Australasians as well, argues pluck, stamina, and skill of a rare kind. In Mr. McLoughlin America has a young player whose brilliancy is conceded by the English press, with prophecies of still greater achievements to come. By his ability to pull himself together after having apparently gone stale, and perhaps overtaxed himself in trying for the English championship, he has shown rare grit and determination. But the whole team deserves praise, and will receive it in full measure, and the warmest kind of reception, on its return. Lawn tennis has so long been the Englishmen's pet and preëmpted domain, that this defeat will, like their showing at the Olympic, compel them to more heart-searchings—and perhaps even fresh fears of an oversea invasion.

College athletics is in no need of boosting, but might get it from the English tributes to the sportsmanship, as well as the political services, of the late Alfred Lyttelton. His death drew attention to a personality of unusual charm and force, interested in every social and philanthropic activity, and prominent as a member of Parliament and Colonial Secretary. But none of his eulogists failed to mention his career on the fields of Eton and Oxford. "The sight of him smiting the cricket-ball to the boundary with lightning-like play of the wrist," wrote one, "or dribbling the football at headlong speed down the field, or scoring stroke after stroke in the Fives Court, lingers a magnificent exhibition of youth in its strength and beauty." Later he became the best amateur tennis player of his time, and still later a first-class shot and a passionate lover of golf. "No Englishman," remarked the London Times, "has had so unique a faculty of excelling in every form of game, or practiced it with so gay a mien, or turned it so entirely to the enjoyment of his friends as well as himself."

In the comment on the Irish Secretary's announcement that $300,000,000 is still needed to carry out the Irish Land Act, one of his proposals has escaped general notice. Mr. Birrell proposes that the landlords be hereafter paid half in cash and half in stock, and that the latter payments be made from a wide range of Imperial securities. Already Canadian cities are elated over the prospect that Irish trustees will be allowed to invest in bonds of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver, and Canadian provincial securities. A recent Montreal issue of $8,000,000, at 4¼ per cent., is reported as still three-fourths unabsorbed; while the city of Winnipeg is meeting similar difficulties in disposing of a loan at 4½ per cent. The total sum ultimately available, one of the Montreal papers observes, will probably reach $250,000,000, and "quite suffice to place these classes of securities on a new footing with the British public."

It is pleasant to read of the high tribute paid at last week's meeting of the British Medical Association to the great improvement in surgical methods worked out by an American, Dr. Crile, of Cleveland. The problem to which he set himself years ago was the doing away, as far as possible, with that baffling and dreaded thing, "surgical shock." He studied deeply the processes by which vitality is drained through unconscious strain upon the brain and nerve centres, while the patient is undergoing a painless operation. His conclusions, and the extraordinary results attained in his own hospital practice, he recently set forth in a medical journal. The matter is too technical to be described at length, but it may be said roughly that Dr. Crile's method is, first, to dull the patient's nervous activity before the operation, so that mental apprehension is removed; then by means of local anæsthetics to separate the area containing the site of the operation from all connection with the nervous system; and, finally, when the surgery is over, still to keep the involved tissues isolated, as it were, from the rest of the body. It should be added that this brilliant technique, which has now received such distinguished recognition as an American contribution to the relief of human suffering, was elaborated by Dr. Crile only after a long series of experiments with animals.

Dr. Friedrich Franz Friedmann is not finding everything pleasant sailing, now that he has returned to his native heath. True, Prof. Carl Schleich, the distinguished surgeon, still stands up for him and declares that his methods "tower high" above those of any other. But this latest eulogy has brought forth volleys of protest from the medical world. Prof. Felix Klemperer explains in the Berlin Tageblatt that the reason why every reputable clinic was closed to Dr. Friedmann is simply that he would not take the medical world into his confidence; that, until the facts were let out here, the Friedmann remedy was a secret one. Moreover, he asserts that even in Germany Dr. Friedmann "did not take the always open path to an above-board testing of his specific." Naturally, the profession looked upon him with suspicion. Professor Klemperer points out further that Dr. Friedmann has no right to claim that his remedy will cure; that all he might reasonably assert is that it is a preventive, like vaccine or the typhoid serum, which has so largely reduced the soldier death-rate from that disease. It might conceivably render a patient immune, but to talk of its curing is utterly beside the mark. Unfortunately, the almost daily report of the death of one of Dr. Friedmann's patients in this country affords confirmation of Professor Klemperer's charges. Who shall measure the additional mental suffering undergone by these invalids and their families because of the false hopes held out to them?

A recent bye-election has added the one hundred and eleventh Social-Democratic member to the German Reichstag, Ferdinand Ewald having been elected in a district which never before chose a member of his party, by an increase of 1,000 votes over the balloting in 1912. On two successive days the Conservatives were twice badly beaten, by the Social-Democrats and by a representative of the Peasants' Alliance. Counting in the Radical groups, which at times act with the Social-Democrats, the Left now numbers no less than 203 members, which gives to it a commanding position—the total is 397 members—when it holds together. When it is recalled that the Social-Democrats had but eleven seats so lately as 1887 their extraordinary progress is plain. What if they should gain another hundred seats in the next twenty-six years? Herr Ewald's victory is the more significant because every effort was made to defeat him on the ground that the Social-Democrats, having voted against the increase of the army, were "anti-national" and semi-traitors. But the electorate cared nothing about that; perhaps it realized that that vote was but half-hearted, and perhaps judged it to have been chiefly for consistency's sake. At any rate, the Radicals having refused to vote with them, the Left did not constitute a majority in that case, but registered merely the Socialist strength. At the same time the possibility of the Left's carrying through reforms and blocking further the plans of Agrarians and Conservatives has come much nearer by reason of these last two bye-elections.

A "poet's bank" for poets who have not yet won recognition is the brilliant suggestion of some Paris writers. For generations the French capital has been the resort of struggling artists, literary and other, who frequently are confronted at the start by starvation or disease. Tide them over this preliminary period, and they can take care of themselves. The plan is so simple that it is nothing less than tragic that it was not thought of long ago. The poet in financial straits goes to the bank, we suppose, with his verses in his pocket. There the officials examine his manuscript with the same attention that in other banks is bestowed upon other kinds of collateral. Finding that the writer is a genius, certain of success if only he can keep body and soul together a few years longer, they advance him the necessary number of francs to buy luncheon or discharge the rent of the attic that he calls home, and he returns to his abode with renewed spirit, to write more verses to submit as collateral upon the next pressing occasion. The idea is capable of wide application.

THE MEXICAN DIFFICULTY.

Ambassador Wilson is probably not far wrong when he declares that our relations with Mexico are now critical. If they were not, his indiscreet talking would have made them so. His course since returning to the United States has been more ill judged than one would have supposed that even the most incompetent or reckless diplomat could have shown himself capable of. That he talked to the reporters at all about his delicate mission was a huge blunder. A talking Ambassador is always a nuisance and generally a peril. We do not hold Ambassador Wilson to all that he is reported to have said. Some things put into his mouth he has repudiated. But this is the mischief of allowing himself to be interviewed at all. His language will be embroidered or added to. The one safe course is to refuse to say anything for publication. That is what Ambassador Wilson would have done if he really knew his business. We omit mention of loyalty to his chiefs, who were keeping absolutely still in the trying circumstances preceding the announcement of a policy, and who had a right to expect their subordinates to have a close tongue. If Ambassador Wilson is seeking to get himself replaced for indiscretion, his conduct has been admirably fitted to that end; but even so he should not have forgotten that something larger is at stake than his personal interests.

Without, as we say, pinning Ambassador Wilson down to everything in the press purporting to come from him, it is clear that he returned with a definite plan to urge upon the Administration. It is plain, too, that he regarded himself as the only man in Washington entitled to speak on Mexico with authority. This attitude of his, we may remark, is one of the elements of danger. Even if Ambassador Wilson were the wisest and most energetic of men, the mere fact that he had filled an official post in the City of Mexico would not warrant him in setting himself up as an oracle on all the affairs of so large and varied and, at present, so distraught a country. Lord Palmerston once made a powerful exposure of the folly of taking it for granted that foreign policy is to be dictated by "the man on the spot." Nobody is more subject to mistake and to acquiring narrow views than the man on the spot. His reports constantly need to be checked by information gathered from others; and a really able and conscientious Foreign Minister or Secretary of State will insist upon getting all the evidence possible and then making up his mind for himself. In this aspect of the matter, the Washington Administration is to be praised, not blamed, for having had its own private agents in Mexico, to supplement the official reports of Ambassador Wilson and others. Only in such ways, and by fortifying themselves with all the knowledge attainable, could Mr. Bryan and the President put themselves in a position to discuss with the Ambassador his plan for solving the Mexican difficulty.

That plan, as made public in general terms, contains some plausible features. It is Ambassador Wilson's conviction that the way for this Government to work for pacification and a settled order in Mexico is in coöperation with the Huerta régime, now unquestionably the only de facto Mexican Government. In dealing with the Provisional President of Mexico there would be an obvious advantage, provided it led immediately to the settlement of outstanding American claims, and also to an official undertaking by Gen. Huerta not himself to be a candidate for the Presidency, and to do everything in his power to obtain a fair election in October, by the results of which all Mexicans would abide. But the folly and danger appear, as soon as we come to the proposal which Ambassador Wilson would link with the foregoing—namely, that the military forces of the United States undertake to put down the rebellion in Coahuila and the other Northern States of Mexico. It seems evident that President Wilson rejected this suggestion on sight; and it seems unnecessary to dwell upon its glaring absurdity.

Nevertheless, the problem remains, and how to solve it will still tax all the skill and patience of President Wilson. All the indications from Washington are that he is putting resolutely aside any thought of using armed force, unless it be as a last dire necessity, and that his mind is dwelling upon demonstrating American friendliness to Mexico in this time of her trouble, with readiness to aid in every peaceful and legitimate way in bringing about better conditions across our Southern border. It may prove that the idea of friendly mediation, through a special commission or otherwise, is not feasible. Its success would, of course, depend upon Gen. Huerta and the various revolutionary leaders agreeing to deal with such a commission, and to accept its advice. This seems highly doubtful. At the same time, the President should be upheld in pressing along the line of offering Mexico our good offices in every practicable form, instead of threatening her with our guns. By persisting in this attitude of determined friendship, President Wilson will go far towards disarming Mexican suspicions. Another step in the same direction would be an early selection as Ambassador to Mexico of the most large-minded and skilled man he can find. No other diplomatic appointment made or to be made is the equal of this in critical importance.

A RIVAL ISTHMIAN CANAL.

One of the provisions of the pending treaty with Nicaragua has been tacitly assumed to be of enormous value to the United States. It is the cession to this country of the exclusive right to construct an interoceanic canal through Nicaraguan territory. Ever since Secretary Knox first had this embodied in the original treaty, it has been taken for granted that it was a fine stroke both of business and diplomacy. And Secretary Bryan's statesmanlike foresight has been supposed to be demonstrated by his retaining the provision in the new treaty. We have nowhere seen any scrutiny of the matter. It is one of those things that pass into general acceptance without examination. Farmers out in Nebraska will read of our forestalling any other nation in building a possible Nicaraguan canal, and will say: "That's a good idee. We can't have anybody else cutting into our Panama tolls or sending battleships to the Pacific unbeknownst." And this cross-roads view is as good as anything we get from Washington. Bill Jones's opinion is about the same as Henry Cabot Lodge's, and fully as well founded. Everybody says that the canal provision is a fine thing, but nobody explains why.

It is time to ask for information. What are the facts? Is there any likelihood whatever of this country ever wanting to dig another canal across the Isthmus? The canal we already have would seem sufficient to fill up the measure both of our pride and our purse. We have spent at Panama more than we shall ever get back. The most optimistic estimate of the amount of shipping that will use the Panama Canal does not figure that the tolls will begin to pay interest charges until some twenty years from the opening. And this does not reckon in maintenance. Uncle Sam is easily bled, but he will not repeat at Nicaragua the Panama outlay unless for overwhelming reason. Commercial reasons there will exist none whatever. Supposing that trade developments now unforeseen, or a great increase in the size of steamships, were ever to make the Panama Canal inadequate or obsolete, it could be enlarged and improved at one-tenth the cost of a new canal through Nicaragua. What has had to be undertaken for the Kiel Canal and at Suez could be done at Panama. For contemplating a rival to the latter, there is absolutely no business argument.

Ah, it is said, but it is not that we mean to do it; we are only heading off skilfully and betimes any project of the kind that England or Germany might otherwise undertake. But either of them could undertake it for only two conceivable reasons—to make money, or for some military advantage. The money-making motive, however, is at once ruled out. If a single Isthmian canal will have to struggle along to meet its fixed charges, two would smell of bankruptcy from the first. Some may assert that the leading shipping nations regard the tolls at Panama as too high, and so might decide to build an interoceanic canal for themselves. But that is not at all the way in which the matter presents itself practically to ship-owners. What they figure on is simply the question whether it is cheaper to use the canal or to keep on going round the Cape or through Suez. If the tolls are too high, they will not go to the Isthmus at all.

The naval argument is not explicitly stated, but seems to run about as follows: Foreign nations would not, indeed, be justified in spending $400,000,000 for a commercial canal across Nicaragua, but might be for a canal mainly for naval purposes. They would regard it as an immense advantage to be able to pass their ships across the Isthmus without coming within range of American guns. But what does this amount to when it is reduced from vague talk to precise definitions? The only case in which this alleged superiority of a Nicaraguan canal over that at Panama, purely for the military objects of European countries, could possibly exist would be a war with the United States. In all other wars foreign battleships can freely pass through the Panama Canal, under the ordinary rules of neutrality. And if it be said that it is exactly the possibility of war with the United States against which foreign Powers might seek to provide by a canal through Nicaragua, the answer is clear. They could build such a canal against our will only by being able to beat us in a great naval battle. But if they could thus beat us, they would not need to build another canal, for they could take away from us the one already built.

By itself, it may not seem worth while to expose the fallacies in the scheme of a rival Isthmian canal. Probably neither the Nicaraguan Government nor our own really regards the matter of so much importance as is gravely pretended. Certainly, if Nicaragua is selling this tremendously valuable right for a beggarly $3,000,000, with a lot of naval and coaling stations thrown in, she is making an extremely bad bargain. To the actual negotiators, the canal concession very likely appeared a sort of makeweight that might as well be thrown in; but in the public press and in Congress it has been sagely discussed as if it were big with the fate of nations. Such loose ideas about it may help create opinion favorable to the Nicaraguan treaty; which is a good reason for seeking to show how loose they are. From any really serious discussion of the Nicaraguan protectorate, this canal fancy ought to be cut out. It is one of those things which float about in the popular mind, winning general assent mainly because nobody challenges them or shows how without foundation they are. And illusions about the second Isthmian canal ought not to prevent people from looking intently at the really substantial provisions of the treaty, and asking one another soberly whether this far-reaching national policy ought to be entered upon lightly or unadvisedly.

THE HAND THAT PULLED THE STRINGS.

The witty Frenchman's definition of history as le mensonge convenu, the lie agreed upon, we have always regarded as a fine epigram, to be sure, but nevertheless as a gross libel on the labors of the historians. But the Mulhall revelations stagger our confidence in what has been accepted as the true story of the nations. For here has been going on, right under our noses, a gigantic manipulation of the political forces of our country, the very existence of which, but for a fortunate chance, would have remained unknown forever. Had Mr. Mulhall been treated by his employers according to his plain deserts, the flood of letters containing the inner history of our time which have now become the possession of all the world would surely never have been let loose. And the consequence would have been that the history of our time would have been made up in the usual way. It would have spoken of the influence of the acts of Presidents and Senators and Representatives and party leaders; of the pressure of public opinion in this direction or that; of the high cost of living and the growth of monopoly; in short, of all those things which, according to the French epigrammatist, form the staple of the conventional lie that we call history. And all the time those who knew what was actually going on would have maintained an absolute silence about it. The historical student in the next generation would have searched the books, and even the newspapers, in vain for the name of Mulhall; except the Baltimore city directory it would be difficult to mention a place in which his name was to be found in print. And yet now we know that it was Mulhall who pulled the strings which set the puppets going this way or that.

Take the latest instalment of the revelations. Over it was appropriately placed, in one of the morning newspapers, the conspicuous headline, "Mulhall Active in New York Politics." Active! We should say so; not active like the ordinary intriguer or politician of conventional history, but active in a free, broad, comprehensive way, such as the plodding historian has no inkling of. In his simple and straightforward letters to his employers, he tells fully, and without any false modesty, of the big work he is doing:

> I made arrangements through Congressman William S. Bennet to have the Republican candidate for Mayor, Mr. Bannard; Mr. Prendergast, who is running for City Controller, and Mr. Mitchel, chairman of the Board of Aldermen, take luncheon with Messrs. Bird, Boudinot, Hoile, Nevins, ex-Congressman Watson, Col. Thayer, of Indianapolis, and others at the Machinery Club, in this city. The candidates for office clearly outlined their plan of campaign, and their manager, Congressman Bennet, anxiously solicited our aid for the next few weeks.
> I have been very successful in getting help for them through the Retail Dry Goods Association of Greater New York, and I have secured for them, through the secretaries of different organizations, over 100,000 names, and we will organize meetings for them to help them out for the balance of the campaign. This work will be done entirely without cost to our Association.

Note the Colonel's mastery of all sides of the art of political strategy; the bringing together of the big leaders on the one hand, and on the other the engineering of a big popular campaign "entirely without cost to our Association." Similar energy and ability were evidently exerted in connection with the State campaign in New York in 1910, Mr. Mulhall going so far as almost to have seen Mr. Murphy in relation to the Democratic nomination; and if he did not quite attain that end, it may reasonably be supposed that this was because Murphy, with the instinct of political genius, realized that Mulhall was a bigger man than himself at his own game, and didn't care to match himself against him. And all this New York business was but a side matter, which we mention merely as a sample of the numberless activities of this amazing master of political intrigue.

There are, to be sure, some considerations which the defender of the conventional historian may adduce to break the force of the Mulhall story. Some explanation, he will say, ought to be forthcoming of the failure of the great National Association of Manufacturers to maintain good relations with a man capable of wielding such mighty influence with such consummate skill. But this objection can easily be disposed of. It is evident throughout the Mulhall correspondence that the chiefs of the Association were wholly unfitted to play the part which the genius of their agent made possible for them. Nowhere does one find a constructive suggestion from them, or even a truly intelligent appreciation of the work that Mulhall was doing. His reports of progress are indeed acknowledged with courtesy and with expressions of pleasure, but it is merely such acknowledgment as a child or a novice might make of the work of a professional whose ways are wonderful to his mind, but quite beyond its powers of analysis or estimate.

Another thing which some will regard as casting doubt upon the significance of the Mulhall story is the money side of the matter. The manufacturing interests of America, measured in dollars, run high into the tens of billions. The promotion of the objects that these interests held to be most important was entrusted, so far as political forces were concerned, to this man. And yet he lived, during all those years, and lives still, in a simple house, in a very modest semi-suburban quarter of Baltimore. There is every reason to believe that the salary he drew from the Association was on an extremely moderate scale. Moreover, the money that was paid out by him for the purpose of advancing the friends and crushing the enemies of the manufacturers amounted, even according to his own account, to an absurdly small sum; and his own accounts, as shown by such statements as that recently made by Mr. McClave, are the result of what psychologists might perhaps call a magnifying memory. It must be admitted, therefore, that the mighty manufacturing interests which were behind Mulhall showed a degree of parsimony in promoting their own interests which it is difficult to account for upon any ordinary view of human nature. Some may, therefore, incline to the view that Mulhall was not doing all this wonderful work with which he credits himself; that, stupid as they showed themselves in so many ways, the officers of the Manufacturers' Association were not quite so stupid as really to believe everything that Mulhall told them; and that, in short, the Mulhall story is made up of a few grains of fact and an intolerable deal of fancy.

FACTS ABOUT THE DEPARTMENT STORE.

The thanks of everybody who has been left in a state of confusion and disgust by such "investigations" as that of Lieut.-Gov. O'Hara, of Illinois, are due to the National Civic Federation for its report upon "Working Conditions in New York Stores." The report fills the thirty-two large pages of the last number of the National Civic Federation Review, and is just what such a document should be. It goes after the main things; it is detailed, but has numerous tables and summaries; it is careful to supply the sources of its information and conclusions; and it is judicial without being colorless. Its presentation of masses of facts and series of inferences constitutes the sort of knowledge upon which, and upon which alone, we ought to base agitation for legislative and individual improvements. An initial investigation was begun in January, 1911, which extended over a period of one year. When this report was ready, the Federation was asked by the Retail Dry Goods Association to make a second survey, bringing the report up to date. The Association also offered to facilitate the work of ascertaining the facts regarding wages by permitting the payrolls of all its members to be examined at its own expense. This offer enabled the Federation to widen the scope of its inquiry, and the result of its willingness to wait is a report that will command confidence in all quarters.

The report deals specifically with industrial conditions in nineteen of New York's retail firms, and involves twenty-two establishments and 39,000 employees, of whom 22,000 are women. But its importance lies in the circumstance that its recommendations probably apply to conditions under which not less than 500,000 saleswomen earn their bread in this country. This figure does not include other women employed in stores. The first question that one asks of these investigators is, What are the facts about these saleswomen's earnings? And it is to be noted that these facts are presented upon the authority of a firm of public accountants and auditors. The average rate of wages of saleswomen is $9.31 a week. If we add the commissions paid in certain stores, this figure rises to $9.58. But "average" is a very deceitful word. Analysis shows that nearly 40 per cent. of the 9,000 saleswomen in these New York stores, and more than 50 per cent. of the 20,000 women employees of all sorts, receive less than $8 a week. But there are only 27 saleswomen who receive less than $5; on the other hand, 2,600 other women employees receive less than $5, and 654 receive less than $4.

These amounts mean little by themselves. Comparisons may be odious to "investigators" who start out, not to learn the truth, but to prove a thesis, but they are essential to the rest of us. And comparisons of earnings in department stores with those of women in factories or in stores of all sizes are favorable to the large store. In 1909, the Government Bureau of Labor found that the average weekly wage of saleswomen in twelve department stores in this city was $8.84, while that of women employed in factories here was $6.12. The same Bureau found that the average pay of women in twenty-six department stores in the four largest cities in the country was $7.93, while that of women in all the stores in those cities was $7.21. And there is an upward trend in the pay of saleswomen. A Government investigation of one store in April, 1909, found the average wage of saleswomen to be $7.89. Two and a half years later the Civic Federation found the average pay to be $8.27; and the Federation's figures for April of this year are $8.61. The same result is seen in a comparison of the Government's figure of $8.84, quoted above, for twelve department stores in this city in 1909, with the Federation's figure of $9.31 for seventeen stores in 1913. Other instances of the same sort are given in the report.

It thus appears that, if the department store is responsible to any extent for "white slavery," it sins in a large company. And this, in the opinion of the Federation's experts, is exactly the impression which it is sought to make. Nothing less than an indictment of our whole industrial system, and with it our whole political system, is the aim of those who are raising the alarm. Such persons cannot be expected to fasten their rolling eyes upon so stolid a thing as a fact, still less upon a bit of reasoning. Others, however, and this still means the mass of us, will find something very rational in the comment of an employer who, as a young man, believed rumors of this kind. "It would be poor business policy," he remarks, "for how could a company expect employees to deal honestly with it if those employees were induced by it to lead lives of shame?" The strange thing in these reckless charges is the evident supposition that only a soulless corporation was attacked, the possible slander upon scores of thousands of girls and women not being even remotely perceived. This phase of the attacks is not absent from the minds of the Civic Federation's investigators, however, and they demolish the whole rotten structure with a completeness that ought almost to convince even the wildest of those who set it up. For column after column, one impartial authority after another gives testimony to the falsity of any supposition that there is any important connection between occupation and immorality, or even want and immorality, among women.

The department store is not the last word in industrial organization. Yet it seems to be, not merely no worse than its fellows, but rather better. We have considered only the most damaging of the criticisms that are levelled against it, saying nothing about what it is doing to improve working conditions for its employees. Yet eighteen of the thirty-two pages of the report are upon "Welfare Work and General Recommendations for Improvements." These pages bristle with details of what these stores are doing to make life more livable for those dependent upon them, ranging from the distribution of a cooled beverage twice a day in summer to saving and lending arrangements which make mightily for thrift and self-respect. Doubtless no store is doing all it can in this direction. Doubtless every store needs to be under the eye of the fire inspector, and to take heed to what this report has to say, for instance, about long hours. But what was required before all else was more light and less heat, and this the Federation's clear-headed examiners have given us.

THE PEDANTRY OF HUMORISTS.

Our age has grown accustomed to seeing pedantry ranging far from its native heath. There are many kinds of pedants at large. Mr. Hilaire Belloc wrote not wisely when he classified mankind into the lawyer, the merchant, the doctor, etc.—and the pedant. The class is not so isolated. In America, at all events, we have the factory owner who runs his shops according to the latest monograph on efficiency; the mother who fears to love her child more than the accepted treatise permits; and the child himself who reads what he is to play. Even our humorists have turned pedants. Formerly they had the consolation of knowing that when all other "copy" failed, they might look in their hearts and write. But that time, to judge by the way things are going, is past.

For humorists, it would appear, have taken to using card catalogues and books of reference. This, for aught we know, may be necessary, conditions having greatly changed the scope and details of humor during the past quarter of a century. Consider some of the old standbys which are now outworn: the mother-in-law, the commuter, the country cousin, the village beau, the big shoes of Chicago, the sleepiness of Philadelphia, precocious Willie, Uncle Josh. Apparently the mother-in-law has learned her lesson; the parcel post has deprived the commuter of his funny packages; the suburban trolley has wiped out of existence the country cousin and uncle; wise little Willie died from competition with all the actual prodigies of enterprising newspapers; and the "drums and tramplings" of Bull Moose conquests have somewhat staled Chicago in the humorist's eyes. If familiarity breeds contempt, it also blunts the edge of all but the finest wit. For the rough-and-ready joke depends for its effect upon a considerable exaggeration which for the moment may pass for the truth. So long as the alleged crudity of the Westerner caused him irritation because he knew that the Easterner more than half credited it, it furnished the humorist with the necessary zest. But now that the cultural conditions of the West are generally known to be much like those of the East, the salt hath lost its savor. Humor of old followed a few conventional lines; it was artificial, but not very bookish.

It was not so bookish, that is, as it is to-day. There were, of course, perennially the modern rehabilitations of stock characters in history and mythology which are supposed to be funny, such as Mark Twain's "Diary of Adam," an afternoon tea given by Calpurnia, Achilles playing centre rush. For the present change of front several things are responsible. Not the least is the inrush of cleverness. When smartness and paradox became the leading fashion, even men with scholarly interests were impelled to fall in line. Mr. Belloc, by a good deal of research, essayed to disprove the principal qualities usually assigned to the Anglo-Saxon. Mr. Frank Harris had his fun with the Shakespeare myth; another writer set out to show that the cannibal is in reality most human and lovable. But the main impulse has come from the "news interest" which in the press of all sorts has grown to be such an important factor. The popularity of Signor Ferrero's writings on ancient Rome sent the humorists to their reference books, and we had a large output of grotesque conduct ascribed to Julius Cæsar. Much, too, can be done by studying the calendar. Every day is the anniversary of important happenings, and these have to be scrutinized and indexed and brought into proper (that is, improper) relations. If every newspaper has its "graveyard," against the death of some notable, the humorist, it may be inferred, is equally far-sighted. He has not forgotten that human types in Panama will soon be much in demand, that the Colonel is going to Argentina, and that Shakespeare will one of these years be three centuries dead. Not all the variations of this scholarly humor need be mentioned. One is the mechanical method of developing a joke into a series calculated to do service for several days. It is very different from Shakespeare's splitting a lie up into seven categories, being manipulated somewhat as follows: Some comical incident having been related in the press concerning a German bassoonist, we are furnished with a serial on the whimsies of musicians.

Now, some of these excesses are apparently inevitable. The humorist must follow public interest, which in a cosmopolitan centre like New York ranges widely. The whole world is his oyster. Some jest has to-day to be wrung from China, to-morrow from Somaliland, next week from the underworld, and he must be prepared. "Front steps" repartee will get him no farther than it did Rousseau. And the level of intelligence with reference to the world at large has been raised so greatly that in default of the first-hand observation which travel would give him, he must perforce read up. The problem is how to keep his work from smelling of the lamp. He has also been led to believe that the public demands a certain number of jokes each day. Is it any wonder that he has felt the need of becoming an historian and several kinds of specialist?

Still, many will feel regret that the old familiar faces have dropped out of humor. They were human, even if trite, and had the broad free lines which stick in the memory. Of more recent creations, "Mutt" and "Jeff" perhaps came nearer than others to the former manner. They were the outgrowth of no accidental happening or anniversary or particular celebration, but corresponded to recognizable figures in everyday life. Naturally, they could not live when such enormous demand was made upon them.

AN OLD REVIEW IN NEW HANDS.

London, July 18.

The journal which, as Herbert Paul puts it, represents "the most highly cultivated form which philistinism has ever assumed," is about to come under a new régime. It is announced that at the end of August Harold Hodge will relinquish the editorship of the Saturday Review, after holding that post for fourteen years. Its chief proprietor, the Hon. Gervase Beckett, M.P., will then become editor-in-chief, with the assistance of George A. B. Dewar as literary editor.

Forty or fifty years ago such a notice would have made as great a stir in journalistic circles as a change in the editorship of the Times. For sheer cleverness the Saturday is still hard to beat, but somehow the range of readers to whom this type of writing appeals has greatly narrowed since the days when John Douglas Cook's young men provided a tingling sensation for every week-end. The average standard of culture in the community is a long way higher than it was then, and only an optimist without a conscience would say that there is less philistinism. But for some reason or other—partly, perhaps, through Matthew Arnold's preaching—the mixture of culture and philistinism is a less common blend. The result is that the Saturday, with all its brilliancy, exercises nothing like the influence that it once did. Tory clubmen continue to chuckle over its invective, but the public men at whom its shafts are aimed are hardly aware that they are serving the purpose of targets.

Yet in the history of English journalism the Saturday Review holds, and always will hold, a distinguished place. Its establishment really marked the beginning of a new era in the British press. In its independence of parties, its frankness and pungency of style, and its scholarly tone, it introduced a new note. In James Bryce's opinion, there never was a journal which enlisted so much and such varied literary talent as the Saturday did between 1855 and 1863. A paper that could count among its regular contributors such men as Goldwin Smith, Edward Augustus Freeman, John Richard Green, William Vernon Harcourt, Lord Robert Cecil (afterward Marquis of Salisbury), Charles Henry Pearson, Charles and Edward Bowen, Fitzjames and Leslie Stephen, and Henry Maine might well take a confident attitude.

"As memoirs are published," said the late F. W. Maitland in his biography of Leslie Stephen, "it becomes always more evident that any one who never wrote for the Saturday was no one."

There is scarcely any exaggeration in the statement of one of the historians of English journalism that "where the Examiner and the Spectator had depended on the wit or intelligence of one man, a Fonblanque or a Rintoul, the Saturday Review enlisted the services of a dozen men, and by making it a distinction in itself to contribute to its pages, soon obtained contributions from all the best men at Oxford and Cambridge, all the best men in the Temple and Lincoln's Inn, and all the best men in the Church." This notable band was collected and kept together by an editor who never wrote an article in the paper himself, but whose skill as an editor goes far to justify Sir William Robertson Nicoll's tribute to him as "the most remarkable journalist, all things considered, of the century." 'Cook," he says, "was nothing as a writer, but nobody was ever so successful as he is in surrounding himself with a strong staff of writers, in getting the best work out of each, and in ruling them all with an iron club."

The astonishing thing was that Cook contrived to procure and retain the services of men whose opinions were very different from his own; and he did this without any pressure upon them to write other than according to their own convictions. It is a marvel to find such names as those of Harcourt, Goldwin Smith, and the Stephens on the staff of a paper whose general attitude was conservative and high church. But the biggest Radical is a Conservative on some points, and Cook kept the peace within the office by employing the Liberals to write on subjects which they would approach in a Conservative frame of mind. His successors were not so adroit or so fortunate, and the time came when no one but a Tory could feel comfortable in contributing to the Saturday, on public questions, at any rate. Perhaps the last Liberal to go was Freeman, who broke off his connection with the paper—a step that involved the sacrifice of an income of $3,000 a year—because of its support of the Disraeli policy on the Eastern question.

Freeman's work on the Saturday Review was an example of a valuable type of service rendered by that journal to scholarship and literature. The slashing reviews that were a feature of the paper from the first were doubtless in many cases unduly censorious, but they did at any rate teach authors to mind what they were about. They inflicted a swift penalty upon carelessness and conceit, and the fear of them was a wholesome discipline for slovenly writers. When slipshod publications were slashed by the historian who, according to the two-edged compliment, "has illustrated so admirably for us the savage manners of our ancestors," the individual may have winced, but the public was a substantial gainer. No one can estimate the extent to which historical studies in England profited from the zeal with which Freeman scourged incompetence and presumption when he found them in the books sent to him for his notices in the Saturday.

A more intimate personal interest attaches to J. R. Green's association with this paper. One of his friends, Stopford Brooke, has told how he began to write for it while rector of one of the poorest parishes in the East End. He spent every penny of his stipend upon his parish, and used to send two or sometimes three articles a week to the Saturday Review, in order to get money for his own needs. One night he told Mr. Brooke, who was just then staying with him for a few days, that he had three articles to write for the Saturday Review, and they must all be done within thirty-six hours. One was a review of a volume of Freeman's "Norman Conquest"; the second was a "light middle"; the third was on the history of a small English town. Green had worked them all into form as he was walking that day about the parish and in London. Of these three articles, one was finished before two o'clock in the morning, while his visitor was talking to him, and the other two were ready by the end of the next day.

The same friend, as quoted by James Bryce in his biographical notice of Green, gives a striking account of how he used to prepare these historical sketches of towns which were a notable feature of his work for the Saturday. Early one morning Green reached Troyes with two companions, and at once started off to explore it, darting hither and thither through the streets, like a dog trying to find a scent. After lunch the party of travellers went on to Basel. Green sat down to write when his companions went to bed, and the next morning he laid on the breakfast table an article on Troyes, which was really a history in miniature. Yet he had never been in the place before or made a special study of it. Green's connection with the Saturday Review was ultimately broken off, not for political reasons, like Freeman's, but for literary. After a good deal of his "Short History" had gone through the press, he felt that its style was too much in the manner of his weekly articles. He therefore cancelled a good deal of what had already been set up and stereotyped, recasting it in another fashion, and giving up journalism altogether, in order that he might complete the work in the way he thought it should be written.

Leslie Stephen was another Liberal in politics who found it possible to write largely for the Saturday Review for many years, usually on neutral subjects. In a letter of his to Lowell, dated 1869, he says that he writes two articles a week for that paper, one a review of a book, and one a "middle." "I never," he says, "or very seldom, write about America directly, because I disapprove of the whole politics of the Saturday on that and on most other points. The fact is that my opinions are not very salable among the classes which buy the Saturday, and I only give them vent occasionally." Only a few years after the close of the Civil War, Stephen expressed his belief that most of the writers to the Saturday were on the side of the North, although the paper itself supported the South. But, in spite of his Liberalism, Leslie Stephen was a contributor whom even a Tory journal might well be anxious to keep, if by any editorial ingenuity he could be shunted off dangerous topics. As one of his chiefs has testified, "the sensation of the editor when he broke open an envelope and caught a glimpse of Stephen's neat, small handwriting in the customary long lines was as that of the man who spies a bright banknote."

It is a big jump from Freeman and Green and Stephen to Mrs. Lynn Linton. But her work illustrated much better than theirs the characteristic attitude and outlook of the Saturday. She is chiefly remembered nowadays as the author of several novels which, though once popular, have long ceased to be widely read. Her real distinction, however, was as one of the pioneers of the profession of journalism for women. She used to contribute editorial articles to the Morning Chronicle before Harriet Martineau had joined the staff of the Daily News. When the former paper had to be given up and its editor, Cook, started the Saturday Review, he enlisted Mrs. Lynn Linton among his helpers, and for many years, both under him and under his successor, Philip Harwood, she wrote for it numerous articles and reviews. The best known were the "Girl of the Period" series. They created quite a sensation at the time they appeared, and they cannot safely be neglected by any one who attempts to write a history of recent changes of opinion with regard to the duties and rights of women.

The decline of the Saturday Review preceded that of its great rival, the Spectator, though from different causes. Just now the Unionists are in sore need of a really strong weekly to help steady the party and save it from being blown about by every wind of doctrine. The new directors of the Saturday have, at any rate, a rare opportunity.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

It may not occur to every student of Americana that he would find something about the New England Independents in Alexander Ross's "Pansebeia," as the work has no section devoted to the Western Hemisphere. But turning to the edition of 1658, in its view of the religions of Europe, we find this:

Q. 18. What tenets are held by the Independents of New England?

Ans. Besides those opinions which they hold with other Independents, they teach that the Spirit of God dwells personally in all the Godly.

2. That their Revelations are equall in Authority with the Scriptures.

3. That no man ought to be troubled in his Conscience for sinne, being he is under the Covenant of grace.

4. That the law is no rule of our conversation.

5. That no Christian should be prest to practise holy duties.

6. That the soul dyeth with the body.

7. That all the Saints upon earth have two bodies.

8. That Christ is not united to our fleshly body, but to the new body, after the manner that his Humanity is united to his Divinity.

9. That Christ's Humanity is not in heaven.

10. That he hath no other body but his Church.

11. They reckon all Reformed Churches, except themselves profane and unclean.

"All these opinions," he concludes, "savour of nothing but of pride, carnall security, blasphemy, and slighting of God's written word, which is able to make the men of God perfect and wise unto salvation."

No New England Independent of the present day would recognize a reflex of his theological ideas in these eleven paragraphs. The controversialists of the seventeenth century had apparently a strong belief in their own infallibility and glibly attributed to their opponents the most preposterous opinions. It was a short and easy method: "You do not hold my opinions, therefore you are a heretic instigated by the devil and full of blasphemy and unrighteousness." Such would be a fair epitome of many wearisome tomes of polemics. Ross, who died in 1653, was the author of many books, mostly with pedantic titles (as "Rasura Tonsoris," "Mel Heliconium," and "Arcana Microcosmi"), and had sufficient courage to "refute" Bacon, Harvey, Hobbes, and Sir Thomas Browne. The first edition of the "Pansebeia" appeared in 1653, and the author died in the following year. Here is the title of the edition already quoted:

ΠΑΝΣΕΒΕΙΑ: or, A view of al Religions in the World: With the Severall Church Governments, from the Creation to these times. Also, a Discovery of all known Heresies in all Ages and Places: And Choice Observations and Reflections throughout the whole. The Third Edition, Enlarged and Perfected, by Alexander Ross. To which are annexed The Lives, Actions, and Ends of certain Notorious Hereticks. With their effigies in Copper-plates . . . Printed for John Saywell, and are to be sold at the sign of the Greyhound in Little Britain, and at the Pile of Bibles in the Stocks Fish-market, looking into Lombard Street over against the Post-house, London, 1658.

In the "Booksellers' Advertisement" we are assured that this larger book has been faithfully printed from the author's MS. and with so much care that it is "needless to prefix an errata." For the biographies at the end Ross had no responsibility. Although the signatures of this appendix run on, the pagination is separate, and there is an independent title-page which reads:

Apocalypsis: or the Revelation of certain notorious advancers of Heresie: Wherein their Visions and private Revelations by dreams, are discovered to be most incredible blasphemies, and enthusiastical dotages: Together with an account of their Lives, Actions, and Ends. Whereunto are added the effigies of seventeen (who excelled the rest in rashness, impudence, and lying,) done in copper plates. Faithfully and impartially translated out of the Latine by J. D. The second Edition, ... Printed for John Saywell. . . . London, 1658.

This forms a duodecimo book of 78 numbered pages, preceded by 20 and followed by 4 unnumbered pages. The dedication is signed Jo. Davies—the well-known though little-read Davies of Kidwelly. The book is inscribed to "the excellently learned" Edward Benlowes, who was a patron of Ross, a benefactor of the library of St. John's College (of which Davies was a member), and the author of "Theophila," a poem once admired and now forgotten. Davies says that the book he translated was "written in Latine by a most elegant pen by one who hath concealed his name, as I conceive out of this reason, that living near the times and places of this representation, it might have proved dangerous to him to have published it." As nearly a century had elapsed, this does not seem very likely. In the sixth edition of Ross's book all evidence that the "Lives" were the work of Davies of Kidwelly is omitted! The literary genealogy of the book appears to be as follows: In 1607 the publisher Haestens, of Leyden, issued "Grouwelen der voornaemste Hooft-Ketteren," and this was reprinted by Dorp in 1623. In 1608 Haestens published a German translation entitled "Greuwel der vornaemste Haupt-ketzeren," and a Latin version which appeared as "Speculum Anabaptistici furoris," and also under the title "Apocalypsis insignium aliquot Haeresiarcharum, interprete H. S. F. D. M. D." This is the Latin version which was turned into English by Davies of Kidwelly. The text is not remarkable either for clarity or accuracy, but fairly represents the attitude of the "orthodox" party towards the "heterodox." There are portraits of Thomas Muntzer, John Mathias, John Buckhold (Jan of Leyden), Hermannus Sutor, Theodorus Sartor, David George, Michael Servetus, "Arrius," Mahommed, Balthazar Hubmor, John Hut, Lodowick Hetzer, Melchior Hofman, Melchior Rinck, Adam Pastor, and Henry Nicholas. Many of these names are associated with the Peasants' War in Germany, which, in spite of the excesses by which it was in part marked, was a struggle of the down-trodden poor against their oppressors. The authorship of the "Apocalypsis" remains unknown, and indeed the main interest of the book is now in its portraits. But he would be a bold man who vouched for the authenticity of these effigies of Jan of Leyden, and of the others concerned in the grotesque tragedy of the Kingdom of God in Münster. Let those who are horrified by the excesses into which the Anabaptists were driven remember the bloody persecution and grinding oppression endured by the peasants before they rose against their tyrants. "When the poor have nothing else to eat," says Victor Hugo, "they will eat the rich." At least they will try to do so. It is a fact which the rich in all ages will do well to remember.

NATURALIZATION FOR JAPANESE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I take the liberty of writing you in regard to the situation of the Japanese in America, and especially concerning the Japanese Franchise League, which has for its purpose the obtaining of naturalization for our race.

To hosts of foreigners who swarm to these shores, and to the negro, the right of citizenship is granted, while it is refused to the Asiatics. This is obviously a rank and glaring injustice, and on many of us who have permanently settled in this country it imposes a handicap in every field of enterprise. It is the foundation for innumerable other discriminations—the California Anti-Alien Land bill being a striking example. The Government unquestionably has the right to legislate as it sees fit regarding labor, immigration, and naturalization; but its laws should apply equally to all, regardless of race and nationality.

Racial prejudice is at the very root of all this trouble, notwithstanding the fact that the Japanese are probably more hard-working, law-abiding, and less associated with scandal and crime than other foreigners in this country; ambitious, forever seeking to improve themselves and their surroundings, they would work to its economic interest. The strangest and most consoling part of it all is that the best element, the most educated of Americans, are not responsible for these injustices—in fact, know surprisingly little about them. The lower classes, trade unions, and the politicians who cater to them, are the real trouble makers, and it is this that should be brought to light.

"I recommend to the Congress that an act be passed specifically providing for the naturalization of Japanese who come here intending to become American citizens." Such was the measure suggested by former President Roosevelt, and such is the actual and direct object of our League.

THE AMERICAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS ART.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is there anything in the world more discouraging than the attitude of the American public towards art?

As a people we profess to take a great interest in art, yet there died a few days ago, in Paris, one of the first of modern painters, a man whose position in his profession is recognized everywhere but in this enlightened country, where the notice of his death was tucked away in a remote part of the newspapers that printed it, which announced simply the fact of his having died at a hospital in Paris, adding casually that he had exhibited several times in the Salon—nothing more!

The fact that thousands of painters exhibit annually in the Salons would seem to render this piece of information, to say the least, inadequate as interesting news.

For twenty years and more the work of Gaston La Touche has been a feature of the best exhibitions of the world, and as long ago as the Paris exhibition of '89 it created a sensation.

His mastery of composition, color, and the fine decorative quality of his painting prove him a master in his profession.

He was one of the great men of the most artistic nation in the world, and it is most mortifying to realize from the meagreness of his death notice the dense ignorance of the American public in everything vital relating to art.

When, a few years ago, a jury of artists, elected by their fellow artists for the purpose, awarded the gold medal at the Carnegie Institute at Pittsburgh to La Touche for his admirable picture, The Bath, the press of this country fairly teemed with comments upon this selection, not because the picture was recognized as a masterpiece by a distinguished painter and selected for honor by a distinguished jury, but because it happened to include a nude figure.

It was reproduced and sensationally gossiped about for weeks afterwards, and never a word published in regard to its great artistic quality.

To-day also I read in my newspaper this item: "There was surprise at a sale of pictures at Christie's to-day, when a small painting of a fête champêtre fetched $5,760."

The newspapers know very well what will most interest their public, viz., the price.

They therefore ignore the fact that those who really care for painting as an art are only able to judge of the value of a work they have not seen if they know the name of its author. Price to them is a negligible matter.

We speak of "a Velasquez," "a Whistler," "a Sargent," and so establish the standing of a work.

In this case the very unconvincing title "Fête Champêtre" is given as summing up its complete news value.

Again and again, our papers report the unveiling of a picture, or statue, giving long accounts of the ceremonies, the speeches, the music, and the people who attend the function, and never a mention of the artist who created the work.

In no other country do we find such self-satisfaction and complacency in regard to art as we do over here, and nowhere else such a lack of real intelligent appreciation, although we hear a great deal about art and profess to feel deeply interested in all that concerns it.

Is it necessary to cite as an instance of the quality of this interest the proposed duty on works of art which is to be included in our revised tariff?

I will confess to a completely hopeless feeling in finding this utterly indefensible and uncalled-for protection of our artists included in this revision.

It simply puts one more spoke in the wheel of our artistic progress.

We, the artists of this country, do not want it; we have not asked for it. On the contrary, we beg and pray that obstacles which keep out art work that aids and stimulates us may be removed and not arbitrarily imposed upon us by people who do not understand our needs and who take not the slightest interest in our profession.

The more we can see of what is being accomplished by artists all over the world the better it will be for our young art.

New, strong work stimulates, invigorates, and helps us in our efforts to produce something that each sincere worker cannot help hoping may some time stand as worthy and representative examples of American art. JOHN W. ALEXANDER.

SHORT-WINDED DRAMA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The recent experiment of the Princess Theatre in New York, with its intimate auditorium seating less than 300 and its repertory of one-act plays, is the most significant event of the theatrical year. It is but natural that people who have grown to prefer magazines to novels should also welcome a dramatic evening made up of three or four short, varied impressions rather than one long, consecutive, well-developed dramatic idea. Such a taste is, however, only a reversion to type. Sorbière, visiting London in the seventeenth century, wondered at the pot-pourri of scenes the English plays presented as compared with the well-built drama of his native France. He was told, however, that people liked the hodge-podge, enjoying one scene at a time and having no thought for the total effect.

Besides tending to make us less long-winded and conservative in our theatrical amusements, a theatre like the Princess is likely to stimulate the production of one-act plays just as the American magazine has fostered the short story. If the public demands artistic dramatic driblets, it will certainly get them, though the three and four-act play will never become extinct any more than the novel. We have only to look at the repertory of the Grand Guignol in Paris to see what is likely to happen in New York. This Grand Guignol has long been the prototype of all small theatres. Its little Gothic auditorium seats only 235, and the number of one and two-act plays it has given in the ten or more years of its existence is notable for variety and dramatic worth. A list of them is printed on the theatre programme. First one notices that the short story has been a dramatic mine for French writers of short plays. They have gone to their own Maupassant and Marcel Prévost, and have also borrowed largely from Poe and W. W. Jacobs. Probably O. Henry is too distinctively American for them, but that should be the best of reasons for giving his stories a dramatic setting at the Princess. The biggest success of the Grand Guignol in this line was a dramatization of Mark Twain's "How I Became the Editor of an Agricultural Paper." Played under the name of "The Chicago Farmer," it lost none of its original humor and delighted Paris for months with its satire on journalism. The best dramatic writers of Paris do not scorn the stage of the Grand Guignol. Mirbeau, Capus, Pierre Veber, Georges Berr, and Georges Courteline have all contributed to its repertory. Its manager, Max Maury, is also a noted playwright. Most remarkable of them all is André de Lorde, who by his dramatizations of Poe and his own originality has shown how much tense horror can be compressed into a short play. It is the mission of the Grand Guignol to make people laugh and also to make their blood run cold. The chance has at last come for American playwriters to produce some exquisite Tanagra bits of dramatic literature.

TOURIST CHARGES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It seems unfortunate that two such able gentlemen as Professor D'Ooge and Mr. Joseph Pennell should fall out over the question of tourist charges at ancient ruins, especially as some part of the difference appears to be due to varying premises. Professor D'Ooge has been very recently in Athens and Sicily and should speak by the card. PHILIP SANFORD MARDEN.

A NEW PUNCTUATION MARK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I hope I shall not be numbered with the Athenians if I give expression to a desire for a new mark of punctuation.

To find in an article devoted to a certain author or book, among various quotations from the author or book under consideration, one or more quotations from another source (not indicated), all between the same kind of inverted commas, is very confusing to such poor mortals as have not the wide range of allusion of a Lowell or a Meredith.

A case in point occurs in your review of Hugh Walpole's "Fortitude," this week. The reviewer writes: "So far he [the hero] has been able to take hardships as adventures, 'and nothing hurt where everything was romance.'" Now, all the other quotations in the review article are unmistakably from the book under review; this one is not. It may be, and it may not be; there is nothing in the external form of it to show whether it is or not. If it is not, then to one ignorant of this fact it would be exceedingly embarrassing if he were to make use of this quotation, adding with a fine show of up-to-date knowledge—"as Mr. Walpole says in his latest book"—only to be met with the crushing rejoinder, "Oh, but it was not Mr. Walpole who said that; it was Shakespeare or Mr. George Bernard Shaw."

The same confusing state of affairs is constantly encountered in encyclopædia articles. For example, I found in the new edition of Hauck's "Realencyklopädie," a fine thing I should very much like to use, but dare not, not being sure how to introduce it. The writer of the article on Adolf Hausrath, in volume 23, refers to the last years of Hausrath's life, during which his loneliness and deprivations awakened in him the longing "den hölzernen Schlafrock anzuziehen." Is that Hausrath's phrase or is the author drawing upon his own dictionary of quotations?

By common consent a satisfactory distinction might perhaps be arranged between the single and the double inverted commas; or, better yet, why could not the quotation marks frequently employed in German and French books («—») be used for all quotations not taken from the author directly under discussion?

This would make for clearness and for the diminishing of ignorance in the world—surely a most worthy cause.

TREVELYAN'S "BRIGHT."

The Life of John Bright. By George Macaulay Trevelyan. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $4.50 net.

John Bright could not be got in his life-time to take any interest in a possible biography. "My life is in my speeches," he said simply. That was true, for into his speeches he had wrought the thought and purpose and struggle of his life. Yet they were as a fine product to the making of which went much that we can understand only by all that can be extracted from his letters and diaries, as well as from current records and the contemporary judgments of his friends or foes. This aid to knowledge of the true Bright Mr. Trevelyan has given us in this volume with the literary skill, the restraint, the penetration, the entire fairness which we have learned to expect of him. The result is a rich and repaying book.

The secret of Bright's oratory is the secret of genius. This is the only conclusion one can come to after noting all the explanations offered. We are shown Bright forging the formidable weapon of his speaking-power through years of agitation and of practice. His voice was nature's gift, and so was his impressive port; his noble bearing bespoke a noble soul; but where did he get his style? The question is more piquing and baffling than in Macaulay's case. Macaulay's speeches can still be read, though with difficulty. Gladstone's are now impossible, except for the historian. But Bright's live on because they are literature. The uneducated cotton-spinner easily surpassed the best that the universities could do. Bright himself once said that if there was anything good in his manner of speaking it was largely due to his having steeped himself in good reading. He was at home in the great English poets; he often echoed the organ voice of England; he was mighty in the English Bible. Yet to say this merely throws us back on the selective taste and the genius for combination and arrangement and for majestic utterance which Bright possessed and which made him, even on the confession of a political enemy and an unsentimental critic like Lord Salisbury, "the greatest master of English oratory that this generation has produced, or I may say several generations back." "I have met," added Salisbury, "men who have heard Pitt and Fox and in whose judgment their eloquence at its best was inferior to the finest efforts of John Bright."

Great themes upon which to wreak his eloquence, John Bright did not lack. The wrongs of millions of his countrymen, economic freedom, enfranchisement, the high issues of peace and war, the pursuit of human slavery to its extinction —these were the subjects on which he won the ear of England and of the world. To Bright the Corn Laws, into the long fight for the repeal of which he poured all the energy of his young manhood, were no mere legislative blunder, no pale abstraction. He saw their effects written in human misery all around him in Lancashire. The dwarfed and blighted lives of the factory-workers were to him the express results of law-making by a class against a class —what he described in his private diary as "the selfishness and fraud which distinguish the government of the English oligarchy." So the tow in Bright was ready for the spark which Cobden let fall upon it; and when the two made their memorable pact not to rest until the Corn Laws were stricken from the statute-book, it was Cobden who furnished the logic and the generalship, Bright who supplied the massive passion. His speeches throughout this prolonged and hard-fought campaign rose higher and higher in tone, as he felt the burden on his heart grow heavier. Indeed, in a poignant sense of the suffering which wicked laws were causing men and women and children, Bright seems to have led all his generation. No churchman appears to have been so deeply touched with this feeling as was the Quaker. One does not recall John Henry Newman, for example, ever alluding to the Corn Laws or to the agitation to undo them; there is no entry under the word in the index to Mr. Ward's Life of him. But Bright was overwhelmed by the concrete sorrows of his kind which left the theologian unmoved—perhaps but dimly knowing. Yet the intensity of the great agitator's emotions did not throw him off his balance. He wonderfully kept his head, and when success at last crowned his labors, he gloried in the demonstration that a way to freedom had been found "not through violence and bloodshed." His motto was, "Moderate but irresistible in our moderation." This, be it remembered, came at a time when a Chartist orator was declaiming: "If they will not reform this . . . we have sworn by our God, by heaven, earth, and hell, that we shall wrap in one awful sheet of devouring flame the manufactories of the cotton tyrants and the palaces of those who raised them by rapine and murder." The dead failure of the Chartists, over against the triumph of Bright—even in the matter of obtaining what the Chartists wanted, the vote for workingmen—has its historic warning for the modern violent school, from syndicalists to militant suffragists.

By the compulsion of his mission, rather than by personal preference, Bright went to Parliament, just as much later he took office against his will under Gladstone, the first Nonconformist ever to sit in the English Cabinet. From the first in the Commons he was neither over-awed nor truculent. But he was soon found to be not only a speaker of the highest charm and power, but a man-at-arms in debate. It was said of him that if he had not been a Quaker, he would have been a prize-fighter; and certainly he laid about him with lusty blows. Palmerston was the man at whom he most frequently squared off in those years; and at the time of the Crimean War Bright more than once put the veteran to rout, with such stout declarations, backed up by ample proof, as: "I am not afraid of discussing the war with the noble Lord on his own principles. I understand the Blue Books as well as he, and I say that the war cannot be justified out of these documents."

What Bright did for America and for freedom during our Civil War is part of the history of that struggle. Again he set himself against aristocratic and official England, and again he was right. His constant appeal was that in the future it might not be said by Americans that "in the darkest hour of their country's trials, England, the land of their fathers, looked on with icy coldness and saw unmoved the perils and calamities of their children." When the news came of Lee's surrender, Bright wrote in his journal: "Slavery has measured itself with freedom, and slavery has perished in the struggle. How often have I longed and prayed for this result, and how much have I suffered from anxiety whilst it has been slowly working out, I only know!" And in the same private record he set down this remarkable estimate of Lincoln:

> Heard of the shocking tragedy in Washington—the murder of President Lincoln. For an hour or near it, I felt stunned and ill. . . . I will not write an eulogy on the character of President Lincoln—there will be many to do that now he is dead. I have spoken of him when living. . . . In him I have observed a singular resolution honestly to do his duty, a great courage—shown in the fact that in his speeches and writings, no word of passion or of panic, or of ill-will has ever escaped him—a great gentleness of temper and nobleness of soul, proved by the absence of irritation and menace under circumstances of the most desperate provocation, and a pity and mercifulness to his enemies which seemed drawn as from the very fount of Christian charity and love. His simplicity for a time did much to hide his greatness, but all good men everywhere will mourn for him, and history will place him high among the best and noblest of men.

By this time Bright had conquered his place in the public life of England. On one agitated question after another the country had swung round to him. His power of "sympathetic foresight"—that essential quality of a statesman—had been vindicated on many occasions. He had been right, when the weight of fastidious opinion was against him, on the Corn Laws, right on the extension of the suffrage to the working classes, right on the Crimean War, right on the American Civil War, right on the Irish land question. Long after his death, it appeared that he was right on another question on which his position was ridiculed while he was alive—we mean his proposal, in 1883, to override the veto of the House of Lords, almost exactly in the way provided by the Parliament Act of 1911. With such a record and with such an influence, it was inevitable that Bright should be summoned to a share in the counsels of the Government. The offer had frequently been made to him, but declined. Even Disraeli had pressed Bright to join his Ministry. It was easy for Bright to refuse the man whom he characterized in his diary as the possessor of "intellect and courage and patience and unscrupulousness, employed in the service of a party full of prejudices and selfishness and wanting in brains." But he could not deny Gladstone in 1868, though he felt—and he was right in this—that he was not well fitted for the routine work of office, and shrank from both the cares and the compromises of a Cabinet position. "I abhor the very idea of joining the Administration," he wrote to a friend. "I am in office now, and who will take my place if I relinquish it?" His instinct was, indeed, sure in this matter. He was never happy in office. And some of his deepest chagrins came in his differences with the great Liberal leader under whom he undertook to serve. All this later period of Bright's life Mr. Trevelyan passes over hurriedly. It was the twilight time of the great orator and agitator. Failing health and political worries robbed him of his early spontaneity, and swayed a little the balance of his judgment. It was really a tragic moment for John Bright—the man who had again and again cried from the battlements, "Coercion is no remedy"—when on March 22, 1887, he went into the Government lobby on the motion to give precedence to the "Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill." This break with his past and wrench away from old associates unquestionably sprang from the highest sense of duty in Bright, but that did not diminish for him the disappointment and grief and suffering of the last years of his public life.

We can but repeat our praise of the way in which Mr. Trevelyan has done his work. The necessary political framework of his picture of Bright's life he has kept, as it should be, in skeleton. He explains without overloading. Nor is he an indiscriminate panegyrist. He is frank in dealing with Bright's few mistakes. And an occasional shrewd comment reminds us how the lapsing years often leave even a sane and honest political judgment looking awry. Thus Bright was never tired of speaking of the aristocracy, opposed to the workingmen, as the "tax-eating" class. But Mr. Trevelyan quietly remarks that had Bright lived to our own day, he would have seen "the working class do a little 'tax-eating' on its own behalf, through state-provided education, old-age pensions, and other schemes." But the total impression of Bright which the volume makes is that of the finest strength and most complete courage blent with a tenderness of heart like a woman's. The letter which he wrote at the time of the death of his little son is a precious thing in itself and reveals the unaffectedness of his compassionate soul. When Cobden died, he essayed to speak in the Commons, but could not. He uttered a few broken sentences, then burst into tears and sat down overcome. And John Morley has said that "the most impressive and pure piece of religion" that he ever witnessed was John Bright reading a chapter of the Bible to his maid-servants, shortly after the death of his wife, "in his beautiful and feeling voice, followed by the Quaker silence."

CURRENT FICTION.

The Turning of Griggsby. By Irving Bacheller. New York: Harper & Bros.

"The Turning of Griggsby" is a humorous sketch on the plane of Mr. Bacheller's "Keeping Up with Lizzie," a fact which the author recognizes in his subtitle, "A story of keeping up with Daniel Webster." Griggsby is merely one of the scores of American villages in which, twenty years after his death, Webster still set the fashion:

> All through the North, from the Atlantic to the far frontiers beyond the Mississippi, men in beaver hats and tall collars were playing Daniel Webster. They dressed as he had dressed, and had his grand manners, while their diaphragms were often sorely strained in an effort to deliver his deep resounding tones. The peace of most farms and villages was disturbed by Websterian shouts of ready-made patriotism from the lips of sires and sons.

Especially in his capacity of "sublime toper" he served as a comfortable model for pretentious feebleness. Griggsby is a town of drunken speechmaking. Its leading lights are equally devoted to rum and oratory. The younger generation is successfully following the example of the leading lights. "Flowers of rhetoric grow on it as naturally as moss on a log," and it has mastered the principle that a tumbler of rum is an essential preliminary to all effort. Mr. Bacheller, chiefly by way of a citizen of Griggsby, Mr. Daniel Webster Smead, enlarges upon this theme in a very amusing way. The upshot is that by the joint efforts of Mr. Smead and a determined schoolgirl who gets hold of the village paper, Griggsby is awakened to the absurdity of its position, the leading lights are brought to see the error of their ways, and the days of the beaver hat and the Websterian period are numbered.

The Adventures of Dr. Whitty. By G. A. Birmingham. New York: George H. Doran Co.

Dr. Whitty, of Ballintra, is another of those joyous and irresponsible young gentlemen who appear to hold most positions of responsibility in Mr. Birmingham's Connacht. Ballintra is a very small coast village, and a good deal of ingenuity is needed to extract as much amusement from its modest resources as Dr. Whitty contrives to do. His quality of physician and surgeon to the whole village yields certain opportunities, but it is clear that he does not depend on them. The smallest incident out of the common is capable of serving as the fulcrum by which he moves his world. If Michael Geraghty has a pair of anchors to dispose of, the Government must be caused to supply Ballintra channel with two buoys to attach them to, and the whole community must be cajoled into working towards that end. If the widow Canavan is evicted from her farm, Dr. Whitty may be trusted to nurse the simple incident into a political broil. Visitors to Ballintra are his natural prey, and the local magnates, the priest, the rector, the squire, and the chief publican, are clay in his hands. In short, he is fully worthy of the kindred heroes of "Spanish Gold" and "The Search Party." There is a suggestion of the casual whimsy of the late Frank Stockton in Mr. Birmingham's humor which must endear him to American readers of the elder generation.

Parrot & Co. By Harold MacGrath. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co.

The heroine, wandering oversea in the hope that time and absence will clarify her intention regarding a highly suitable but not quite satisfactory engagement, is discovered voyaging down the Irrawaddy River from Mandalay to Rangoon. Now, as we all know, thanks to Mr. Kipling, in that part of the world the difficulty of telling a good man from a bad man is enormously aggravated. Imagine, then, the perplexity of the maiden who shall undertake, in these problematical climes, to decide upon the relative merits of her absent fiancé and the stranger who, but for khaki, sunburn, and an accompanying parrakeet, appears his exact counterpart. From Prome to Rangoon, from Rangoon to Singapore, the mystery of the likeness deepens, while Elsa's preference for present company grows, and the weather-beaten adventurer ever more insistently denounces himself as an undesirable acquaintance, barred from polite society by a criminal past. That Elsa is in time to declare for the parrot-fancier, and that in the end her judgment is to be abundantly vindicated, we are constantly encouraged to expect, but the exact nature of the dénouement and the circuitous path by which it is to be reached are discreetly guarded from too ready surmise. It is in prolonging the revelation that the author displays his skill—and, we are tempted to add, his only skill. Popular fiction contains whole hosts of American heroines whose wealth, beauty, and virgin scorn of conventions render them alike indistinguishable from Elsa and from one another, whole regiments of muscular Don Quixotes endowed with formidable business ability, among whom Warrington could never be identified without his parrot.

Ever After. By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

As the title indicates, this is a story of domestic life—but not of a course of smooth felicity, even after marriage. Its originality lies in the temperamental peculiarities of the pair, for the theme is the old one of a poor young man, full of lavish bonhomie, allying himself to a rich girl who has inherited the precise economical traits of her grandparents. At first Dana's and Lucy's common tastes for art keep their affection strong; but in spite of his insouciant acceptance of life upon her funds, the money question finally becomes as dominant a spectre as in any of Balzac's stories. In the midst of music and painting, irritation grows to an open breach. "When you spend a dollar, you should remember it is all twenty dollars can earn in a year," is her reproach; and "It is right to save, it is often wrong to spend, but to love to save, to hate to spend—that is evil," is his. It is clear to the reader, charmed into liking both young people, that both are somewhat wrong; and the solution, a separation which teaches the husband in New York the value of money, and the wife in Boston its valuelessness, is convincing of the final reconciliation. Indeed, the unhappiness of the book is glossed over with a fine feminine optimism and a brave disregard of psychological tension; while the happy passages stand out as frequent milestones. For a novel of its length, the story is curiously without minor characters. But perhaps this is the reason the two main personages, moving through scenes of artist life none too realistic, have still an air of reality.

CHURCH-GOING.

The Country Church: The Decline of Its Influence and the Remedy. By Charles Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25 net.

Some twenty years ago Gov. Rollins, of New Hampshire, issued a proclamation on "The Increasing Paganism of New England," in which he asserted that the rural churches in New Hampshire and the other Puritan commonwealths were losing steadily in members and attendants, and that there was a consequent decay of morals. His opinions were combated vigorously, while others supported them, but no one seemed to have in hand facts to settle the question. Investigation has now been made with such thoroughness and care as to establish entire confidence in the results: since the Governor of New Hampshire issued his alarming proclamation church attendance has diminished one-third in representative regions of New England and New York. There is abundant indication that the movement had an earlier origin, and that comparison with a period fifty or sixty years ago would show a much more serious decline.

Four years ago the Rev. Charles Otis Gill, a graduate of Yale College and Union Theological Seminary, and a man of experience as a country minister, began an exhaustive study of church conditions in Windsor County, Vermont. He collected facts for a comparison between the situation in 1888 and 1908 as to membership, church attendance, contributions, ministers' salaries, the education of ministers, the effect of too many churches for the population, the difference between churches in the village and in the smaller communities, and the changes in population and in agricultural conditions. Every town and every hamlet in the county was thoroughly investigated. From the tax lists in each township—the poll tax in Vermont secures the enrolment of every voter—a complete list of families was obtained, and the church-going habits of every resident were ascertained from a number of trustworthy witnesses. Any one acquainted with the character of the people of rural New England will not doubt the possibility of reaching sound results by such methods. There can be no question as to Mr. Gill's thoroughness or impartiality, and fortunately he has been able to check his results by records of attendance kept in a number of congregations. These confirm the accuracy of his figures to a surprising degree, and show that, if he has erred in either direction, he has understated the seriousness of the decline. Similar methods were employed in a study of Tompkins County, New York, of which Ithaca is the only large community, and the results are even more depressing than those obtained in Vermont.

The most impressive fact derived from this painstaking investigation is that church attendance has fallen off in the last twenty years 31 per cent. in Windsor County, Vermont, and 33 per cent. in Tompkins County, New York. Town after town is listed in which the attendance has diminished 40, 50, and even as high as 76 per cent. The smaller losses for the counties as a whole are reached only by inclusion of the larger villages, in which church life has been better sustained than in the agricultural communities. In the strictly rural districts the loss in attendance in Tompkins County was 40 per cent., and in Windsor County 53 per cent.

There has, to be sure, been a decrease of population in these regions, the number of inhabitants in the farming portions of Windsor County having diminished steadily since 1850. This in itself is a serious fact, but the loss in church efficiency is more serious, since, when allowance is made for the decline in population, the loss in church attendance in Windsor County was more than 29 per cent., and in Tompkins County more than 19 per cent.

Financially the country churches make a somewhat better showing. In the Vermont county expenditures in the Protestant churches increased 23 per cent. in the twenty years, and in the New York county they advanced 7 per cent. But in purchasing power this is turned into a loss of 2 per cent. and 9 per cent., respectively. The salaries of 34 out of 53 ministers in Windsor County, when measured in purchasing power, were less in 1908 than in 1888, and in Tompkins County 21 out of 29 ministers suffered a similar loss of income. Above one-fourth of the ministers in Windsor County received $600 or less in 1908, and the average for the entire county was $814. Other facts are cited which justify the statement that "the average minister in Windsor and Tompkins Counties does not receive a living salary: much less does he receive a working salary."

One who regards the old-time power of the New England clergy and the traditions of intellectual seriousness in the religious life of its country towns will be especially grieved by the presentation of the educational equipment of the ministers. In Vermont only one pastor out of four had received both a college and seminary training, and fully one-third were deficient according to any reasonable standard of ministerial preparation. Windsor County is just across the Connecticut River from Dartmouth College. Vermont itself has three colleges, while New England is overcrowded with theological seminaries, the most lavishly endowed educational institutions in America. Something is evidently wrong with these institutions, when their influence has extended only to one clergyman out of four in their immediate vicinity.

In only one respect are the data collected by Mr. Gill at all encouraging, and that is in the matter of church membership. Church membership in the period under review increased in Windsor County 4 per cent. and in Tompkins County 2 per cent. This fact, however, when compared with the statistics as to attendance and expenditures, is shown to be misleading. The conclusion is not that the church is maintaining its hold on the community, but that the responsibilities of church membership are sitting more lightly upon communicants, and that church rolls are usually grossly padded. Mr. Gill found one church in Vermont with an average attendance of 75, an enrolled membership of 271, of whom only 186 were found to be actually living. His research has revealed a striking diminution of attendance in proportion to membership, the number of worshippers formerly exceeding the membership, but in recent years being much less. This fact suggests that conclusions of undue optimism may have been drawn from the figures frequently published as to the millions of church members of the various Protestant denominations of the United States and the growth of communicants from year to year.

It is unnecessary to examine at length the remedies suggested in this volume for the situation which it presents with such depressing abundance of detail. The chief significance of the volume is its presentation of facts in a field where opinion had varied according to temperament. That the facts as stated are correct, no one who knows the rural East can doubt. That they condemn the prevalent methods in "Home Missions," by which parsimonious subsidies are doled out to decadent congregations, which are allowed to continue the methods through which they are languishing, is equally clear. Messrs. Gill and Pinchot quote with approval the programme of the Inter-Church Federation of Vermont, which pledges the churches of the State to work for the uplift of the smaller towns and to subordinate their own promotion to that end. Just how these organizations can do this with their present leadership is not clear, but that the problem is one of prime importance to the religious and moral life of the nation is not open to question, and the facts which must lead to facing it with resolution are presented in this volume with a definiteness and completeness which no one has achieved hitherto.

A Wayfarer in China. Impressions of a Trip Across China and Mongolia. By Elizabeth Kendall. With illustrations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.50 net.

One of Congreve's characters in "The Old Bachelor" urges another to "dress up your face in innocence and smiles and dissemble the very want of dissimulation." Without much further contrivance than an unconscious following of the Old Bachelor's advice Miss Kendall, who is a professor in Wellesley College, appears to have accomplished a really extraordinary feat of travel in Eastern Asia and emerged buoyant and unharmed. She had acquired in other journeys the sense and serenity necessary for such adventures, though she attributes the success of her solitary enterprise to friends, both foreign and native. Her route carried her from Tongking across the provinces of Yunnan and Szechuan to regain the railway at Hankow, and subsequently along the old caravan road from Kalgan to Urga. Two such trips in a single summer indicate considerable fortitude, but no weariness of travel seems to have lessened her relish for unbeaten trails or her interest in the people along the way. Her immunity from harm was due, she thinks, partly to the fact that she was a woman and partly to her ignorance of the language; it is more likely that it was the result of her own urbanity and discretion, for the Chinese are both appreciative and reasonable, and in a country which enjoys no adequate police protection the people realize that security of life and property depends upon moral restraint. Moreover, they enjoy novelties, and now that the old antipathy of the literati has disappeared, there is no reason for apprehension that the common folk will regard a wandering foreigner—particularly a woman—otherwise than as a preternatural curiosity, and so exempt from attack.

Miss Kendall is not presumptuous enough to "have any impressions at all of anything so huge, so old, so varied, so complicated as China and its people," but her few concluding observations are marked by unusual penetration. The Chinese she holds to be "more like ourselves, or may be our ancestors, more like us at one stage or another, than any other people of the East that I had known." Her point of view is worth noting. Though making no pretension to any intimate knowledge, she has some advantage over residents in the empire in that she also knows the other original civilizations of Asia, the Semitic races, Turkey, and India, and is able to advance opinions of her own that are interesting and suggestive. Elsewhere the type has been moulded by dominant religious or military ideas; China and the Anglo-Saxon lands, though influenced by religion and arms, are chiefly devoted to material advantage:

> The Chinese, to be sure, is one of the most superstitious of men, but there is little more religion in his fears than is implied in the practices of many a Westerner. He never builds a straight entrance into his house, for he believes that evil spirits cannot move in a curved line; and across the world people who call him names because of this refuse to sit thirteen at a table. The malign influences appeased, the average Chinese goes his way untroubled or unconsoled by any thought concerning that which is to come, or at most he strives to aequire merit, not for a week only, but for a whole year, by some pilgrimage much more strenuous than church-going. Like the Western man of to-day, he also is impatient of priestly control, and is apt to say slighting things of his spiritual leaders. His mind is set not on things above, but on the bread-and-butter, or, more precisely, the rice, aspect of life. The scale of rewards is different, but the mainspring of daily living is much the same in the Far East and the Far West.

From her brief experience in the heart of China the author returns with an impression of tremendous force that she confesses to have been rather overwhelming. If their racial capacity for sobriety and organization is brought into play she believes that their new experiment in government will be successful. It is the problem rather than the past of China which concerns her most. The record of her journey chiefly reflects her human interest in the life of the common people about her. There is little in the volume that adds to our knowledge of the notable places in these remote regions or supplements the accounts of previous travellers. She made the ascent of the famous Omei, China's noblest sacred mountain, but one fails, somehow, to respond to her restrained description of that stupendous precipice. She has, evidently, a keener interest in the coolies that carried her and in a "Friends' Institute" which has been shrewdly organized by a missionary at Chung-king, where Chinese and foreign gentlemen meet socially, and occasional lectures present "the best of Christian civilization to a class often repelled by missionary propaganda." It is a reproach to the missions that clubs of this sort have not been introduced elsewhere in China. Miss Kendall's retreat from China was made across Mongolia on the old camel road, which, we are told, is still used as a post-route by the Russians, who find it convenient for purposes of "peaceful penetration" to have a mail forwarded once a month on a road of their own. The Mongol of to-day seems to be curiously similar to the degenerate Indian of our Western plains, but there is a rough good-nature about him that renders him more liked by Europeans than most Asiatics. Few inaccuracies mar the pages of this readable narrative, but for purposes of a possible future edition of the book it ought to be noted that Kublai was not the brother of Genghiz Khan, and that the Wusung railway from Shanghai was removed in 1876, not 1870.

A Turkish Woman's European Impressions. By Zeyneb Hanoum. Edited with an Introduction by Grace Ellison. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.75 net.

In this volume Miss Ellison gives us a series of letters received by her from one of the heroines of Loti's "Les Désenchantées" during her six years' residence in Western Europe. Read in sequence, the letters present a very human and a very pathetic story. In the beginning we learn of the disenchantment with her lot of the modern Turkish lady, highly educated, speaking three or four languages, and imbued through the literature of Western Europe, and often as a child through the teaching of a French or English governess, with admiration for the ideals and modes of life of the West. We are made to realize vividly the gloom, and often the horror, of her existence after she has assumed the veil and is virtually a prisoner for the rest of her life. The cruelty of her fate lies in the fact that the ideas and ideals of the West have been superimposed on the traditions and life of the East.

The two sisters, the impressions of one of whom are recorded in these letters, took their fate in their hands and escaped from their captivity; but still their story is one of disenchantment. The earlier pages are full of hope and expectation of what the promised land of the West holds in store for them; but as they proceed disappointment is piled on disappointment, disillusion added to disillusion, till we take leave of Zeyneb on board an eastern-bound steamer returning voluntarily to Turkey and the veil.

In the process of Zeyneb's disillusioning we discover anew the gulf that is fixed between the East and the West, and we are reminded that the good and the beautiful are not absolute terms. If some of her comments on our Western civilization are naïve and attributable to lack of understanding or of sympathy, others are exceedingly shrewd. All are interesting and reveal, both in matter and manner, a woman of exceptional intelligence and powers of observation. She flays the sports, the women's clubs, and the hospitality of the West, and shrewdly indicates her opinion of its society when she explains that in Turkish there is no word for "snobbery." On the other hand, she is enthusiastic about the London policeman, hansom cabs, the Empress Eugénie, and Ellen

Terry. Englishmen, we are told, remind her of Turks, an appreciation that is intended on the whole to be complimentary; English women "are pretty, but are deficient in charm." They are also "pig-headed, undiplomatic, brutally sincere," but good and faithful friends. All in all, Zeyneb admires most her own countrywomen, because, "in spite of the slavery of their existence, they have managed to keep their minds free from prejudice."

Zeyneb is in full sympathy with the Young Turks, and there is much illuminating comment on the terrors of the Hamidian régime. The letters close before the outbreak of the recent war, and one wishes for a series, written from her own harassed land since her return, that shall cover that period. It is to be feared that the elimination of Turkey as a European Power must add to the perplexities of the women of the harem in their struggle to reconcile the education of the West with the traditions of the East.

Notes

Mr. Frank H. Spearman's new novel, "Merrilie Dawes," announced by Scribners has a background of big financial battles in New York.

A. C. McClurg & Co. have in preparation "The Story of California," by Henry K. Norton.

Doubleday, Page & Co. have in hand two new novels, one by Mrs. Mary Austin, the other by Bouck White.

Announcement is made by Henry Holt & Co. of a new novel by Beulah Marie Dix, and of "Schwarzwaldleut," a collection of five Black Forest stories—three by Heinrich Hansjakob and one each by Hermine Villinger and Auguste Supper—edited with vocabulary by Prof. E. C. Roedder.

Forthcoming novels of the Century Co. include "The Tinder Box," by Maria Thompson Daviess, and "The Truth About Camilla," by Gertrude Hall.

"The Social Rubaiyat of a Bud" (Paul Elder & Co.) is the title of a forthcoming satire by Mrs. Ambrose Madison Willis.

The Stratford Publishing Co., of Boston, announces for publication in the autumn "The Passing Singer and Other Poems," by Samuel Henry Marcus.

The following are new works of fiction promised by Houghton Mifflin Co. for autumn: "The Story of Waitstill Baxter," by Kate Douglas Wiggin; "Otherwise Phyllis," by Meredith Nicholson; "Hagar," by Mary Johnston; "O Pioneers!" by Willa Sibert Cather; "Valentine," by Grant Richards; "The Confessions of a Débutante," anonymous; "Happy-Go-Lucky," by Ian Hay; "The Hand of Petrarch and Other Stories," by T. Russell Sullivan; "Simpson," by Elinor Mordaunt (Mrs. E. M. Wiehe); "The Spare Room," by Mrs. Romilly Fedden, and "November Joe," a detective story by Hesketh Prichard.

That neglect of Apollonius Rhodius by English Classicists which Mr. Mahaffy is wont to deplore is deprived of its last excuse by his colleague Mr. G. W. Mooney's well-executed and well-printed edition of the "Argonautica" (Longmans). The information which the strenuous student of the Teubner or Oxford text had to gather from every corner of his library, he now, without stirring from his easy chair, finds conveniently assembled in Mr. Mooney's introduction, footnotes, and appendices. There are at least seven English translations of the "Argonautica." But the only English annotated edition is, if we may say so, the Latin one of Shaw, dating from the eighteenth century. Wellauer's edition of 1828, containing the scholia, is indispensable to scholars, but not very inviting or helpful to students. Mr. Mooney has compiled and digested the nineteen more or less critical text editions enumerated in his preface, and a large number of dissertations on special points of style and metre. He has interpreted the difficult passages, transcribed the parallels from Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, Virgil, and Valerius Flaccus, and in general furnished all the aids that the ordinary classical student will need for the intelligent enjoyment of the poem. Those who ask for more will note that he has missed a few points in the game of text criticism by overlooking the investigations and discoveries of the past ten years, in his reliance on the 1901 Oxford text of Seaton; that his study of Hellenistic language and literary art is virtually confined to a comparison of the epic usage of Apollonius with that of Homer and Virgil; and that his judicious, but not notably illuminating or penetrating, literary appreciations are derived chiefly from Mahaffy, Couat, and Sainte-Beuve. From his own reading he contributes a few Miltonic parallels which are of interest, but hardly prove that Milton was thinking of Apollonius rather than of Homer, Hesiod, and Virgil. At iii, 160, he records Preston's suggestion that Milton took from Apollonius's καταιβάτις κέλευθος "his idea of the sunbeam bearing the angel Uriel slope-downward to the earth." But Milton's Uriel returns "slope-downward to the sun," and the beam that bears him to the earth is plainly suggested by the shooting-star in Theocritus xii, 52.

We can best characterize Mr. Mooney's work as a whole, in the words which Quintilian uses of his author, "non tamen contemnendum reddidit opus æquali quadam mediocritate," giving him the benefit of the interpretation that mediocritas means "neither rising on the one hand to the genus grande, nor on the other hand descending to the genus subtile." The chief service of the book will be to increase the number of English-reading students and teachers of Homer and Virgil who will attempt the "Argonautica" in the Greek. They may well still be few. For in Way's admirable translation Apollonius is little inferior to William Morris, and he is not much better in the original.

"The Notebooks of Samuel Butler" (Mitchell Kennerley) is an admirable compendium of the peculiar ironical wit of the author of "Erewhon." There is abundant amusement in the volume, and much profit for one who can keep apart the felt and the merely verbal aphorisms. H. Festing Jones, the author's old friend, has considerably rearranged and combined the journal entries. He promises to deposit in the British Museum a copy revealing his editorial procedures. Such matters, however, hardly concern the average reader, who will not challenge the compilation of a book so full of wisdom and diversion. In quoting a handful of the maxims it should be said that they often lose something in being torn from the neighboring and supporting epigrams. On life in general: "Life is the art of drawing sufficient conclusions from insufficient premises." The saying links Paley with Bergson. "A sense of humor keen enough to show a man his own absurdities, as well as those of other people, will keep him from the commission of all sins, or nearly all, save those that are worth committing." On the right of well-bred people to live by tradition and instinct Butler always insisted. "Life is like music, it must be composed by ear, feeling, and instinct, not by rule. Nevertheless, one had better know the rules, for they sometimes guide in doubtful eases—though not often." We cannot follow the Notebooks through the categories of letters, painting, music, travel, philosophy—under each there is abundant wit and wisdom. Let us take leave of Butler with a maxim which illustrates the peculiar concreteness of his sententious vein: "Attempts at classification are like nailing battens of our own flesh and blood upon ourselves as an inclined plane that we may walk up ourselves more easily; and yet it answers very sufficiently."

Prof. Charles A. Beard modestly speaks of his "Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States" (Macmillan) as a fragment, and such it is, but as a pioneer work in a new field it has first-rate importance. Leaving at one side, save for a few significant allusions, the time-honored political view of the origin and nature of the Constitution, Professor Beard has sought to indicate, largely from a study of the records of the conventions of 1787-88, and of unpublished documents in the Treasury Department, the extent and character of economic influence in the formulation and acceptance of the instrument. To this end, he not only studies the economic situation and the content of public discussion in the States under the Articles of Confederation, but also analyzes the personnel of the Convention of 1787, the business, professional, and social relations of its members, their ownership of certificates of the public debt, and their financial interest in the establishment of a more efficient national government. His main conclusions are that the personal property interests of money, public securities, manufactures, trade, and shipping, which had suffered under the Articles, were those which chiefly originated and carried through the movement for the Constitution; that the masses without property, under the prevailing conditions of suffrage, were not represented in the Federal Convention, and that the members of the Convention, with a few exceptions, were "immediately, directly, and personally interested in, and derived economic advantages from, the establishment of the new system." The protection of property as "anterior to government and morally beyond the reach of popular majorities," and consequently entitled to special protection at the hands of the Federal Government, was the underlying motive of the Constitution. No popular vote was had on the question of calling the Convention; the vote on ratification probably did not exceed one-sixth of the total adult male population; while in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and South Carolina it is doubtful if a majority of those who voted for members of the State ratifying conventions were in favor of ratification. The bearing of Professor Beard's conclusions on the juristic theory that the Constitution was the work of "the people," is obvious. We note one important misprint: "Portland," at page 255, should clearly be Portsmouth.

The primary aim of Oliver W. Norton's "Attack and Defence of Little Round Top" (Neale) appears to be to credit Gen. Strong Vincent with the honor of perceiving the strategic importance of Little Round Top, and of occupying it with his brigade though without specific orders to do so. Some hitherto unpublished letters of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren, printed by Mr. Norton, make it clear that Warren, to whom the credit for the movement has been given, neither detached Vincent's brigade nor led it to the hill, but himself acknowledged the importance of Vincent's independent action. Mr. Norton's own account of this part of the battle fills only about twenty pages, the bulk of the volume being made up of extracts from other well-known narratives, with criticisms of their inaccuracies, and of the texts of official reports.

A weighty volume and a full one is "Mexico: The Land of Unrest" (Lippincott), by Henry Baerlein, the London Times correspondent. Chiefly an account of what produced the outbreak in 1910, together with the story of the revolutions that followed, it contains a mass of detail in regard to the present tangled state of affairs in Mexico. At the same time, it develops clearly the main outlines of Mexican history since the deposition of Diaz. The writer prides himself chiefly on showing that, in Diaz's increasing age, Mexico was not so blessedly without a history as she was thought to be and that below apparent order a smouldering discontent lay not five fathoms out of sight. There is a full account in the later pages of the interregnum after Diaz, of Madero's Administration and death, the death of Reyes, and the probable future of Huerta's Administration; while more than one hundred pages are given to the national background of the troublous times, with such themes as Poetry in Mexico and The Gamblers of Mexico.

The Mexicans, he asserts, in spite of the danger of generalizing about a race so mixed, are childish; and this childishness he finds in a mixture of engaging and horrible qualities:

> Have you ever seen a boy tear up a living beetle, and a moment later say that yonder ripples of the olive tree are like his mother's hand when he is lying in his bed? So are the Mexicans. I fancy that a number of the miscreants who massacred 300 Chinamen in Torreon not long since, cutting some into small pieces, beheading some, pulling others apart by horses, are on other days delightful citizens.

His characterization of Felix Diaz and Gen. Huerta, now at the helm, is not flattering: "They are merely Mexican savages in blue uniforms."

Even erudite Dantists will find novelties in Paolo Bellezza's "Curiosità Dantesche" (Milan: Ulrico Hoepli), a collection of more than a score of literary causeries on bizarre or unexpected topics. One chapter, for instance, is devoted to some of the crazy interpretations of commentators; another traces the varieties of "Dantophily, Dantology, and Dantomania"; a third discusses the theories of Dante's mountain climbing. One of the most fruitful, and the longest, follows his influence on the Risorgimento. The author has even assembled a dozen or more isms, the devotees of which claim Dante as their founder; spiritualists on one side, pacifists and feminists on the other, think they have his support. Professor Bellezza does not neglect parodies, nor such evidences of Dante's popularity as dialect versions of his famous passages furnish. Innumerable anecdotes, opinions, and citations attest the breadth of the author's reading and add greatly to the entertainment he provides. His lists of articles and authors referred to will please bibliographers. This book should be in every library which has a shelf for Dante. It will delight any reader, not necessarily a professed Dantist, who does not wholly frown on literary gossip and the showing up of the aberrations of the expositors.

Those who feel alarm at the atrocities which are reported to be committed in the name of futurist cookery—veal and violets and the like—may find some comfort in the fact that our ancestors in the Middle Ages encountered even more portentous combinations and still lived to be our ancestors. A fifteenth-century cookery book directs the cook to take a capon, scald it, clean it, and "smyte" it in two at the waist, and to do the same to a pig, and then to sew the fore part of the capon to the hind part of the pig, and the fore part of the pig to the hind part of the capon, and to stuff them like a pig. This delectable dish was known as "cockatrice," a name appropriate to its form and even more appropriate, one might think, to its ability to slay at sight. The above recipe is taken from A. Abram's "English Life and Manners in the Later Middle Ages" (Dutton), in which the motley pageant of English life from Edward III to Henry VII passes under review. The modern reader, if he sees the period as chiefly Canterbury pilgrimages and tournaments, will remark the intense spirit of commercialism which in the fifteenth century was partly responsible for a large falling off in attendance at the universities, because they did not teach things which could be immediately useful in business. Henry VII laughed at tournaments. In a period of fierce protectionism, it is interesting to note, books were imported duty free. But we must remember that mediæval commercial notions were extremely naïve. It was thought unjust to drive a hard bargain or take advantage of another's ignorance or misfortune, to corner the market or exact interest, and much fruitless effort was expended on the task of maintaining, not a minimum, but a maximum wage. Besides cookery and commerce, there are chapters on life among the aristocracy; town, monastic, and family life; houses, dress, education, amusements, travelling, and so on. Without attempting to exhaust these subjects, the book offers many interesting facts, some good illustrations, and an appendix of authorities which documents the statements of the text.

The fame of the Rhone country has been revived and enhanced by Frederic Mistral, who, as a young lawyer, "threw his gown to the winds and gave himself up to the contemplation of what he loved—the splendor of his native Provence," and who has devoted his life to the working of a miracle in recreating a moribund language. Cecil Headlam is one of many writers who have been caught by the fascination of this land of romance, and in "Provence and Languedoc" (Doran) we have a compilation, half history, half guidebook, which is admirably calculated to illuminate the travels of the intelligent tourist. An early chapter gives a good general survey of the story of Provence and later chapters deal with particular phases in its history. Settled in turn by Phœnicians, Phocæans, and Romans, and having numerous relics of each occupation, as well as of their Iberian and Celtic predecessors, the land of the troubadours, and, as such, "the cradle of modern literature," Provence has a history commensurate with that of civilization in Europe; and Mr. Headlam has done well to compress an intelligent précis of a vast subject into the limits which he has set himself. The book is well illustrated and indexed, and an interesting appendix gives the music of some Provençal airs and dances.

In "Burma under British Rule" (Scribner), Joseph Dautremer, of the School of Oriental Languages, Paris, formerly Consul for France in Rangoon, gives an encyclopædic survey of the country, including routes, railways, excursions, products, trade, and a review of the chief industries, together with introductory chapters on historical and ethnographical points, all very concisely and clearly stated. M. Dautremer does not hesitate to criticise the methods of France in colonization as compared with those found in Burma, but, on the other hand, he does not fail to note the obvious weaknesses in British administration. Sir George Scott, who has translated M. Dautremer's work and furnished it with a vigorous introduction, helps one to read between the lines of the courteous Frenchman's criticism: "There is a sort of polite sarcasm in the way in which he chronicles roads which start with the idea of going somewhere and end nowhere in particular." The chief difference, however, between French and British is that formulated by M. Dautremer's words: "The Lieutenant-Governor of Burma does not need to trouble himself about Members of Parliament in London. The Governor-General of Indo-China always has, whether he likes it or not, one ear turned in the direction of the Palais-Bourbon. That is the evil point of the French method." The many hints on trading possibilities ought to make this work useful not only to the French, but to others desirous of enlarging business in the Orient. To others many an occasional observation will be of interest, such as those on the origin of "bee-holes" in teak; the poisonous nature of beans in Burma (Pythagoras got wisdom from the East!); the conditions of a society which permits a man to marry at the same time a mother and a daughter, etc. There are a few good photographs.

"Modern Golf" (Outing Publishing Company), is too ambitious a title for the little book which has been made out of articles by Mr. Harold H. Hilton, and seems to bring him into a competition with Mr. Vaile's comprehensive book, similarly named, in a way from which Hilton would naturally shrink. The pages are pleasant enough in their way, and here and there instructive, the best being those in which Mr. Hilton describes the ideal temperament and physique of the golfer. Several of the bodily qualifications for the game he declares that he himself is without!

Anthony F. Wilding, the New Zealander, who recently defended his title of lawn tennis champion of England against Maurice E. McLoughlin, gives some practical advice to players in "On the Court and Off" (Doubleday, Page). Mr. Wilding contends that the best form of practice is stroke play, in which a stone wall may be used if no kindred spirit is available; and he discusses strokes in the making, pointing out the right and wrong methods of hitting the ball. All the tactics, training, and experience in the world, he says, are of no avail to a player whose strokes are inaccurate, and he counsels the man who would improve his game to concentrate his efforts on its weak spots. Mr. Wilding is an advocate of training off the court, and declares that a safe rule in match play "is to start off hard and go hard all the time." Regarding tactics, he says that the two main principles are to cover your own weakness and mercilessly attack your opponent's most vulnerable points. Incidentally, he remarks that McLoughlin, in one of his inspired moments, can pierce the strongest defence ever constructed. Mrs. Larcombe contributes advice to women players, and André Gobert writes about the game in France. Mr. Wilding does not neglect to say a word about another of his hobbies—motorcycling.

Science

Frederick Irving Anderson, in his interestingly written "Farmer of Tomorrow" (Macmillan), puts his finger on two of the great problems of the future of farming in the United States. The first of these, the increasing of our farming area, is in the course of solution. Our free public lands being now virtually gone, there remains to reclaim those which so far are naturally unfit. We have more than three hundred million acres under actual cultivation, with nearly half as much of pasture land, on existing farms, to be improved. Dry farming has apparently reached its limit (will other authorities agree to this?), but there are a hundred million acres to be cleared, thirty-five million to be added by irrigation, and seventy-seven million to be drained. The total number of acres capable of profitable cultivation Mr. Anderson reckons at 672,000,000. On these acres must be supported our future population, which will in time equal the density of that of Europe. Yet to sustain our present sparse population on our present acreage is already somewhat of a problem, as indicated by our notably diminished exports of foodstuffs.

Our future difficulties must be met by better farming, the crucial problem of which occupies the second part of Mr. Anderson's book. We are learning what our farms are best fitted for, and the trend towards specialization is very hopeful. But the great question is one of plant food, and here we find Mr. Anderson distinguishing himself among recent writers by his advocacy, remarkably temperate and uncontroversial, of the theory which the United States Bureau of Soils stands almost alone in supporting. "The soil," says Milton Whitney, chief of the Bureau, "is the one indestructible, immutable asset that the nation possesses. It is the one resource that cannot be exhausted, that cannot be used up. It may be impaired by abuse, but never destroyed." The statement applies to mineral constituents alone, and the question is virtually whether we need to apply chemical fertilizers, at least in accordance with present practices. Against the Bureau stand most of the scientists of the world, American as well as foreign. The theory of Liebig, according to which our plant-food supply, continually exhausted, must be continually replaced by chemical fertilizers, is intrenched in all our schools and colleges; but against it the Bureau of Soils brings puzzling facts. Here can be mentioned but a few of them. Certain tests tend to show that, at least as far as potash and phosphoric acid are concerned, however much of these elements may be added to the soil, the plants themselves are able to utilize but a certain amount. "Nature herself," says Mr. Anderson, "has provided a definite ratio at which she liberates the mineral food of plants, and this ratio is fixed." Tested differently, in the case of potash but a certain fixed amount can be dissolved at one time out of the soil, although many times that amount may have just been added. The Bureau of Soils contends that the surface of the soil grains, holding the soil water by tremendous capillary pressure, will yield only a definite amount of plant food at a time; that the supply of this mineral food is continually furnished by the breaking up of chemicals already present in abundance; and that it is therefore not necessary to supply chemical fertilizers. To avoid the accumulation of plant poisons by proper rotations, and meanwhile to add organic matter in the form of either green or stable manure, is the proper procedure.

The Bureau points to the example of China, where for four thousand years the soil has maintained its fertility through no other treatment than this. Nearer at home is the case of the famous Agdell field at Rothamstead, England, where for more than fifty years wheat has been grown in a four-year rotation on fertilized and unfertilized plats, the latter growing the more wheat. "We cannot," say the English experts, "accept the explanation of the Americans, yet we have no theory to offer in exchange." American experts, notably Dr. Cyril G. Hopkins, of Illinois (whose Circular 155, University of Illinois Agricultural Experiment Station, controverts some of Mr. Anderson's figures), are positive in denying the conclusions of the Bureau of Soils, and maintain the theory of Liebig. Here is the germ of a great controversy, affecting every inhabitant of future America, but not to be settled for another generation.

Meanwhile other and minor problems of the future of our farms are discussed by G. Harold Powell in his "Coöperation in Agriculture" (Macmillan's Rural Science series). To most of the public such co-operation means chiefly the self-defence of milk farmers or fruit-growers, protecting themselves against the rapacity of the middleman. Such purely commercial enterprises form, of course, a large proportion of agricultural coöperative societies; but more interesting and promising for the development of our farming are associations for cow-testing, cattle-breeding, or seed improvement. Even the simple and almost accidental expedient of gathering and marketing a local egg supply through a co-operative creamery has led to the improvement of breeds, the prevention of much loss, and a fine uniform product; but the deliberate agreement among neighbors to apply coöperative methods to the improvement of stock or seed means much more. Of great importance are associations for rural credit, which in Europe have relieved farmers of a heavy incubus, and which are slowly entering into our own country districts. The book distinguishes between associations for profit and for mutual benefit; it is valuable in its warnings as to the application and changing of existing laws, as to the methods of operation, and as to the spirit of membership, so vital to success. Mr. Powell quotes numerous forms of association and rules of operation, among the dry phrases of which the reader is cheered to find the summarized purpose of the Farmers' Union (Southern): "To garner the tears of the distressed, the blood of martyrs, the laugh of innocent childhood, the sweat of honest labor, and the virtue of a happy home as the brightest jewels known." There is appended to the book an excellent bibliography.

An entirely different aspect of farming is treated in "Modern Farm Buildings" (McBride, Nast), by Alfred Hopkins, a New York architect with much experience in designing for the rich. As an expression of the application of the principles of beauty to advanced agricultural ideas the book is significant. It will somewhat surprise the ordinary reader with its apparent luxury, for under Mr. Hopkins the process of milking becomes a ritual, and the cost of milk may well equal that of champagne. Yet the author's conclusions and remarks are often very practical, while at the same time the outlines and grouping of his buildings are artistic. On the planning of the cow barn, the hay barn, the stable, the piggery and hennery, and of course the garage, his remarks are of value. We recommend the study of the book to any one considering the erection of farm buildings.

"The Dry-Fly Man's Handbook" (Dutton), by Frederic M. Halford, appeals primarily to the devotee of the chalk-streams of Great Britain, though its elucidation of the general principles of dry-fly angling would serve for American trout streams as well. Mr. Halford is well known to readers of the literature of angling as an ultra-purist. First, find your trout, actually engaged in rising to the surface for the real fly. Find out the particular kind of fly on which he is feeding, and cast the artificial insect of the same variety so that it will float as naturally as possible over the spot where the fish is rising. To let yourself be tempted into casting for a trout which you can see lying on the bottom, but not actually rising for real flies, is to prove yourself not an ultra-purist at all, but at best only a purist. And if your eagerness should lure you into allowing your fly to get water-logged and go under the surface even a little, your right to be named with the dry-fly men at all is forever gone. And yet Mr. Halford is perfectly willing to admit that there is respectable angling outside the limits of the dry-fly code. The first half of the volume deals directly with the technique of dry-fly angling. This is followed by four chapters on the Fisherman's Entomology, giving a careful description, with many illustrations, of the various flies in which the angler is interested. The gaudy colored plates of artificial flies so common in angling literature are happily absent. The last hundred pages of the book are devoted to suggestions for the preparation, stocking, and management of private fisheries.

Drama and Music

Mr. Henry Thomas Schnittkind will bring out in the autumn, through the Stratford Publishing Company, a play on the Prometheus myth, together with a poetical version of Plautus's "Mostellaria."

Any conscientious attempt to contribute to the fabric of a genuine American drama is welcome, and from this point of view the "Jacob Leisler" (Mitchell Kennerley) of William O. Bates deserves a word of recognition. Moreover, it comes at an appropriate time, when a statue of the hero has just been placed in the grounds of the Huguenot Association of New Rochelle in commemoration of his connection with that place. The endeavor to awaken public interest in a man who played a prominent part in stirring events in the early history of New York, who was the first to hold the position of Governor by virtue of a popular vote, and who paid with his life the penalty of a loyalty which, whether or not it was misguided, is generally admitted to have been unselfish and sincere, was well worth while. And the subject has the advantage of being comparatively fresh to the vast majority of readers outside the ranks of historical students, as well as being clearly susceptible of effective dramatic treatment. Unfortunately, Mr. Bates has not proved himself equal to his opportunity. He has not succeeded either in making a good practicable drama or in re-creating, with any plausibility, the atmosphere of the period. So far as the known facts in Leisler's career are concerned, his acceptance of the popular election, his seizure of the fort in the name of King William, his refusal to surrender it except to a properly accredited successor, his ultimate loyal submission, his subsequent trial at the instigation of his Jacobite enemies and his summary execution as a rebel against the King whom he was eager to serve—the author follows the existing records with sufficient closeness, but the supplementary details with which he has embellished them and many of his characterizations are grotesque; while his dialogue, with its curious mixture of the modern with the antique, rarely rises above the level of cheap melodrama. Structurally the piece is very loose and slipshod, and it would require much remodelling to fit it for stage representation, although several of its scenes contain good theatrical material. As a narrative it is interesting in spite of its many absurdities, and it suggests a field which might be explored with much profit by a capable dramatist.

Edwin Davies Schoonmaker is the author of "The Americans" (Mitchell Kennerley), which is one of a series of racial dramas, including "The Saxons," "The Slavs," and "The Hindoos." It is an ambitious effort, not without a certain measure of force and imagination, but not very impressive in its illustrations or its philosophy. Professing to deal with "the industrial conflict that is now raging," it offers as its principal figures a timber king, a capable and adamantine materialist—who might have been taken from any one of half a dozen recent melodramas—and his son, an ardent idealist. When the former would crush his striking workmen by starvation and military force, the latter advocates liberal, conciliatory, and coöperative measures, identifies himself with the cause of the rebels, and finally is murdered by a walking delegate, who has no sympathy with plans which might put an end to the profits of professional agitators. Afterward, in the moment of his apparent triumph, the timber king himself is slain and the militia make common cause with the workers whom they have been summoned to repress. The implication of the whole play is that capital must concede the demands of labor, adopt socialistic and coöperative systems, or prepare to face general armed revolution. Mr. Schoonmaker exhibits familiarity with certain phases of existing social conditions, but no broad-minded grasp of the whole situation. His illustrations are both conventional and extravagant, and his evident sincerity lacks the ballast of experience. He deserves credit for imaginative dealing with a weighty problem, but contributes nothing particularly helpful towards its solution. Why he should have elected to write some of his dialogue in the blankest of verse is a mystery.

The object of two volumes recently published, "Dramatization" (Scott, Foresman & Co.), by Sarah E. Simons and Clem Irwin Orr, and "A Dickens Dramatic Reader" (Ginn & Co.), by Fanny Comstock, is to furnish passages from English classics adapted for dramatic representation in schools. Whether the encouragement of the theatrical instinct in children, without skilled and capable instructors, is altogether desirable is a question which need not be debated here. Of course, there is no great difficulty in the selection of passages from great authors, which, with very little alteration, lend themselves readily enough to stage enactment, and most of those collected in these two books are famous, but many of them are hopelessly beyond the interpretative faculties of boys and girls. The time expended in drilling children in the mechanical and parrot-like recitation of such pieces is wholly wasted, and the result of all the labor is likely to be mischievous in more ways than one. The chief practical value of such compilations is to whet the appetites of juvenile readers for the works from which the samples are taken.

One of Massenet's last compositions, not yet printed, had its first hearing the other day in Paris. It is a "melodic poem" entitled "Loti's Visions," text by Edmond Noël. It was sung by four artists of the Grand Opéra, Gall and Arbell, Dubois and Dulos, and it pleased the audience so much that it had to be repeated. The critics pronounced it one of the happiest of Massenet's melodic inspirations.

The house at Pillnitz in which Wagner composed "Lohengrin" in 1846 was sold at auction the other day. The buyer is a butcher.

It is possible that the Russian Opera Company, recently heard in London, will appear in New York at the Century Opera House next May.

English composers cannot complain that they are entirely neglected in London. Sir Henry Wood has selected thirteen native works—many of them absolute novelties—for the Queen's Hall Orchestra's nineteenth season of promenade concerts.

An illustration of Liszt's generosity is given by a Russian journal. When the great pianist was in Moscow, in 1863, it happened that an actor had obtained permission to have a benefit at the theatre; but the public was so taken up with Liszt that the poor fellow ran a good chance of having an empty house. When Liszt heard of this he promptly offered to play several pieces during the intermissions. The result was that the theatre was jammed and the actor took in more than 2,000 rubles.

English bands are accounted second to none. There is a special institution, Kneller Hall, for the training of bandmasters and instrumentalists. At a recent garden party, the official band of this institution rendered a programme which is interesting as showing the attention paid to English music. It included Sullivan's "Macbeth" Overture, Balfour Gardiner's "Shepherd Fennel's Dance," Coleridge Taylor's Characteristic Waltzes, the March from Sir Edward Elgar's "Crown of India," a selection from Edward German's "Tom Jones," Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Rhapsodie Ecossaise," and Herbert E. Haines's "Woodland Serenade."

Portugal has only one conservatory of music, situated at Lisbon. The highest salary paid is $500 a year; assistant teachers get $150. Orchestral players, though they have a union, are paid at the San Carlo Theatre no more than $40 to $80 a month; at vaudevilles and musical comedies they get 60 cents to $1.20 a performance.

A lecture on kettledrums was given in London the other day by Gabriel Cleather. He commented on the fact that for generations the drum has been regarded to a great extent as a comic implement—something to be used effectively at bye-elections and public demonstrations of war or peace—and proceeded to demonstrate that the kettledrum is a genuine musical instrument the player of which must not only have a knowledge of rhythm and dynamics, but a very keen sense of pitch and a most sensitive touch. By way of illustrating this lecture, as many as six timpani were used in a composition for pianoforte and drums by Julius Tausch, and in others three, four, and five. One of the critics wrote that "especially in the Schumann 'Sketch in D flat' and the Grieg 'Berceuse,' the effect was most suggestive and charming."

Plans are making to collect funds for erecting a monument to the composer Ethelbert Nevin at Sewickley, Pa., where he was born and died. It is probable that there will be given a concert at which eminent musicians will coöperate.

The Mediæval Church Architecture of England. By Charles Herbert Moore, author of "Development and Character of Gothic Architecture" and "Character of Renaissance Architecture." With 23 plates in half-tone and 49 illustrations in the text. New York: The Macmillan Co. $3.50 net.

This interesting and scholarly work, by a writer whose two previous books have acquainted students of architecture with his critical methods and point of view, embodies the results of Professor Moore's personal investigation and study of a large number of the most important mediæval English churches, the author having taken up his residence in England for the special purpose of pursuing this work. The contribution he makes to the literature of a most interesting subject is so serious and so valuable within the field to which the author has confined himself, as to deepen one's regret at the narrowness of his approach to it. The work might with propriety have borne the title and sub-title "Structural and Logical Deficiencies in English Churches; An Analysis and Criticism of the Design of their Piers, Vaulting-Shafts, and Vaulting."

His purpose, as stated in the preface, is "to set forth the character of mediæval church architecture in England in the light of a structural analysis and comparison with the French Gothic art and of the conditions under which it was produced." The special incentive to writing this book lay in "the great misunderstanding of the art of England shown by recent, no less than by earlier, English writers," who are charged with a "fragmentary method of study" and with a "patriotic bias fatal to impartial judgment." Professor Moore has never lacked the courage of his convictions, and in thus boldly challenging English judgments on English architecture he has set forth his contentions with pungency and force, supporting them by careful analysis and acute observations leading to arguments which are in many cases logical and convincing. In so far as he endeavors to establish the general contentions that the English Norman architecture, first introduced from France, developed on lines which show a lack of that logical evolution from structural exigencies which characterizes the French Romanesque; that the fundamental characteristics of this Anglo-Norman style persist without essential change in the Early English style; and that throughout the entire Gothic period the English church builders, in their treatment of the bay-system and of the clustering of piers, in their design of vaulting-shafts, and in the relation of shafts to vault-ribs, ignored the logical considerations which controlled the French Gothic builders, Professor Moore's reasoning is entirely sound. He is also on solid ground in tracing the evolutionary relations of Canterbury, Lincoln, Salisbury, and the transepts of York, and in his view as to the relative proportions of French and English influences in the design of Westminster Abbey. In all these matters he has made an important contribution to the critical understanding of English mediæval architecture.

Unfortunately, the force, or at least the acceptability, of these contentions is weakened by the narrowness of the author's view of the philosophy of architectural design. In his preface Mr. Moore restricts "the use of the term 'Gothic' to the French art, using the term 'pointed' for that architecture of the Middle Ages, whether in England or elsewhere, in which the pointed arch and other details are merely applied to forms of building that retain the structural character of the older art." Now it is true that "the question of names is of secondary importance," and that any writer may define his terms as he pleases, provided neither he nor the reader is misled by either the name or the definition. But Mr. Moore is constantly misled, and misleads his readers; for by quietly ignoring the rightness of any other system, method, or point of view than that of the Ile-de-France as developed between 1140 and 1260 and calling all else "non-Gothic" or "not truly Gothic," a habit of mind is acquired, and a tone of criticism developed, which stamp everything else as inferior. Moreover, in taking this position he centres attention on the "logic" of design as the one supreme consideration; and this "logic" is furthermore restricted to the visible expression of a scientifically designed structural framework. And as the author assumes the particular forms and methods of this structural expression in the Ile-de-France Gothic to be in all points the most perfect forms and methods, every deviation from these is criticised as inferior or "non-Gothic." Thus the fundamental narrowness of Mr. Moore's definition of "Gothic" comes to be far more than a mere question of names, and is found to vitiate his entire critical position. For it leads him to err widely in two most important particulars. He ignores the very existence of the logic of æsthetic expression, which in a work of architecture may claim equal importance and validity with the logic of structural expression; and he condemns the application even of structural logic in the English examples, when it deviates from the French applications of the same logic. Thus the English multiple-ribbed vaulting, which was primarily developed to simplify the construction, was an extension of the fundamental principle of vault-ribbing which lies at the very heart of Gothic architectural development; but Mr. Moore calls it a violation of that principle! So also the superb hammer-beam trusses of Westminster Hall and other like examples are condemned because the only correct form of truss is assumed to be that which exerts no thrust on the walls, i. e., the truss with a tie-beam. Why it is not as permissible to build a timber roof that exerts a thrust as a stone roof that exerts a thrust, is not explained. Parity of reasoning would either condemn all vaulting in favor of a lintel construction, or compel the use of the iron or timber tie for vaulting, as in many Italian churches.

Furthermore, the criticism of the structural logic of English churches is to such an extent confined to the design of the pier sections and the relation of the vaulting shafts to the vaulting ribs as to make these appear to be not merely important elements, but almost the whole, of Gothic architecture. Mr. Moore's contention on this point appears to be that the failure of the English mediæval builders, in any one of their churches, to carry continuous vaulting shafts from the floor, or at least from the main pier-caps to the spring of the vaulting, with a distinct member for each vault-rib, stamps all their work as fundamentally illogical and hence "not truly Gothic," and that their multiplication of shafts, ribs, and mouldings was not motived by any sound or truly Gothic structural logic. He never allows the reader to suspect that every vaulting shaft in every Gothic building is a structural superfluity, which can be cut away at any point or dispensed with altogether, without endangering the stability of the vaulting; that, indeed, the vaulting shaft was a purely decorative device—a product of æsthetic, not structural, logic, intended to give the eye the æsthetic satisfaction of an apparent, though actually unnecessary, support from the ground up; and that the clustering of shafts so as to give every supported member its own apparent support is also a purely æsthetic device, the structural essential being a sufficient sectional area for the pier, rather than any particular form of section. The coördination of supporting and supported members is a means of æsthetic effect based on apparent structural relations which do not really exist. It is not really more "true," though it is from one narrow point of view more "logical," than designing these various members with a view to purely decorative effects. In other words, the entire apparatus of the greater part of the criticism of English architecture in this book is based upon critical assumptions which are fundamentally open to question, though urged as axiomatic by the author; and upon which, even granting his point of view, he has built, along with many perfectly sound and just criticisms, many that are unfair and erroneous.

One contention which is repeatedly urged is scientifically incorrect. The author appears to think that the load on the groin-ribs varies materially with the section and form of the vault-cells, so that a domical transverse vault (i. e., one with a concave rising ridge of the French type) "bears more effectively" on the groin-ribs than one with a horizontal straight ridge (p. 27). His figure 20 in support of this curious contention is wholly misleading. The transverse cells, whatever their form, are carried wholly by the groin-ribs, and "bear" upon it in proportion to their weight, not their section. So also he contends that the widening of the "conoids" of English vaults towards the clear-story prevents the "concentration of the vault thrust" which would be possible if they were narrowed against the clear-story. It is not easy to understand the system of statics implied in this singular contention, on which there is considerable insistence.

One might fairly expect in a careful study of English mediæval church architecture some description, analysis, and appreciation of the polygonal chapter houses of Lichfield, Wells, Salisbury, and Westminster. They are the most original creations of that architecture, absolutely English, and as logical, in the French Gothic sense, as the nave of Amiens. There is no discussion of the planning of English churches, except in the references to the inferiority of their square east ends to the apsidal east ends of French churches—a fair criticism, most architects will agree. But the plan as a whole is nowhere discussed as an architectural conception in itself, and this every architect will feel is a serious defect in a work which professes to treat of church architecture. The towers and spires of English churches are in like manner ignored; and nowhere are the fundamental ideas, the basic artistic conceptions, that underlie the design of the great churches, the considerations both practical and artistic that differentiate their plans and proportions from the French, recognized or even referred to. The exquisite beauty of the carved ornament, the marvellous perfection of execution of the mouldings, especially in the thirteenth century, are disparaged as departures from the French ideals. All the charm and loveliness of the English Gothic churches, which appeal so strongly to tourist and architect alike, are outweighed, in the author's stern judgment, by their nonconformity to the French logic of design in respect to pier sections, vaulting shafts, and vault-ribs. The magnificent octagon of Ely is condemned in toto, in conception, detail, and execution, as inappropriate; it is a gigantic mistake. For all the products of the perpendicular style Mr. Moore expresses disfavor amounting to contempt.

In spite of these deficiencies, the student of mediæval architecture will find this a stimulating, informing and suggestive book. It is sound in its scholarship and in its statement of facts, keen in its analysis, and simple and direct in its style. The illustrations are excellent, the author's own drawings being models of faithful and brilliant delineation. Nearly all the more important cathedrals and abbeys of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are passed under longer or shorter review, though in no case is any church considered as a whole, either historically or critically. The book is admirably printed, but the proof-reading is not faultless in the matter of foreign names. Viollet-le-Duc is twice printed Voillet le Duc; Rivoira is misprinted Rivoïa; San Ambrogio (or Sant' Ambrogio) becomes the bilingual St. Ambrogio; the French quotation at the bottom of page 3 contains six errors in two lines; St. John's Chapel, in the Tower of London, is St. Joseph's, in the list of illustrations.

"Colonial Furniture in America," by Luke Vincent Lockwood, will be published by Scribners this summer.

Mr. Charles H. Caffin's "The Story of British Painting," originally announced for publication in 1912, is in hand for issue in October or November this year (Century). It will show reproductions of forty famous British paintings.

Finance

THE NEW ERA IN AMERICAN FINANCE.

With the substantial recovery on the Stock Exchange, these past two weeks, from its exaggerated gloom and despondency of the two or three months preceding, and with the passing of the markets into something resembling normal conditions, the mind of the financial community has turned once more to the question, whether complete restoration of financial equilibrium will bring us back to the familiar episodes of the decade past, or whether, in finance as in other things, a new era lies before us. The problem is deeply interesting. The death, last week, of another of the promoting capitalists whose names were constantly on the lips of Wall Street, in the exciting days of 1901 and 1906, is a reminder of the extent to which even the actors on that memorable stage have ended their several careers, in the few years since the era of promotion, combination, and speculation itself came to an end.

Announcements of this kind show how far and how rapidly the world has moved. It is sometimes hard for people who have lived through such an era—who have seen its beginning, its climax, its waning, and perhaps shared in the common delusion that it must go on forever—to realize how completely its particular qualities and phenomena have disappeared from the social, political, and financial scene.

The period itself sometimes seems only yesterday; sometimes a generation ago. But the reminder of what it actually was comes forcibly when the conspicuous leaders, in an extraordinary era of the kind, pass away from the present scene. Of the typical figures in the dramatic chapter of finance, which appropriately ended in the great crash of 1907, very few are left. When one mentions only Morgan, Harriman, Gates, and Keene, it is possible to understand how soon the active figures of that period will be to the rising generation as much mere matters of tradition and past history as the exploiters of 1869 and 1870 were to the men of 1893.

With attention thus directed to the fact that the era of speculative exploitation, in and out of Wall Street, is actually dead and gone, conjecture as to the character of the coming period grows interesting. It is a curious fact that a great financial panic is invariably the landmark separating such financial and economic eras from one another. The succeeding periods never resemble one another, except in the mere fact of their alternate depression and expansion, and, what is equally impressive, the social and political characteristics of the period change with the financial.

To realize how far we have already drifted from the days of 1901, it is not necessary even to point to the present attitude of great railway and industrial corporations towards the people, to the revolt of the Stock Exchange itself against the abuses practiced on it barely half-a-dozen years ago, or to the vanishing of the financial dictators with their Wall Street court. The manner of life which was pursued by the extraordinary body of overnight "multi-millionaires" in that famous period, their flaunting personal display, their spectacular gambling exploits after Stock Exchange hours, would be as inconceivable in the surrounding circumstances of today as would the charter of a Fall River steamer, after the plan of Fisk and Gould in 1869, for an evening's personal conversation on financial affairs with their guest, the President of the United States.

People with a wholly disinterested point of view—if there are any such people in America—will probably agree that finance, as well as society at large, is very well rid of that demoralizing period. As the panorama of the new era which has succeeded it gradually unfolds, we shall begin to see more clearly just what the character of the next period is to be. It has certainly not yet displayed its qualities—except that, so far as this country is concerned, a spirit of well-balanced conservatism, of working on the basis of real rather than imaginary things, has already come plainly into evidence.

One conclusion, however, may be safely adopted. The day of reckless experiment in finance and business is for the present definitely past. Nobody hears any longer of old-fashioned economic law being obsolete and negligible, and our material prosperity is bound to be built up on a far sounder basis for that reason. Whether the social and political worlds are destined similarly to settle down to that sober and rational basis is perhaps another question. That the course of events on the Stock Exchange, and with finance in general, is very apt to foreshadow at long range the course of events in these other quarters, would at least suggest that the wild ideas and extravagant commotion, which have lately beset all fields except finance, will eventually subside as they have done in the financial field since 1907.

"An admirable book. There is probably no other work which covers quite the same ground, and in such brief compass and clear language depicts the complexity of the life of the great Peninsula. . . . In Mr. Shoemaker's personally conducted tour we enjoy the advantages of combining impressionism with the realism of precise statement of fact. Abundant excellent illustrations usefully supplement the text. . . . In one succinct volume we have, probably as nearly as it may be accomplished, an epitome of India that avoids the frigid and desiccated style of the guide book."—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE ENERGY SYSTEM OF MATTER

A Deduction from Terrestrial Energy Phenomena

By JAMES WEIR

8vo. Price $2.00 net. (Postage 12 cents.)

It may be said without hesitation that the originality and striking character of the central idea of the book, built up on a solid basis of clear observation and simple experiment, is calculated to change in no slight degree the current of modern scientific thought and deflect it towards a saner and more adequate conception of the energy processes in the world around us. It is a book which should be of interest to students of new tendencies in the scientific world.—From the Preface.

Three New Books By JOHN MASEFIELD

SALT WATER BALLADS Ready in September

"Masefield has prisoned in verse the spirit of life at sea."—New York Sun.

A MAINSAIL HAUL Ready in September

"There is strength about everything Masefield writes that compels the feeling that he has an inward eye on which he draws to shape new films of old pictures. In these pictures is freshness combined with power."—New York Globe.

THE TRAGEDY OF POMPEY Ready shortly. $1.25 net

A vigorous, vivid, and convincing play, in the virile and impressive vein associated with Mr. Masefield's striking poetic gifts.

New Editions of JOHN MASEFIELD'S Other Works.

THE DAFFODIL FIELDS Second edition. $1.25 net

"Neither in the design nor in the telling did, or could, 'Enoch Arden' come near the artistic truth of 'The Daffodil Fields.'"—Sir Quiller-Couch, Cambridge University.

THE STORY OF A ROUND HOUSE, and Other Poems New and revised edition. $1.30 net

"The story of that rounding of the Horn! Never in prose has the sea been so tremendously described."—Chicago Evening Post.

THE EVERLASTING MERCY, and THE WIDOW IN THE BYE STREET

(Awarded the Royal Society of Literature's Prize of $500. New and revised edition. $1.25 net

"Mr. Masefield comes like a flash of light across contemporary English poetry. The improbable has been accomplished; he has made poetry out of the very material that has refused to yield it for almost a score of years."—Boston Evening Transcript.

By WILFRID WILSON GIBSON

DAILY BREAD New edition. Three volumes in one. $1.25 net

"A Millet in word-painting, who writes with a terrible simplicity, is Wilfrid Wilson Gibson, born in Hexham, England, in 1878, of whom Canon Cheyne wrote: 'A new poet of the people has risen up among us.' The story of a soul is written as plainly in 'Daily Bread' as in 'The Divine Comedy' and in 'Paradise Lost.'"—The Outlook.

FIRES $1.25 net

"In 'Fires,' as in 'Daily Bread,' the fundamental note is human sympathy with the whole of life. Impressive as these dramas are, it is in their cumulative effect that they are chiefly powerful."—Atlantic Monthly.

WOMENKIND $1.25 net

"Mr. Gibson is a genuine singer of his own day and turns into appealing harmony the world's harshly jarring notes of poverty and pain."—The Outlook.

By FANNIE STEARNS DAVIS

MYSELF AND I $1.00 net

"For some years the poems of Miss Davis have attracted wide attention in the best perlodicals. That note of wistful mysticism which shimmers in almost every line gives her art a distinction that is bound to make its appeal. In this first book—where every verse is significant—Miss Davis has achieved very beautiful and serious poetry."—Boston Transcript.

By HERMANN HAGEDORN

POEMS AND BALLADS Ready in September

"His is perhaps the most confident of the prophecies of our new poets, for he has seen most clearly the poetry in the new life. His song is full of the spirit of youth and hope. . . . It is the song that the new century needs. His verse is strong and flexible and has an ease, a naturalness, a rhythm that is rare in young poets. In many of his shorter lyrics he recalls Heine."—Boston Transcript.

By JOHN HELSTON

APHRODITE AT LEATHERHEAD, and Other Poems Ready shortly. $1.25 net

This book introduces another poet of promise to the verse-lovers of the country. It is of interest to learn that Mr. Helston, who for several years was an operative mechanic in electrical works, has created a remarkable impression in England, where much is expected of him. This volume, characterized by verse of rare beauty, presents his most representative work, ranging from the long descriptive title-poem to shorter lyrics.

The Week

Are Texas Democrats really collecting a fund of $50,000 for Mr. Bryan on condition that the Secretary of State shall abandon his Chautauqua work and devote himself exclusively to his duties at Washington? Mr. Bryan will probably lose no time in squelching a project which may lead some people to confuse him with Walter Johnson, who only the other day received a silver cup three and a half feet high full of money. The friends and enemies of Mr. Bryan would be equally delighted to contribute. His friends, however, should remember that the Secretary of State cares for the excitement of Chautauqua as much as for the profits. Mr. Bryan off the lecture platform is inconceivable. And it has yet to be shown that his work in Washington suffers as a result of his platform work. Like Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. La Follette, and other popular exhorters, he probably finds oratory no strain on the mind. While delivering "The Prince of Peace" he may easily be thinking out the Mexican situation.

The tariff bill has reached the stage where already the attentive ear ought to discern the first ominous groanings of the nation's industries preparing to crumble into ruin; but our industries are obviously refusing to crumble. Foreign trade, domestic trade, railway receipts are all picking up. Instead of the carpenter's hammer upon the walls of temporary soup kitchens, the tattoo is of the ironworker on the steel of ascending skyscrapers. The nation is showing keen concern with regard to our interests in Mexico, our interests in Nicaragua, our interests in Venezuela, thus justifying the assumption that after the tariff bill is passed we shall still have a few fragmentary interests left somewhere. It is true that by dint of hard research Senator Penrose has discovered a manufacturing concern in northeastern Pennsylvania which has suspended operations; but Senator Penrose has presented his instance more in a spirit of duty than of enthusiasm. It is plain that Prosperity has played the Bulgarian trick on its ancient ally, the Republican Party.

As it passed the House, the tariff bill contained a clause prohibiting the importation of the plumage of wild birds. This provision has been so altered by the Senate Finance Committee as to make it useless for the purpose for which it was designed. Under the clause as it now stands, all feathers excepting only aigrettes may be admitted. Since this action has been ratified by the Democratic caucus, the only hope of defeating it lies in the Senate as a whole. There can be little doubt regarding the sentiment of people in general upon the subject. No one who realizes what the use of plumage of this sort means for the wild-bird life of vast areas can be long in condemning it. Already the slaughter of birds has gone so far as to threaten the extinction of certain species. The only way to stop it is to make it pecuniarily unprofitable. And that is just what the provision in question contemplated. So effective was it deemed to be by the commercial interests concerned that they exerted themselves to get it changed by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and successfully. Those who took the trouble of writing members of the House when the contest was on there, need to redouble their efforts with members of the Senate, if all their work is not to be lost.

The decision of the House Banking and Currency Committee, providing for an advisory board of bankers to act in coöperation with the central "Federal Reserve Board" under the pending bill, is a distinct step in advance. As the provisions of the amendment are described in the dispatches, the new Board is to consist of as many members as there are regional reserve banks, and each regional bank is to select one member. It is also stated that its functions are to be advisory only. Under such conditions, its actual power and usefulness would naturally depend on the extent to which the Federal Board consulted it and deferred to it. That cannot be predicted with absolute assurance; but it is hardly open to doubt that the presence of so authoritative a committee in the field, created by the law, would make such consultation inevitable. Otherwise the Federal Board would be placing itself in direct antagonism to the whole system of regional reserve banks; and this would be a far more difficult and unpopular policy to pursue than defiance of the Wall Street banks alone. Whether by law, or by custom having the force of law, the authority of the Federal Board to "require Federal reserve banks to rediscount the discounted prime paper of other Federal reserve banks"; to suspend for stipulated periods "any and every reserve requirement," and to "grant in part or reject entirely" the application of any Federal reserve bank for note circulation, ought never to be exercised without the approval of this advisory committee.

It was to be expected that the express companies would find grounds for dissatisfaction with the new rate schedules promulgated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In a matter of such complicated nature the outsider must assume that the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, based on the most elaborate investigations extending over a period of three years, and after prolonged hearings in which the express companies were represented by counsel, are just and reasonable. This, in spite of the fact that at first sight there is some justification for the complaint made by the head of one company that the new schedules aim to force the companies into impossible competition with the parcel post. Thus, for packages between five and twenty pounds, for virtually all distances, the new rates prescribe a lower charge by the express companies than the parcel post exacts. Since the Post Office is not conducted with a view to profit, and presumably fixes its charges at an irreducible minimum, the companies have a prima facie case against being compelled to go even below that minimum. But the position of the Interstate Commission is that the general nature of the express business is such that the discrimination is justified. Increase of business, on the one hand, and the abolition of franks and rebates, on the other, are counted upon to do more than make up the initial decrease in revenue.

The amusements of legislators would be a suitable subject for some hard-pressed candidate for a Ph.D. Material is abundant. Among the perennial diversions in which lawmakers engage, more especially in the West and South, is the introduction of bills for the removal of the State capital. This always arouses the spirit of local patriotism, and gives large opportunity for repartee. Oklahoma has devoted rather more attention to locating her capital than to anything else, except guaranteeing bank deposits. Now, after an extraordinary session of the Legislature, a decision by the United States Supreme Court, and resort to the initiative, Oklahoma City seems to have put Guthrie out of the running. Georgia is not so easily satisfied. Her General Assembly is facing the question of calling a special election to accept or reject a Constitutional amendment removing the seat of government from Augusta to Macon. The issue presents itself to residents of the latter city as simply whether the people of the State shall have the right to say where their capital shall be situated. Residents of Augusta see no reason for going to the trouble and expense of a special election to determine a matter which all people outside of Macon regard as having been settled, and settled right, long before any of them were born.

That favorite weapon of educators, the questionnaire, has been turned against them. Members of school boards in Ohio have received from the State Department of Education a list of such questions as these: "Are your teachers strong leaders in your community? Have your teachers made any effort to have flowers, shrubs, good lawns, and trees on school or church grounds? Have your teachers tried to organize a lecture course to help the community? Have your teachers tried to secure a farmers' institute at State expense for your community?" The replies show with emphasis how many things at once it is possible for a teacher to leave undone. Only 202 teachers are reported as being "strong leaders" in their communities, while 445 are not so regarded. This proportion, or a worse one, holds for the other questions. Only 71 teachers have sought to obtain a farmers' institute, as against 570 who have not. No wonder that to another question, "Do you believe that teachers are as thoroughly competent to teach as they should be?" only 121 trustees say yes, and 543 say no. Persons in other occupations may well pray to be saved from this modern Inquisition.

Many questions of prison management give rise to differences of opinion; but on one point none exists. Wherever the shortcomings of the penal system are looked into, in any State of the Union, the elimination of politics is set down as an indispensable requirement of its sound administration. In Texas, a legislative committee appointed several months ago has just made a voluminous report, covering a great many aspects of the question, ranging from the need of fireproof construction to the hours of labor for the prisoner and the salaries to be paid prison officials; but the report winds up with this paragraph:

> The prison system has suffered long and greatly from the demoralizing power of political interference, and neither the financial independence of the system nor substantial advancement in the moral reformation of the convicts may be expected until business considerations in the management of the affairs of the system supersede political influence, and merit supplants favoritism.

The formal regrets of Great Britain and Russia over their inability to attend our big party in 1915 will be received with disappointment and something like consternation at San Francisco. Was it for this that the California city lobbied at Washington and finally defeated New Orleans in the contest for the location of the Panama Exposition? What is a world's fair without world Powers? They have their reasons, to be sure. England lets it be known that she has been spending too freely for such functions, and that she proposes to stop —for a year anyway. Germany, who is hesitating along with Austria, fears that her designs may be copied if they are exposed to the gaze of her rivals. But it is not necessary to resort to a reader of the stars to learn that, as often in the case of formal regrets, part of the reasons, and perhaps the controlling part, are not given. Our European friends do not quite see the advantage to them in contributing to the success of a celebration which would remind them of the discrimination that we intend against them in the use of the very Canal whose completion was the occasion of glory. Japan, too, may find that she "cannot" come. Will California be puzzled over such an answer from her? And which of our toll-discriminating Senators will be so absent-minded as to say anything about international bad manners?

It is not necessary to dwell upon the retirement of Ambassador Wilson. That became inevitable long since. If anything were needed to complete the demonstration of his unfitness for a delicate work of diplomacy, it would have been supplied by his gross indiscretions since returning to this country. No one denies that he was laborious and energetic while in Mexico, or that he did everything within his power to safeguard American citizens there during the troublous times of his service. He evidently earned the good-will of the American colony in Mexico. But this did not warrant him in setting himself up as the Sir Oracle on Mexican affairs; did not justify him in seeking to force his opinion on our Government; certainly did not excuse him for his foolish and offensive talk on arriving in New York. If he got a cool reception at the White House, followed by a curt announcement that his resignation had been accepted, the fault was his own. The time had plainly come for a new man and new methods.

Mr. John Lind, ex-Governor of Minnesota, it must be confessed, does not appear to have special qualifications for the task on which the President has sent him. He has no command of Spanish, but this is not a very serious handicap in dealing with Mexican officials, many of whom speak English. It is admitted, too, that Mr. Lind has had no occasion to study Mexican questions. But he goes with the reputation of a man honest and clean-cut, and it is only fair to remember that, at least in the beginning, all that he will have to do will be to carry out President Wilson's instructions. As it is stated that these will be published here at the same time they are made known in Mexico, the net result will be that the whole world will be advised of the proposals that Mr. Lind is making. That should simplify his mission, even if it does not make it easy.

The treaty for the Nicaraguan protectorate was not in completed form when Secretary Bryan submitted it to the Senate for the purpose of getting advice before signing it and seeking its ratification. In that form it has been negatived by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Indeed, its reception by the country at large, as well as by the Senate, has been unfavorable—the praise coming mainly from Republican jingoes like Senator Lodge. In general, the people were unconvinced of either its necessity or its wisdom. They denied the alleged parallel with Cuban conditions. We have and can have no such relations with Nicaragua as with Cuba. Moreover, the advantages we were to win were slight and dubious, while the obligations we were to incur were large and all the more dangerous for being vague. And the fact that the proposed protectorate over Nicaragua awakens such unconcealed dislike and suspicion in the other Central American republics is strongly against it.

Friends of Venezuela who have anxiously traced ex-President Castro's wanderings will not welcome reports of his return home. Ever since his political début in 1900 calamity has followed his footsteps. The only question will be as to the strength of the faction he can command. He is widely hated. Yet after ex-Minister Northcott's recent assertion that "Castro is such an international outlaw that if he should venture back the majority would throw him into the sea," the stir he is already making gives color to a new view of Latin-American revolutions. They are less a habit than a malady. But there is no doubt in this instance as to the position of sound sentiment both in Venezuela and abroad. Memory of Castro's eight-year oligarchy should throw unexampled fervor into resistance to him. In his four years of virtual peace the country has made genuine progress in development. Experience of this tranquillity should lend vigor to the defence of the Government and to its appeals for moral support from outside.

Despite many evidences of success, some features of the English Workingmen's Insurance Act are testing the logic on which Bernard Shaw derided the old system. Men, he said, having seen that they could provide for a supply of bread by giving bakers a pecuniary interest in baking for them, insanely went on to give surgeons a pecuniary interest in cutting off legs. But if it was formerly too much to the physician's interest to discover ills, there is some evidence that it is now too much to society's. With the ignorant always fond of taking medicine, it is alleged that where state and fraternal benefits permit a thirty-shilling-a-week laborer to earn forty by staying abed, some have succumbed to the temptation. Malingering still implicates the ethics of the profession, moreover, for the great number of sickness claims has nearly doubled the income of the English doctor. But the authorities seem right in denying that it exists to any serious degree. They can reasonably point out that one of the purposes of the Act was to bring to light the great amount of ill-health that has hitherto gone neglected among the poorer classes, and that much genuine illness has been revealed for the first time. At any rate, the proposal that independent medical referees shall pass upon doubtful claims seems an easy way out of the difficulty.

It seems incredible that an English statesman should set out deliberately to discourage thought, but how else are we to speak of Lord Loreburn's bill "to prohibit certain prize competitions"? One form of these competitions is aptly termed "the Thinklet." The Thinklet is described as an entity with two parts. These are the example and the derivative. Words are given in ones, twos, or threes, the final letters of which you are to use as the initial letters of a similar group "bearing apt relation to the example." A simple diagram will make the process clear:

Example.	Thinklet.
HomE	Every

schooL	Lad

Now, there are perhaps a score of weekly journals in England engaged in this thought-provoking business, in connection with which they offer Mammoth Cash Prizes. The other day, we read, a Scotsman in Barrie's Thrums received £500 for this masterpiece:

Example.	Thinklet.
SweetheartS	Shillings

And this high intellectual effort Lord Loreburn would have the Mother of Parliaments stigmatize as a lottery!

The French Chamber having voted the new army bill by an enthusiastic majority, the Socialists have now demanded that the Government shall come down to the question of ways and means. As usual, the agile Ministers had leaped over this distasteful topic with a statement showing a surplus of $10,000, though everybody knows that actually there is a large deficit. But the Socialists desire to see the Government live up to its promise that the new financial burdens shall be placed on the shoulders of the rich; and, borrowing a leaf from Germany, they suggest a tax not merely upon incomes, but upon capital. The Government had introduced a bill taxing incomes of $2,000 and above, depending upon this to pacify the extremists until the budget goes through. That the real deficit of 1913, and the threatened deficit of 1914, require some provision, no one denies. But many suggest expedients other than the working out of a whole new system of taxation. As at Washington, the perspiring wail in Paris is, "What mood are we in for such a subject?" The one sure result seems to be the killing of many costly measures of social legislation, and the stripping of the army bill of all but its essentials.

An aspect of the Rand strike which loomed largest in Africa has attracted the least attention abroad. It was fear that the discontent of the whites would spread to the natives. And if the strike was nearly negligible in its economic results, it has had one important effect in directing new attention to the race problem in South Africa. Upon this topic the new Fiftieth Anniversary Edition of the "Negro Year Book" has some notable comment. Only a few months ago the first congress of all the tribes gathered at Bloemfontein and made a statement of their attitude towards the Government's policy. "There are signs," said the president, "that the European and colored sections of the country are daily drifting into hostile camps." Most of their demands seem highly reasonable. They ask the Government to restrict the sale of liquor in the mining camps, to give them an arts-and-crafts education, with native agricultural colleges, and to protect them from specified injuries. They cannot plead white responsibility for their presence, but they have the more valid claim to a land-ownership which certain legislative measures have undermined.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE NEGRO.

Mr. Wilson finds himself thus early in his Administration at the parting of the ways in the matter of the negro citizen. His nomination of Mr. A. E. Patterson, of Oklahoma, as Register of the Treasury, has been withdrawn at the nominee's request, and for the first time in a quarter of a century the office is to go to some one other than to a negro. Mr. Patterson asked to be allowed to withdraw because of the violent opposition of the negrophobe Southern Senators—Vardaman, Tillman, Hoke Smith, and the rest. That he lacked the courage to stick it out and to insist on having his name passed upon is greatly to be regretted. In a sense, he was recreant to his race; that he has not helped either Mr. Wilson or the colored people appears clearly from Vardaman's glorying. No negro, says the confident Senator, shall be appointed to any executive office in which there may be subordinate white employees; and his platform contains these further demands: "Segregation in all forms of Government employment; the entire separation of the races in Federal employ; negroes and white people must not be compelled to work side by side." The integrity of the Anglo-Saxon race, Mr. Vardaman adds, depends upon the "faithful consummation" of this programme. What a delicate integrity it must be!

For the first time since we have heard of him, it occurs to us that this Senator from Mississippi is serving a useful purpose. He has flung down a challenge to this Democratic Administration which Mr. Wilson cannot avoid. Shall the President give up the historic right of the Executive to appoint to office, to the extent at least of permitting a fraction of the Senate to bar out ten millions of American citizens from serving the Government, save in the lowest positions, and then as lepers set apart? Does he sympathize wholly or in any degree with the attitude of Hoke Smith and Vardaman? Is he going to ignore the colored man in his appointments hereafter, or is he going to select some one who will stick, and then fight it out on that line, whether it takes all summer or the rest of his Administration? Shall he fling the negro overboard after more of that race voted for Wilson than for any other Democratic candidate; shall he be a just President of all the American people, or only of those of the white race? Is the "New Freedom" to be accepted as preaching political doctrines whose truths are no longer truths when they meet the color line?

We understand, of course, how uncomfortable it must be for the President to encounter the enmity of the Southern Senators at this time. His tariff bill and his currency measure are before them, and his whole legislative programme not yet formulated will go before them next winter. But he has excellent Democratic precedent for stubbornly taking his position against them and sticking to it. Mr. Cleveland nominated a colored man to this same office of Register of the Treasury, and when, after a long struggle, he could not obtain his confirmation, he sent in the name of another one and had his way. Mr. Roosevelt's long fight on behalf of the confirmation of Dr. W. D. Crum, of Charleston, S. C., was altogether one of the finest things in his Administration. Can Mr. Wilson do less? We do not see how it is possible for him to steer a course of compromise and expediency in this matter, and we can not believe that he wishes to do so. The assurances that he gave to the negro delegations which called upon him during the campaign would forbid it, did he not naturally subscribe to the doctrine of all men up and none down.

So far as the colored people are concerned, they are already deeply stirred by the action of several of Mr. Wilson's Cabinet officers in segregating the negro employees within their Departments—in some cases they are screened off in corners as if even their aspect were contaminating. As usual in such cases, the excuse is that it is all for the negroes' welfare. That they are thereby rendered more safe in the possession of their offices, and are less likely to be discriminated against, is the sincere belief of some who have had part in this innovation. They do not see that this for the first time officially establishes a caste among the citizens and employees of the Federal Government; that within a short time the negro sections will be pointed to as the "nigger departments" and made the objects of the derision and hate of such men as Vardaman and Hoke Smith and their less conspicuous imitators; that the "nigger sections" will become as despised and as neglected as the "Jim Crow" car. So far from helping the negro to retain office, it will soon make it impossible for self-respecting negroes to enter a service which begins by classifying them as people who must be set off lest mere contact with them should result in some kind of moral contamination. In the Far South every fresh act of discrimination, every additional effort to degrade and to humiliate, will allege its justification by this action of the Federal Government.

That all of this will go without challenge is not to be expected. The Progressive Senators are already alive to their opportunity. The colored people themselves are beginning to be heard from, and their political influence is not to be despised. But we do not believe that this phase of it will concern Mr. Wilson. We think that when the matter is put before him in its true light, he will withhold his sanction from it, just as we believe that he will not permit any Southern reactionaries, however influential, to deter him from giving, in the matter of offices, fair play to a heavily disadvantaged race.

THE DEBTOR CLASS REDIVIVUS.

The introductory paragraph in the statement issued by Representative Henry, of Texas, concerning the amendments proposed by himself and others to the banking and currency bill has attracted less attention than it deserves. It is notable as reintroducing upon the political stage, after a long absence, an old friend who at one time attracted a large share of public attention. The bill, says Mr. Henry, has been drawn wholly "without provision for the debtor classes and those who toil, produce, and sustain the country." The wrongs of the "debtor class" were the very centre of the free-silver agitation. It was against that class that "the crime of '73" was committed. It was the cruelty of the gold conspirators towards the poor farmer that put upon them the deepest brand of infamy. "Putting the dollar above the man" was not, in those days, a mere general designation for plutocratic rapacity; it meant most specifically what was happening to the mortgage-burdened farmer. Prices were falling, the purchasing power of the dollar was rising; the dollar which he had to give in payment of his debt was worth more than the dollar he had borrowed. The same thing was true of debtors in general. And yet the heartless "creditor class" insisted on the dollar being kept unaltered; they wanted their pound of flesh. They put the dollar above the man. They were crucifying mankind upon a cross of gold.

About fifteen years ago there set in a movement of prices in the opposite direction. It soon reached very marked dimensions, and for the past eight or ten years has resulted in so rapid an advance of prices as has seldom been witnessed. The world is ringing with discussion of the extraordinary high prices of the time. It is quite as universal, and quite as intense, as was the low-price talk of the '80s and the early '90s. Debtors have been redeeming their obligations in dollars having less purchasing power than had the dollars that they borrowed. Creditors have been accepting in full payment the number of dollars called for on the face of the transaction, without any allowance for the fact that the dollar returned is not worth as much as the dollar lent. Under these circumstances, it might be expected that there would be a great outcry on the part of the "creditor class," corresponding to the outcry of the "debtor class" twenty and thirty years ago. But one hears nothing of the kind. If the creditor class really committed "the crime of '73," for the sake of squeezing an unearned increment out of their debtors in the shape of dollars of excessive value, they are certainly now showing amazing self-control in accepting without a murmur dollars of deficient value. Nowhere is there the slightest sign of their attempting to check the process of depreciation, or promoting legislation to offset it. And on the other hand, we hear nothing from the "debtor class" as to its remarkable good fortune.

It is interesting to note a circumstance which throws this singular attitude of indifference on the part of the "creditor class" into a peculiarly strong light. A plan has been proposed, and urged with great ability, by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, for keeping the purchasing power of the dollar stable. There can be no ethical objection to it, on the ground of its disturbing existing contracts, as was the case with the 16-to-1 proposal; for Professor Fisher's plan of the "compensated dollar" would start with the dollar as it is; its adjustments are designed only to counteract future changes in the purchasing power of gold. But, so far from the "creditor class" jumping at this chance for preventing future losses, we have yet to hear of a single financial magnate who takes the slightest interest in it. It is left to be threshed out by professors of political economy, and such-like harmless people. With billions trembling in the balance, the Morgans and the Rothschilds are content to putter along with the crude old dollar, or pound sterling, defined as so many grains of gold of such a degree of fineness. They do not even seem to think it worth while to subsidize the professors to write in favor of Professor Fisher's plan, though its theoretical merits are such that advocates of it would be perfectly safe from the suspicion of being hired agents of a conspiracy of bankers. We had occasion recently to draw attention to the admirable article in which Professor Taussig, of Harvard, while admitting the ability of Professor Fisher's argument, gave convincing reasons against it, grounded on the difficulties and uncertainties of its practical operation. It seems plain that, if the "creditor class" were wicked and heartless in standing by the gold dollar when it was working in their favor, they are at least showing exemplary consistency in standing by it when it is working against them.

The particular language used by Mr. Henry suggests another reminder of old-time discussion. He speaks of "the debtor classes and those who toil, produce, and sustain the country." This association of the idea of the "debtor class" with that of the working classes generally is perhaps not unnatural, but it is certainly a delusion and a mischievous one. Apart from the mortgaged farmers, the only "debtor class" of any serious magnitude is the owners of the great business enterprises of the country, which are carried on, in considerable measure, by borrowed money. The wage-earners' interests are rather those of the "creditor class," if one is to use this misleading phraseology of "classes" at all; and still more is this the case with the great army of salaried men and women, whether their yearly pay is six hundred dollars or six thousand. No argument against Bryan's scheme of currency debasement was more sound than that which warned the people that a cheapened dollar meant immediate rise in the price of commodities, while the compensating rise in wages would necessarily be attended with difficulties, and the advance of salaries would be sure to lag painfully behind. All this has been amply illustrated in the story of the past fifteen years. The spokesmen of the free-silver mania were deaf and blind to it; but much water has flowed under the bridge since those days. People will neither be hypnotized into imagining that they belong to the "debtor class" when they do not, nor moved to tears over grievances of that class which have no existence.

POLITICAL PROPHECY.

All men are intuitive prophets. This is part of their proud claim to the possession of reason looking before and after. On all sides one meets Happy Warriors professing to see in current events only what they foresaw and predicted. Especially in public affairs are the most unlikely Sauls found among the prophets. Who of us has not been drawn aside by a man bearing none of the outer insignia of a prophet, who begs his hearer to mark his words as he proceeds to unroll the book of fate? His favorite field is political campaigns. He will tell you who is going to be elected and why. Near and far his eye rolls in a fine frenzy, and his forecasts are as universal and sweeping and—we regret to say—usually as inaccurate as those of the old-style almanac. Despite frequent ludicrous confoundings by the event, this kind of prophet comes up smiling after every failure. He is stayed by no consideration of probability or the doctrine of chances, and openly flouts the maxim not to prophesy "onless ye know."

These displays of the ordinary fallible mortal are usually looked upon by the judicious with a kind of pitying amusement. They are regarded as merely one proof more of human vanity. But what are we to say when a distinguished scientist comes forward with the idea that exact prevision of events ought to be a part of the equipment of every statesman, and that politics can be raised to the dignity of a full-fledged science, of which one of the marks is that it is able to predict the future? The authority we refer to is the famous chemist, Prof. Wilhelm Ostwald, formerly of Leipzig University. An article of his, written for the Independent, bears the title, in translation, "The Wave Theory of History"; and the author seeks to show that economic and political movements can be reduced to a definite law, with the result that "politics can be transformed from a mere knack, as it has been regarded since olden times, into a science like technology with the power of sure and far-reaching prophecy."

Professor Ostwald's "wave theory," as he explains it in this short article, seems to be not so very different from our old acquaintance, "the swing of the pendulum," or "action and reaction." To be sure, he makes some nice observations and helpful qualifications; and in the sphere of economic changes, makes out a fairly good case for the belief that they move in cycles. If you only know in which part of the cycle you are, at any given time, you can roughly tell in what direction you are going. But when it is attempted to apply this notion to political evolution and to the whole sweep of politics, difficulties at once arise and are immense. To these Professor Ostwald is not the man to be blind. He merely insists that if the analysis of political movements could only be made delicate enough, we should be able to make out the "general oscillatory law" which determines "the political condition of a given group," and so to know what the future had in store. This, of course, is a tremendous if, in which there may or may not reside great virtue. We can all be prophets with an "if." But what most strikes us in this discussion by Professor Ostwald is his omission of all notice of two factors that admittedly sway human affairs, often in most powerful fashion, and yet that seem related to no law and that accordingly vitiate rash prophecies. We mean the elements of accident and of personality.

From the standpoint of Omniscience there is no such thing as accident, but upon the best foresight and plans of mortal men disconcerting and unforeseeable events frequently fall with a crash that disarranges everything and renders prediction futile. What we have in mind is such occurrences as the murder of Cavendish in Phœnix Park, Dublin, which made Parnell sick at heart and almost inclined to abandon the long fight for Home Rule. No one could have foreseen that crime or its effects. It seemed at a stroke to reduce statesmanship to imbecility. In the same way the assassination of President McKinley could no more have been foretold than the end of the world, yet it meant the most profound change in the political life of the United States. How can such things be got into a wave theory, or made to fit an oscillatory law that enables us to predict the future from the present? These accidents come wholly without the prevision of the wisest men, and they have a terrifying way of upsetting the nicest calculations. Confident prophecies they cause to appear ridiculous.

Equally unpredictable is the appearance of a great personal force in public life. We cannot tell when a political genius will rise, or what he will do when he has risen. Strive as we may to reduce everything to order and to observed causation, this personal element, this individual dæmonic energy, is all the time thrusting itself in unexpectedly to break up our classifications and to discredit our prophecies. In politics, too, the greatest thing is man; and without some philosophy of the production of towering genius, we cannot have a philosophy of history on the strength of which the future will be plain to us. What would Germany have been from 1856 to 1870 without Bismarck? Who could have predicted the rôle that Joseph Chamberlain played in English politics from 1900 till the time of his physical break-down? Yet how dissolving and shattering an influence it was which his single personality exerted. Leave out Theodore Roosevelt, and who would dare to attempt to write the political history of the United States for the past dozen years? It is not necessary to cite other examples. The most that even "old experience" can hope to attain to is "something of prophetic strain." As for anything like a science of political prediction, we must still side with Professor Ostwald's countryman, Lotze, against the possibility of anything of the kind that is worth the name.

THE DE-NATURING MANIA.

A learned Italian physician has been discoursing in the Corriere della Sera about de-coffeeized coffee—caffe decaffeinato. A great deal of research has been expended upon the subject in English and German laboratories. The final word is stated by our authority to be that of Professor Lehmann, of the University of Würzburg. According to him, what we need to get rid of in coffee is not caffeone, but caffeina. Minus the latter, the drink which has been called "the intellectual beverage" may still be used by those who find the infusion of pure coffee harmful.

Into these niceties of chemistry and nerves it is not for the layman to go. What most interests us is to observe that coffeeless coffee is symptomatic of a widespread tendency to take things out of their nature. It shows itself perhaps most prominently in matters of food and drink. Cheese which means indigestion can be eaten with impunity if only it be doctored or served aright. If certain elements can be got out of beer, some can go on drinking what, as it stands, is poison to their system. In Germany there is almost a rage for "Alkoholfrei" drinks that shall yet, somehow, produce the old exhilarations. We say nothing of the thousands of pitiful "substitutes." What is craved is the de-natured article; the injurious viand or beverage disarmed. We want the stimulus without the danger.

But the idea, as every attentive and philosophically minded person must have noticed, has more than merely physical applications. In mental and moral food, too, there is a widespread desire to find a way of indulgence without bad after-effects. We are impatient with the stern old "Touch not, taste not, handle not." Disguise the vice in evil literature, and why can we not go on reading it without harm? If indecent and debasing plays can only be de-natured, or be made to appear de-natured, for the spectator, they can be frequented without moral injury. Similarly, there are all kinds of shifts or pretences to take the sting out of gambling, the bite out of licentiousness, or the loathsomeness out of political corruption.

If one were to dig for the intellectual roots of this tendency to try to take things out of their nature, one would doubtless find them in inability or unwillingness to think clearly and see straight. Few of us like to see the thing exactly as it is. We share the mental vice which Carlyle attributed to the Irish—reluctance, that is, to face the facts as they actually exist; all the time saying to the hard fact: "Thou are not that way but this way." Men and women love to deceive themselves, as Goldsmith said, and in no way do they more often prove this than by fancying they can change realities by giving them some other appearance. By glossing over or covering up, by "treating" or modifying, by looking hard at what we want to see and being blind to all the rest, we imagine that we can make ourselves masters of all things by twisting them out of the rigid forms into which nature poured them. It may be a public office which a man has obtained. This means certain fixed duties, certain hazards, and certain opportunities and rewards, and in general a routine that must be followed. But you will occasionally encounter an office-holder who thinks that he can de-nature his job. Instead of sticking to his desk, he will go off lecturing. Not content to limit himself to either the duties or the salary of his office, he will seek to swell the latter by neglecting the former. This is de-coffeeized coffee in politics.

All these dodges and evasions and efforts to make black appear white—or, at least, a passable gray—will not, in the end, relieve us from making the distinct choices which a rough world imposes upon us. Whether it be food and drink, or a mental habit and moral indulgence—there the thing stands. We can take it or leave it. We can incur the peril open-eyed, or we can avoid it resolutely. But we cannot do both. There are limits beyond which the denaturing process cannot go. Poison will remain poison, however disguised. The more you expel nature with a fork, the more will she return. After all the moral de-coffeeizing that the most artful can do, there is nothing for it but to come back to the old and sane position of Bishop Butler: "Things are what they are, and none of our attempts to make them appear different can alter their essential nature. So why attempt to deceive ourselves?"

THE POET'S BREAD AND BUTTER.

Some attractive letters by the late William Vaughn Moody in the Atlantic raise a question that has been, unfortunately, of little moment recently in America. What of our poets' youth and youthful vocations? Even waiving James's maxim that letters is a better avocation than a profession, few young poets can boldly exist, as Alfred Noyes has surprised his contemporaries by doing, on poetry alone. Since Lanier no one has made the topic even one of curiosity; and social conditions have swung through a whole cycle of change since Longfellow and Lowell had professorships or diplomatic posts. The light that Moody sheds on the matter, moreover, would argue the change unfavorable. How was he, fresh from college, to make his living in this hustling twentieth-century America, and yet live to write? Teaching classes at the University of Chicago he found "work heavier far than he fondly hoped it would be." As his leisure contracted, he sometimes believed that "this meaningless drudgery, this crowd of spiteful assiduous nothings that keep me from It (ah, vague, sweet-shrouding, mute, arch vocable!), was tantalizing me into stupid rage." Trundling his "little instructorial droning-gear" into Lake Michigan, he might have turned tramp; but he knew his state of mind was really at fault. I should, he writes, "wake up some night to find my haystack bristling with such goblin dissension as now swarms over my counterpane." His attitude is exactly that of the half-fledged poet, compelled to maintain himself in Pittsburgh or St. Louis till his voice is heard.

What the poet rebels against is a sentiment that the more worldly of his tribe have themselves airily expressed. The practical-minded R. L. Stevenson, for one, felt that this reckless and poverty-stricken son of joy should efface himself before men of real use, or go to work. The world is equally determined that the hanger-on at the feast shall pay his way. This feeling is accentuated in a land where young men are expected to assimilate their fibre to the harsher side of affairs. England has its instances in Masefield, or Francis Thompson, whose works have just been collected. The latter, launched into a legal world where his powers fell nerveless, underwent a whole Iliad of sufferings before he found a sheltered corner to practice his art in. Disinherited, left for three years to house himself under old bridges and in the lee of tenements, he was in his life the extreme, as Moody was the average, expression of the impossibility of poetry as the profession of a minor talent. And in a busy country with no half-tasks, and an urgent demand for enthusiasm in daily work, the artist's ancient dilemma becomes even harder.

There are optimists who think the world more kindly planned; who with eyes on the great athletes of letters, running a vigorous race from the outset, imagine that dash and self-confidence are alone required. No man can justify any profession if he does not believe himself bred to it, and in addition think it highly useful to the world. The aspiring poet can thus defend his choice, and if he meet a little poverty, eke out more than an average of content by a Thoreau-like happiness in his independence and his product. Let him gird up his loins and set about his useful task with the same confident consecration as the missionary or patriot. But this view is of little service to lyres that begin with a doubtful and far-away sound. Poets are troubled, apart from the bare need of bread, by their own uncertainty, and the pressure of friends and society. Even genius, as Hazlitt was at pains to show, is often unconscious of its powers, and unable to establish the worth of what it does except by others' judgment.

All this is, of course, the individual's problem, not the community's. His is the task of balancing between future hope and present necessity. Any patronage but public patronage for the modern poet would be unhealthful. Even if he shared the limited assistance which endowments give to scientists and scholars, it would sap society's sense of duty towards the arts. No struggling versifier could wish that he had any surer means of launching forth than the lawyer or doctor. And he may find various sweet uses in his adversity—a closer acquaintance with life, a call to perseverance, and the protection of his art from the soiling hand of money-grubbing. Yet it was Henley who warned a young friend that he might write verse without swimming far into the work-a-day tides of existence, but not fiction.

We are not, however, without consolation in watching the discomfort of men like Moody and Thompson, counterparts of many other poets. The necessities of occupation in an unkind environment seldom rob us of anything of the highest value. It is only the body of minor verse that is imperilled. The commanding figure, under modern conditions that make a Chatterton's fate almost impossible, will be discovered ere the shades of the counting-house close round him. Or if, like Browning, he remains undiscovered, some appreciation lets his generous spirit still work along the plan that pleased his boyish thought. It would be going too far to say that to the minor poet's imprisonment is due the practical note of his verse, from Kipling's engine-room to Masefield's sail-tops.

MAKING IT EASY FOR THE TRAVELLER.

Globe-trotting is so universally catered to nowadays that no traveller ought to be in doubt exactly what he would find, or precisely what he should do, in even the most remote country on earth. Guide-books swarm like novels. Books of travel are kept religiously up to-date. Foreign correspondence in the newspapers has, in some forms, largely gone out of style, but letters from abroad are still abundantly printed, which touch upon out-of-the-way routes and detail the methods of life and are full of character sketches. With all this information showered upon the intending traveller, one might think that the least expert could go on his way rejoicing in the certainty that nothing he encountered could take him by surprise.

However, the old question frequently arises, who will guarantee the guarantors? Who will certify to the accuracy of the guide-books, and give a bond that the information published is correct? These doubts concern not so much the ordinary facts, as the niceties of observation, the peculiarities of manners and customs—all those little points about life and travel in a strange land which the foreigner would like to know in advance, but which many there be to tell him that he can by no means ascertain from the printed page. Hence the practice of turning for certitude to "the man who has been there." Hence, also, the impulse of the man who has been there to step forward and tell his departing friend all that he ought to know, but can find out from no other source.

One such lot of volunteered information, based on personal experience, was lately offered by an Englishman to a fellow-countryman about to travel in the United States. It contains many things which must have been news to the traveller—as also many that would be news to the people among whom he was to travel. He was told, for instance, that the "black attendant" on his train in this country would slap him on the back and ask him how he was. At this the Englishman was to show no surprise. The Briton is also advised that every American he casually meets will invite him to take a drink. This he must not refuse, for it would only expose him to the charge of displaying English "side"—this slang term being, of course, familiar to all saloon-frequenting Americans. The Englishman about to sail for this country was informed, likewise, that he would be almost torn apart, on landing, by "runners" from the hotels. At these gentry he was not to swear. The thing to do was to take them quietly, although they "will probably make your life a hell." In fact, he was to take everything quietly; certainly excellent advice for any traveller anywhere. The United States he was not to expect to find "anything like what you have read." This was the reason why his friend was doing him the kindness of letting him into all the inner secrets of the country. But even with this aid he would not be equipped at all points, and so the final all-embracing word of counsel was: "Don't be surprised at anything."

According to this mentor on the pleasing ways of Americans, all of them on board the ship with the British traveller would begin, as soon as they sighted the Statue of Liberty, to rub their hands and to exclaim: "Thank God, we shall soon get a good bit of roast beef now!" At this the forewarned Briton is not to "laugh satirically." But why is not explained. Possibly, the oracle on American affairs thought that the remark quoted was intended to get a "rise" out of the Englishman, and that he could frustrate the malicious jesters by remaining impassive. Or it may be that he felt that the satiric laughter ought to be deferred until the Britisher sat down as a guest at some American table, and proceeded to tell his host that we do not know how to cook roast beef in this country.

Let it not be thought that we are caricaturing this friendly lecture on America, or that it was not written in good faith. It was all printed soberly in the Manchester Guardian, and was vouched for as coming from one who had had a "wide experience of the States." But it is so easy to assume wide experience! Thus Mr. Clement Shorter recently wrote a letter to prove how unfounded is the prevalent notion that the hotels in Spain are poor. He knew, because he had just been there. In Madrid he had stayed at a fine hotel. There is another gorgeous one in Granada. In Algeciras there is the Reina Cristina. If he had stopped over at Ronda he would have found the Reina Victoria equally excellent. But what does this prove about Spain as a whole? As well affirm that the cuisine in American hotels is good simply because you had been in New York and fared sumptuously at the hands of a French chef.

CLERKS OF THE WOODS.

I.

Edward Martin Taber, a young American artist who died in 1896, never accomplished what, by every token, his sensitive and spiritual nature promised. Harassed by ill health throughout his brief life, and exiled to his "Vale of Paradise" in northern Vermont in 1887, he painted intermittently and kept a meagre journal. This journal, together with a handful of verses and extracts from his letters, has been edited by Mrs. Henry Holt and published in a handsome memorial volume illustrated by reproductions of some of his oil paintings and pencil drawings.* The impression produced by these writings is that of a fragile but brave nature tremulously responsive to the beauty of the outer world, yet never strongly impelled to re-create this beauty in forms of art. In a letter written to his sister shortly before his death, he exclaimed: "What a gift life was, not a right!" He always regarded life as a gift, to be enjoyed subtly as well as deeply; his Epicurean spirit, though overlaid with a dauntless endurance, was fundamental. Life was to him a gift of sunset, bird-song, and human friendship, rather than an opportunity to reproduce experience in color and line, or in letters.

Given the advantage of health, it is probable that Mr. Taber would have been less of the dilettante and more of the artist; enough of the artist, at all events, to have achieved distinction in painting. This "character that is an undying possession to those who knew him," in Mrs. Holt's words, was, after all, instinctively reticent, and even in the exuberance of health would doubtless have shrunk from the explicitness of literary revelation. A distinguished painter he might well have become; but certainly there is not a great deal in "Stowe Notes" that suggests literary power. The dozen poems are delicate, but not effective; the letters reflect the winning personality of the writer much too elusively; and the out-of-doors journal is disappointing. A good journal, no matter how modest the author, reveals his personality clearly. In Taber's journal, however, the temper of the writer is hardly suggested. He was inveterately Epicurean, in the finer and more spiritual sense, and his Epicureanism took the form of delight in color and line. The following extracts are only typical:

Lilac sunset sky, green sea, same value; hot Oriental-like sunset, dense ragged cloud above burning waters; black stretches of shore. . . .

A rainy outlook; heavy, moist clouds stretching gray across the sky, lifting low above the western horizon to admit a pale yellow strip of light. . . .

How beautifully Luce's Hill descends to meet the nearer ridge, the crumbling edge of its snow-fields rounding down into a blue hollow, against which is imposed the cloudy wood with its dark points of evergreen on Cady's Hill!

In these examples, description of form, which the reader can visualize with fair success, is interwoven with description of color, which can be visualized much less readily. Ordinarily, however, form is subordinated or neglected:

Shadows thrown from the belts of purple woodland are a clear light blue; where the wind has packed the snow to form a crust, the surface presents a purple or pinkish shade; the drifting snow is a yellow-white near at hand, in the distance threading the blue or purple fields with lines of golden pink. . . .

What delicate snow-tints, purple, pink, changing to a blue so clear that it becomes greenish in contrast—indeed it may be green rather than blue—I cannot tell.

Who does not linger over that human "I cannot tell," and read with relative indifference the cluttered adjectives of color? What the diarist set down with loving faithfulness results finally in a blur. Very likely these fragmentary illustrations are effective taken by themselves; but when such fragments are strung together interminably, without more than a moment's descent to the region of dogs and horses and rustic folk, or ascent to the region of "A feeling of exaltation and of loneliness crept over me," the result is at last something like confusion and disappointment. We are willing to believe that the diarist is recording sights that made his heart beat with rapture, and yet the record leaves us cold.

II.

The reason is that an Epicurean or Mr. Taber's type does not point out the human significance of nature. He enjoys, he does not seek to interpret. Now, to find human significance in nature is precisely the task of whoever writes of nature. Yet this duty of interpretation is not often directly confronted by our modern diarists and essayists. It is easy enough to describe natural beauty; it is supremely difficult to wrest meaning from nature, or, if you will, put meaning into her. Bradford Torrey, in his "Clerk of the Woods," remarked that his business was "not to be witty or wise, but simply to 'keep the records'"—which, fortunately, does not indicate his own practice. But although Torrey was both witty and wise, and rarely contented himself with keeping the records, most of our latter-day writers on nature, in their essays as well as in their journals, are persistently impersonal. They paint what they see, and often in a slapdash manner far removed from both impressionism and photographic distinctness. The air is fresh, the grass is green, the birds sing melodiously, and there's an end on 't. Like owners of large estates, they take your arm and lead you through garden and grove and valley, pointing at the beauties and talking till you are weary; and they exhibit their hoard of photographs till all the world's a fluid picture. It may be > that we love

> First when we see them painted, things we have passed
> Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see;

but when painted, not when described. In the painting the meaning shines through; in the written description the meaning is so vague that only an omnivorous reader feels repaid for his trouble. Modifying Jowett's remark about logic, one might well say that "artistic description" of nature is not literature, but a dodge.

III.

A second and allied evasion that is peculiarly popular to-day is scientific description. Just as emphasis on artistic "effects" and "values" impairs the literary value of writing about nature, so does emphasis on digitate leaves and superciliary lines. The graceful exposition of scientific fact is, of course, a legitimate procedure, but one does not think of calling it literature when the effect is wholly impersonal. In the writings of Mr. Burroughs there are long passages that are quite devoid of literary value, because they are barren of personality, although most of his work has literary value through what he happily calls an "intellectual intercourse" with nature. Rarely does he present fact as if it were blank, as if it meant nothing. Fact is related with fact, and with human life, through an intellectual warmth—never spiritual heat—that suffuses all of his better essays. In the eminently readable books of Bradford Torrey, again, there is ever present, as in the letters of Gilbert White, a charming, if not vigorous, personality, through which nature acquires a meaning that she did not wear previously. And the same may be said of all excellent nature-writing.

Ours is indeed an age of observation, and only too often does the faculty of observation prevent the operation of nobler faculties. Walt Whitman, though his catalogues show how fact hypnotized him, was not unaware of the danger. "I do not very particularly seek information," he wrote. "You must not know too much, or be too precise or scientific about birds and trees and flowers and water-craft; a certain free margin, and even vagueness—perhaps ignorant credulity—helps your enjoyment of these things." Yet he succumbed to the influence of a Mr. Whitall, "who posts me up about the stars," and basked in such a factual atmosphere as envelops the following journal entry:

The moon in her third quarter—the clusters of the Hyades and Pleiades, with the planet Mars between—in full crossing sprawl in the sky the great Egyptian X (Sirius, Procyon, and the main stars in the constellations of the Ship, the Dove, and of Orion); just north of east Boötes, and in his knee Arcturus, an hour high.

One need hardly say that it is well to be on friendly terms with Boötes and Arcturus, but to write about them, and about swamp sparrows and four-leaved loosestrife, in Whitman's manner, is unliterary and perhaps altogether futile. To the unfortunate confusion of the arts of painting and literature we have added a confusion of literature and science that is equally persistent and undesirable. A large proportion of the "nature books" that are published so abundantly to-day are crude fact thinly disguised as literature. Even in Thoreau's "Walden" (though Thoreau was essentially a literary artist rather than a naturalist), there are dreary passages composed of crude fact, reposing in the book like so many glacial boulders in a New England landscape. Thoreau's Journal, one of the dullest diaries extant, contains several entries that indicate that he, like Whitman, felt the tyranny of observation.

Under the date of November 8, 1851, for instance, is a paragraph in which he tells of Ellery Channing's infelicitous efforts to set down notes in the field:

In our walks [writes Thoreau] C. takes out his note-book sometimes and tries to write as I do, but all in vain. He soon puts it up again, or contents himself with scrawling some sketch of the landscape. Observing me still scribbling, he will say that he confines himself to the ideal, purely ideal remarks; he leaves the facts to me. Sometimes, too, he will say a little petulantly, "I am universal; I have nothing to do with the particular and the definite"— certainly a charmingly typical bit of Transcendental dialogue. Taking as a text, "he leaves the facts to me," Thoreau then enters in his Journal a defence of his attention to facts, to the particular and the definite: he, too, would fain set down something besides facts—facts should be only the frame to his pictures. Now, whoever reads the fourteen volumes of Thoreau's Journal—if any one is so untrue to his proper "genius"—cannot fail to note, first, the enormous amount of fact as compared with the amount of comment (the picture insignificant in the ponderous frame), and, secondly, the constant increase in the proportion of fact to comment as the Journal proceeds. Well might Channing leave the facts to Thoreau! Open at random any of the later volumes, and you will be reasonably sure to meet a passage such as this:

> Amelanchier bare. Viburnam nudum half fallen or more; when wet and in shade, a light crimson. Hardhack, in low ground, where it has not withered too soon, inclines to a very light scarlet. Sweet-gale is not fallen, but a very dull yellowish and scarlet. You see in woods many black (?) oak sprouts.

Compare this with an entry in Swift's "Journal to Stella"; again opening at random, you may read:

> It rained this morning, and I went to town by water; and Ford and I dined with Mr. Lewis by appointment. I ordered Patrick to bring my gown and periwig to Mr. Lewis, because I designed to go to see Lord Oxford, and so I told the dog; but he never came, though I stayed an hour longer than I appointed; so I went in my old gown, and sat with him two hours.

The difference is less a difference in diarists than in subject-matter. Who will say that the premature withering of hardhack equals in interest the fate of the gown and periwig? Patrick acting like a dog is incomparably more significant than hardhack inclining to a very light scarlet. Not that hardhack is necessarily a barren theme; it might be made significant, as is the dicksonia fern when Thoreau imputes to it "the early morning fragrance of the world, antediluvian, strength and hope imparting." It would be difficult, on the other hand, to make Patrick meaningless: even a police description would doubtless contain a phrase that our emotions would seek to dwell on, perhaps a nose inclining to a very light scarlet. Man is perennially interesting to man; nature is so only when man relates himself to her, puts purpose or meaning into her. Thus Thoreau tells us elsewhere that he has an impulse to "stroke and kiss the very sward, it is so fair"; that nature is a panacea, for men "bury poisoned sheep up to the necks in earth to take the poison out of them"; that a field might be cleared of grasshoppers by sending "a bevy of fashionably dressed ladies," in hoops and crinoline, across the field and then leaving them "to clean their skirts when they got home," a particularly good method because "the motive power is cheap"; that a remarkable sunset had little charm for him because of his absorption in thought about Captain John Brown—"so great a wrong as his fate implied overshadowed all beauty in the world." Nature here has meaning, a diversity of meanings, and we read with animation. But such comment is amazingly rare in our modern nature-writing. That Thoreau strove to free himself from the tyranny of observation is attested by the following: "I must let my senses wander as my thoughts, my eyes see without looking. . . . I have the habit of attention to such excess that my thoughts get no rest, but suffer from a constant strain." One could not desire a better statement of the error of Thoreau and of many of his followers. But the remedy is not easily discovered; he continues: "Be not preoccupied with looking. Go not to the object; let it come to you. When I have found myself ever looking down and confining my gaze to the flowers, I have thought it might be well to get into the habit of observing the clouds as a corrective; but no! that study would be just as bad." Yet so ingrained was Thoreau's habit of close observation that in his next entry he does no more than record the weather and set down tentatively, as the name of a plant on Emerson's muck-heap in the Turnpike, Amaranthus hypochondriacus!

How many of the followers of Thoreau have the habit of attention to such excess that their thoughts get no rest! In the case of not a few of them, one might be uncharitable enough to remark that they have no thoughts, and could have none anywhere, and so might as well go to the object and proceed to tell us that they saw it. That may have an educational, if not literary, justification. But those who would think might profitably combat, and not woo, the habit of attention. The thinking man, however much he may enjoy nature, however the beauty of the external world may be woven into the texture of his thought, usually shuns nature when he desires to think. Goethe's bare little room in his Weimar garden-house serves admirably as a symbol of the kind of relation between man and nature that a wise man chooses to establish.

There are others, however, whose thoughts are rather moods, who do not find in "nature and the language of the sense" substance to be wrought into form, but a shifting spectacle, as delightful as mystifying; who, neither having nor seeking the equipment of the professional author, are satisfied when they devote their best hours to delight in the external world. Such a person was Taber, who is, after all, to be judged, not as a writer of books, but as a fine, high-dreaming soul seeking comfort in all elusive charms. There he found both peace and incitement, and also, one must think, something of the old sad suspicion that nature is tempting and taunting us even when we feel most dearly related to her. But it is venturesome to say what Taber found in nature, since his spirit, as reflected in the casual, glancing notes of his Vermont journal, is always tantalizingly evasive. Of only one thing can we be sure: that in him the noble and the frail were once more conjoined.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Mr. Arundell Esdaile, of the British Museum, has compiled, and the Bibliographical Society has issued, as one of their publications for the year 1912, a "List of English Tales and Prose Romances printed Before 1740." It might have been called a "Bibliography" instead of a "List," though collations are not given except in a few cases where necessary to distinguish editions. The work is in two parts, the first extending from Caxton to 1642, and the second bringing the record down to 1740. This latter date was chosen, because the year 1740 saw the publication of Richardson's "Pamela," which has been called by numerous critics the "first English novel." This Catalogue contains, as the compiler remarks, a "substantial list of English novels which preceded the first."

Mr. Esdaile takes pride in the fact that the first book printed in the English language, Lefevre's "Recuyell of the Histories of Troye" (Bruges: Caxton, 1475), finds place in his list, also that Caxton so well judged the taste of his reading public as to print not less than eleven books which can be called romances, or, as we should say, fiction. Besides the Troye book, these are the "History of Jason," "Godfrey of Bouillon," "Reynard the Fox," "The Pilgrimage of the Soul," Æsop, Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," "Charles the Great," "Paris and Vienne," "Blanchardine and Eglantine," "The Four Sons of Aymon," and a prose condensation of the "Æniad." He wonders why Caxton did not print an edition of Mandeville's "Ways to the Holy Land," and surmises that possibly he did and that all copies are lost. Wynken de Worde printed the first edition of Mandeville, "The Three Kings of Cologne," "Robert the Devil," "Helyas," "The Seven Wise Masters," and others. Some of these earliest romances were very popular and were frequently reissued by later printers.

The earliest book of novels was Painter's "Palace of Pleasure" (1566), followed by Fenton's "Tragical Discourses" (1567), Guicciardini's "Garden of Pleasure" (1573), and Pettie's "Pallace of Pleasure" (1576). One of the most popular books seems to have been Thomas Deloney's "The Gentle Craft," "shewing what famous men have been Shoomakers in time past in this Land," some twenty-four editions being recorded between 1598 and 1737. Of "The Seven Champions of Christendom," twenty-six editions and abridgments are recorded between 1596 and 1738.

The second part describes the writings of Bunyan, Defoe, and Swift, and this volume will be the one consulted for lists of editions of "The Pilgrim's Progress," "Robinson Crusoe," and "Gulliver's Travels," although the lists of editions of pieces which failed to achieve position as classics, being new work, will be of greater value to students.

The location of one copy of each edition in one of the larger libraries in England is noted, when possible the British Museum. If the British Museum is not mentioned, the reader may infer that it contains no copy of the work mentioned.

Correspondence

AN ESKIMO ARTIST.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: About twenty years ago, while incidentally engaged in procuring ethnological objects for the Smithsonian Institution, I noted among miscellaneous Eskimo carvings from the Nushagak district of Alaska the presence of sundry articles wanting in the formalism which, combined with truth to nature, characterizes Eskimo carvings of animals in general. These special articles were small, three or four inches in length at most, for the single figure, and comprised birds, dogs, seals, foxes, men driving a sledge with a team of five Eskimo dogs, and dance houses or Kashimi, of which the roof could be lifted off, revealing in the interior a set of dancers in the middle and an audience in various postures on the benches against the walls. The figures were cut from the soft fine-grained white spruce wood of the country, and were rarely touched with color.

These figures were artistic to a surprising degree; the attitudes of the dogs in a team differ each from the others; the spirit and naturalness of the expression of each figure surpassed anything I have ever seen of native origin. Truly, here was the work of a real artist free from conventionalism.

For years I endeavored to find out the individual carver, but with no success, learning only that the carvings came from one of the purely native Eskimo villages near the Nushagak River. These articles with the decline of the trade in furs had become a part of the trader's commerce and were sold as "curios." Specimens of the work of the particular artist I have reference to are to be found in the Museum established by the late Dr. Sheldon Jackson at Sitka, in the collection given to the University of California by the Alaska Commercial Company some years ago; and in the collection of the National Museum at Washington there are some remarkably fine pieces, a few of which are tinted with native pigments.

Two years ago a friend was appointed to an official post in the Nushagak district, and before he started I explained what I wished to know and begged him to search for me. The first year no important data were obtained. This year, however, I received a letter of which an extract follows:

Since my return here this spring I have made some more inquiries about the carver you spoke of. Acting upon your suggestion, I have interviewed several old women, and from one I learned that the man you refer to doubtless was named Constantine Ky-yuk-suk. He was a resident of Ekuk, a village twelve miles below Nushagak proper. By referring to his name I have been able to find others who have heard their parents tell stories of the old man. These stories are to the effect that he was an old man at the time he did his carving. He was looked down upon by all his people because he would sit around and whittle through the summer, instead of putting up fish. He was regarded as a little bit crazy by all.

When asked why, the little old woman who gave me his name, said it was because he did not make his animals right. She said his seal and walrus looked exactly like these animals, but they were not like the pictures and carvings his forefathers made, and so they were not considered equal to what any of the other natives could make.

It seems he whittled merely for his own amusement and he worked both wood and ivory. The Russian, Cassin, at Nushagak who was in the old trading post there does not remember the man as distinct from the other natives. He says all the natives used to make carvings. I endeavored to find out when the carver died, but as none of the natives in this section are able to figure years yet, I could learn nothing more definite than "a long time ago." The natives here are the least progressive ones I have seen. They still live in underground huts and eat rotten fish.

Artists the world over will recognize the fate of the innovator, in the attitude of his fellows towards the carver, who would rather carve than put up fish, and broke away from the conventions of his forefathers in art.

CATHOLICISM AND THE ROMAN HIERARCHY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent of July 24, "G. H.," says that he is a Catholic who sends his son to a public school; that many of the boy's schoolmates are Catholics; that many of his teachers have been Catholics, and furthermore that he himself believes in "our" public-school system.

It has been my good fortune to know many Catholics who held this opinion and conformed their practice to it in greater or less degree. I was once a member of the Board of Education in a large city where eleven of my fellow-members, more than one-fifth of the entire body, were Catholics. I have never thought that these men were there for any other purpose than to serve the public schools to the best of their ability. It was a pleasure to work with them to that end. Nor was there any evidence that they thought themselves in a false position. And yet they were acting in flagrant opposition to the commands of the church.

But "G. H." not only sends his boy to a public school; he also avows himself "utterly opposed to a union of church and state," and adds that he has "not been forbidden by the church to hold these views." Certainly an amazing statement.

In his Encyclical Letter, Quanta cura, dated December 8, 1864, with its accompanying Syllabus of Errors, containing eighty distinct, numbered sections, Pius IX expressly and specifically "reprobates, proscribes, and condemns," among others, the very opinions which "G. H." says he has not been forbidden by the church to hold. This Encyclical, with its Syllabus, is an elaborate arraignment and condemnation of about everything that distinguishes modern civilization from the most barbaric period of the Middle Ages. "G. H." ought to read it carefully, especially sections, 45, 47, and 48, which relate to public schools, and section 55, relating to the separation of church and state.

The position of the Roman Curia has not changed in any respect concerning the matters covered by this famous document. Did not Leo XIII warn American Catholics that the Government of the United States is imperfect on account of its policy of the separation of church and state? And did not the present Pontiff, Pius X, in his Encyclical, Vehementer nos, addressed to the French people, declare in so many words, "that church and state should be separated is a most false and in the highest degree pernicious doctrine"? Yet, notwithstanding all this, "G. H." says he believes that "a great majority of American Catholics" share his views. If this be so, there is promise in the fact.

One thing more I think it opportune to say—it is high time that Protestant speakers and writers should stop their indiscriminate condemnation of Catholics, stop confounding all Catholics with the Roman hierarchy. While I, too, am "utterly opposed" to the whole papal system from beginning to end, this does not blind me to the momentous fact that the Catholic religion and Catholic forms of worship evidently meet the spiritual needs of millions of my fellow-men. I deeply sympathize with those who are silently but surely breaking away from papal control, as well as with those who are openly and stubbornly protesting against the ghastly anachronism that rules in the Vatican. If with the passing of the present Pope the papacy itself should lapse, and the whole Curia Romana should melt into thin air, it would be an inestimable blessing for every Catholic community on earth, and rid the world of what is at once a menace and a disgrace to modern civilization.

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As I am collecting material for a supplement to the late Mrs. Paget Toynbee's edition of the "Letters of Horace Walpole," published by the Clarendon Press at Oxford, may I through your columns appeal to owners of letters not included in that edition kindly to supply me with copies, for publication in the supplement? I need hardly say that due acknowledgment would be made. I have had the promise already of a certain number of letters, and as it is very unlikely that another supplement can be published for many years to come, I am anxious to obtain as many as possible on the present occasion. Among those sought for are a series of eleven letters written to King between the years 1759 and 1787; a letter addressed to Mrs. Horace Churchill, dated February, 1789, and a letter dated September 25, 1793.

"THOSE MOLASSES"—FINIS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: When I was a very little boy, I was a favorite of an ambitious young clerk in a store in the village near which I was born (in eastern Virginia). While my father, who was a lawyer, was in the court house, this friend used to set me upon the counter, regale me with bon-bons, and give me good advice, the affectionate sincerity of which I have never forgotten. One day a negro girl came in and said, "Mr. ———, my mistis wants a pint of that same molasses." When she was gone, my friend said: "Edward, see that poor ignorant girl! She should have said, 'A point of those molasses.' I hope you will study your lessons well at school and never forget the value of a good education."

THE "UNITY" OF ENGLISH AND AMERICANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the issue of the Nation for July 17, in the review of Mr. Bryce's book, "University and Historical Addresses," there appear these words: "His is the argument of a scholar, an historian, a jurist discovering for the layman the deep and radical unity of the two peoples in their common blood and ancestry, in their heroes and their institutions, in their energy," etc. The italics are mine. Now it seems to me, your reviewer has allowed himself to be carried away by his high regard for James Bryce and his admiration for the deep insight of this gentleman into our institutions. I hold, however, that there is today no proof of "radical unity" between the virtually homogeneous, set, and conservative people of the British Isles, and the conglomerate of races, characters, and wills of our own country, where all seem groping forward towards an as yet unrevealed future.

The "community of blood," too, which is adduced by this writer, never existed except theoretically, and the "radical unity" claimed did not prevent our waging two wars with Great Britain nor spare us the dread possibility of a third, during the dark days of our Civil War when we were smarting under the ill-disguised animosity of Great Britain while fighting for the cause of liberty and enlightenment.

Yet in the face of these experiences there is going on, of late, a glorification in some quarters of things English, and there is an effusive display of friendship for this people which cannot but call forth some strong resentment on the part of other nationalities making up our population.

The conviction that the matter of our courting the friendship of the "cousins" of our Anglo-Saxon element is pushed too far was certainly the main cause of the disruption, a year or so ago, of the great peace meeting at Cooper Union, under the leadership of Dr. Koelble, and it has contributed materially towards swelling to the two-million mark the membership of the National German-American Alliance.

THE ENGLISH COLONIES.

The Old Colonial System, 1660-1754. By George Louis Beer. Part I: The Establishment of the System, 1660-1688. In two volumes. New York: The Macmillan Co. $4 net.

Mr. Beer, having treated the era of inchoate beginnings in a volume issued in 1908, embracing the period from 1578 to 1660, and the transitional years preceding the American Revolution in an earlier volume issued in 1907, embracing the period from 1754 to 1765, now enters on his task of dealing with the intermediate years from 1660 to 1754 in a series of six volumes. The first two carry the subject to the year 1688. After having solved with considerable success the intricate problem of origins and threaded his way with skill through the mazes of pre-Revolutionary controversy which have perplexed so many students of the period, he undertakes the simpler but no less important task of analyzing and describing the "establishment, development, and operation of the British colonial system from the days of its formal creation down to the period leading to its disintegration." His theme is the "Colonial System," which he interprets as a "complex system of regulations whose fundamental aim was to create a self-sufficient commercial empire of mutually complementary economic parts."

It is a question open to discussion whether he is justified in using the term "Colonial System" in so restricted a sense. "British Colonial Policy" is one thing and "British Colonial System" is another, and the two cannot be deemed synonymous terms. In the development and operation of the system political relations were quite as important as were those that were commercial and economic, and we cannot be wholly content with a treatment that limits itself almost entirely to the British commercial and fiscal scheme and to the administrative machinery that was called into existence for the purpose of carrying into effect the measures laid down for its enforcement. Such a treatment should be described by a more qualified title. The danger lies in the excessive stress laid on but one aspect of the colonial problem and in the undue prominence given to phases of colonial history that cannot be explained on economic grounds only. Mr. Beer has laid bare a fundamentally significant and essential part of the colonial system, but he has not allowed the reader to see how intimately bound up that system was with other parts equally significant and essential.

The plan of treatment here adopted is as follows: The first volume deals with the colonial policy of the period, the laws of trade and navigation and imperial defence, the English fiscal system and imperial finances, the central and local machinery, and the place of the slave trade in the general scheme. The second volume, carrying the reader from England to America, describes the operation of the commercial regulations in each of the colonies, beginning with Barbados and the Leeward Islands, and continuing through Jamaica, Virginia, Maryland, the Carolinas, and Newfoundland, to Massachusetts and the Dominion of New England. Very little is said of the Jerseys and Pennsylvania, probably because of their slight commercial importance in the period before 1688, and New York is treated, briefly, in the chapter devoted to New England. Valuable as these volumes are in presenting a detailed and accurate picture of the conditions under which England gave form to her colonial and commercial ideas and of the actual working out of these ideas in the colonies themselves, they are less novel in the facts presented and opinions expressed than were the volumes previously issued. Much has been written already on the period; more, indeed, than Mr. Beer's references would lead the unsuspecting reader to believe, and more aids to the execution of the work have been prepared than Mr. Beer's bibliography discloses, and though the wealth of accumulated detail gives to the volumes a special value of their own, the conclusions are in many cases hardly different from those already reached.

At the same time the fulness of presentation, the vigorous manner with which Mr. Beer has handled the many problems involved, and the understanding which he has shown of the spirit of the times with which he is concerned give to the work a place of preëminence among other similar writings on the period. In a number of important respects the treatment has no predecessor. All that is said regarding England's early efforts to furnish the colonies with military and naval protection, regarding customs duties, the 4½ per cent. and other royal revenues, and regarding the slave trade, is new, and forms a contribution of first importance to the history of the subject. Much the same can be said of the commercial and economic history of Newfoundland and the West Indies, phases of colonial life that have been largely ignored in the past. Then, too, quite apart from the relative merits of individual chapters, is the greater merit arising from the treatment of the subject as a whole, in which the general and the particular are so brought together and welded into a single scheme of commercial control that the reader can discern without difficulty the essential unity of the many parts and can determine the place of each colony in the general system. One of the most important conclusions, reached by virtue of this detached and scholarly method of dealing with the subject, concerns the place of Massachusetts just before the loss of the charter in 1684:

> The position of the colony [says Mr. Beer] was wholly untenable. The policy of its leaders was fatuous, as its logical conclusion was either the abrogation of the charter or the severance of all political ties with England; and the colony was prepared to accept neither of these alternatives. . . . Massachusetts was satisfied to remain within the Empire, but while claiming all the privileges of a colony, disavowed and disregarded most of the complementary duties and obligations. It was this anomalous situation that inevitably brought about the revocation of the charter.

In another particular Mr. Beer's point of view is noteworthy. Rejecting as "dangerous and well-nigh incurable" the "tendency to infer subjectively that, because men of the present day would have found a system insufferably restrictive, their predecessors, living several hundred years before under radically different social and intellectual conditions, must necessarily also have done so," he approaches the navigation acts in the following fair-minded spirit of interpretation:

> Such a system of rigid control over the commerce of dependent communities was the current practice of all colonizing nations. It necessarily implied the subordination of the colony's economic interests to those of the metropolis, and as a result, in theory at least, if not always fully in practice, it is repugnant to modern economic, political, and ethical ideas. But these modern ideas are largely the result of changed conditions and were totally inapplicable in the seventeenth century, when they would have seemed, and correctly so, merely the vagaries of an unpractical utopian out of touch with the forces that were making history. . . . It would have been deemed the height of folly to leave colonial trade unfettered and to allow foreign rivals to reap where England had sown and where she was still obliged to expend considerable energy in preventing the intrusion of lawless marauders and well-organized enemies. The system was by no means one-sided, and did not appear to be so to the men of the day. As compensation for the restrictions on the trade of the colonies, England protected them and gave such of their products as were needed and wanted the monopoly of the home market.

When we attempt to imagine older historians, Bancroft or even Winsor, committing themselves to such a view of the navigation acts and of England's reason for adopting them, we realize how far removed we are from the days of those who stand in the popular estimation as the great interpreters of our history. And this change of attitude has come about largely through an honest desire on the part of younger American writers to deal with American history as a subject for exact and careful scholarship in the broadest sense of the term, and not as an object lesson for the encouragement of patriotic virtues.

Mr. Beer's work is not free from errors, but such as are to be found are comparatively trifling. Spellings such as "Quarry" and "Phipps," incorrect titles such as "Secretary of the Admiralty" (Pepys), "Auditor General of the Colonies" (Blathwayt), and "London Record Office," are not serious mistakes. Less defensible is Mr. Beer's wasted expenditure of five pages in the task of refuting Fiske's contention that Bacon's uprising was "In part, at least, against the laws of trade and navigation"; and still more blameworthy is his reversion to the old classification of the colonies, as royal, proprietary, and charter, based on the nature of their internal political organization, when the superficial and inaccurate character of such classification has been demonstrated for many years.

CURRENT FICTION.

The White Hound. By Frances Forbes-Robertson. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

The questioning of old moral standards which has become so common a note of fiction takes in this story a rather unusual form. Various crimes are committed by persons with whom we are led to sympathize. The heroine's father, a fine unworldly old scholar, defrauds a life insurance company by suicide in order that his family may continue to live in the comfort to which they have been accustomed. The rightness of suicide is not even questioned; the rightness of the fraud is questioned only to be asserted. The heroine herself is a girl with a sort of double personality; and the reader is skilfully carried into the mood to sympathize with a deed of shocking violence which she commits in her second person. But the circumstances of both these acts are unusual, and the perpetrators might be excused on the theory of the license of genius. Very well, the writer seems to say, I will represent and defend a perfectly sordid and commonplace crime: that of a seduced servant girl who kills her illegitimate child. Poor Phoebe is exonerated at some length. "Phoebe loved, and in loving shed immortal light on things human for the moment of her passing—that torture and the cross were to be hers, is the mystery that surrounds all beauty." The mystery, one is tempted to say, lies not in the facts, but in the author's attitude towards them.

But this is only one phase of the book. The chief interest is in the character of the heroine, with her wayward frankness, her charm, and her strange transformations. The illusory white hound, into which at times she seems to be metamorphosed, symbolizes one side of her nature. Only in the sheer animal delight of racing over the moors is she able to find respite from the terrible knowledge of her father's sacrifice—a knowledge which she cannot share with her mother and sisters. She is in constant rebellion against their kindly and narrow conventionalism, as it appears, for instance, in the dismissal of the seduced kitchen-maid. A rather perfunctory love affair concludes the story.

A Superman in Being. By Litchfield Woods. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co.

The hero is a blind historian, Professor Snaggs. We are asked to accept him as a superman for three reasons: first, he constantly tells us that he is one—"the universe has produced me, and I am not so foolish as to expect it to do any better"; secondly, he has seduced his stenographer, a girl of twenty-two; thirdly, he persuades her lover to marry her in the full knowledge of this. The Professor himself attends the wedding and most appropriately gives away the bride. It is presumed that they all live happily ever afterward. Besides being a superman, the Professor is a terrible bore. He talks through chapter after chapter, with a labored pseudo-brilliance which shows considerable familiarity with Oscar Wilde. "This dominating, brilliant, perverse, subtle, humorous, paradoxical, and ebullient" hero is made to stick more fiery off by contrast with the extraordinary stupidity of his associates, Mr. Drannle, who plays a sort of Dr. Watson to his Sherlock Holmes, and Richard Densume, the stenographer's lover. The unconscious burlesque is sometimes amusing. It is evidently the work of a singularly innocent and moderately clever young man, who, having well steeped his mind in decadent literature, has resolved to write a novel. Perhaps he can best be described in his own words as "conversant with many ideas without a correspondent mastery of those facts of human life which had given them birth."

The Right of the Strongest. By Frances Nimmo Greene. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The conflict between the old and the new in the Georgia mountains furnishes both theme and background for this story. We are introduced to a community of mountain whites struggling for its life against dispossession at the hands of John Marshall, a bold and enterprising young capitalist who wishes to turn the valley into a great reservoir for the development of electric power. He meets with an unexpected obstacle when he falls in love with the school teacher, Mary Elizabeth Dale, a native of the valley, who has been educated by a philanthropist in order that she may help her people. She is in love with Marshall, but will give up neither her work nor her opposition to his plan. He on his side will not relinquish the project, though to save her from slander and to give her standing among the mountaineers he allows her to reveal it before it is carried through. Apparently defeated by this, he yet remains, at the risk of his life, because he believes that she still needs protection. The story is unfolded in a series of dramatic situations to an unusually satisfactory conclusion. The characters, not excepting the hero and heroine, are strongly presented. Mary Elizabeth is a very real and lovable girl; Marshall is an excellent specimen of the best type of promoter, resolute, farseeing, chivalrous, but blinded by the modern superstition of progress. Of the mountaineers, "Trav" Williams and the admirably named Shan Thaggin represent the worse element, and "Uncle Beck" Logan, the philosopher-storekeeper, is the fine flower. Many of Uncle Beck's sayings deserve quotation, but we have space for only two. He has been telling the loafers at the store about the sale of some groceries to Marshall's conceited servant. "After I had done got all his money, I up and says, says I, 'Sonny, you have got a 'complishment what I ain't never met up with before—you air the fust mortal man I ever see what could strut settin' down.'" On another occasion, ridin' by meetin' with Darius Slaton, he remarked: "Ri, ol' Sister Thaggin's done treed the Lord agin; don't you hear her yelpin'?" Altogether this is a strong and well-balanced novel, free from the taint of hysteria which so often weakens stories of its type.

The Air Pilot. By Randall Parrish. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

The reader who looks forward to a story of adventure in cloudland will be disappointed, for the "air-piloting" is confined to a single short flight. Except for this, the famous Dessaud monoplane might as well have been a machine gun. The story is really one of improbable international complications, similar but inferior to some of the yarns of E. Phillips Oppenheim. Lieut. Dessaud has brought to America for exhibition his new monoplane, which has a virtually soundless motor. Col. Brandt, of the German secret service, plots to kidnap the aviator and learn the secret. He bribes a German editor to help him, and the editor uses as a decoy a reporter, who is, of course, a pretty American girl. Is it necessary to add that Helen tries to help Dessaud, but gets him deeper into trouble; that she is threatened with dishonor and he with torture, and that the monoplane saves them and smooths the path of true love? The only remarkable thing in the story is the power of abstraction which enables the lovers to hold long and intimate conversations at times when to all appearances only the promptest action can save them from disaster.

ASSYRIAN NAMES.

Personal Names from Cuneiform Inscriptions of the Cassite Period. By Albert T. Clay. Yale Oriental Series. Vol. I. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2 net.

The study of proper names occurring in the Cuneiform literature of Babylonia and Assyria is one of the most important branches of Assyriology, throwing light on the prevailing religious ideas and on historical conditions as well. We have tolerably complete lists of such names for the older period of Babylonian history and for the latest—the so-called neo-Babylonian period—but for some of the middle periods, notably for the six centuries (c. 1750-1173 B. C.) during which Cassite rulers occupied the throne of Babylonia, such lists were lacking. Professor Clay has now filled the most important of these gaps by his compilation of more than 10,000 names occurring chiefly in business and legal documents of the Cassite period. Professor Clay was preeminently the person to furnish scholars with such a list, by virtue of his publication of no less than three large volumes of texts from the days of the Cassite rulers. These volumes form the basis for the work before us, as they comprise our chief source of study of the social, religious, and political conditions during the six centuries in question. In addition to published texts, Professor Clay has also availed himself of unpublished material in the collections of the University of Pennsylvania, and of the General Theological Seminary of New York, and has utilized also the hundreds of names occurring in the famous Amarna letters. Lastly, distinctly historical texts and names occurring in seal cylinders have been drawn upon to make the compilation represent a complete survey of the material at present at our disposal. But Dr. Clay has done far more than merely to compile a list. He has made a thorough study of these names, dividing them up into the elements of which they are composed.

The study of these elements is particularly instructive. A name in Babylonia, as throughout early antiquity, was much more than a convenient appellation. It belonged to an individual as a part of his equipment, and in many cases was regarded as too sacred to be used on all occasions, so that in addition to his real name an individual generally had some less solemn sobriquet by which he was known, often chosen to emphasize some physical peculiarity or distinction, and invariably briefer than the real name used on official occasions, and which, in most cases, formed a complete sentence with subject, object, and verb, though the third element in very many cases was omitted. An invariable element in the case of a person's full designation was the name of some deity, by the introduction of which the name became a prayer, or an expression of some hope, or praise of some deity. Thus, a name which has as one of its elements the moon-god, Sin, invokes Sin, directly or indirectly. "O Sin, protect the son," "Sin is gracious," "Sin grants life," "Sin has given a brother," "Sin is the Lord," "Sin has hearkened to me," and so on. We are reminded, of course, of Biblical names where we find similar combinations with the names of the Hebrew deities, El Jah, and Jeho, while the explanations so often attached to the names point to a further agreement in the ideas associated with the divine element among Hebrews and Babylonians. Thus, when Rachel is represented as explaining the name of her son, Joseph, as "Jahweh has given me another son," it is precisely parallel to a Babylonian or Assyrian name like Sin-akh-erba, "Sin has added a brother," or to Ashur-akh-iddin, "Ashur has given a brother." The explanation, in fact, points to the full name of Joseph having been something like Jeho-ben-asaph, of which Joseph is an abbreviation—a sort of pet-name or hypokoristikon, to use the forbidding technical term.

In the case of Babylonian-Assyrian names, while some of the deities occur in all periods, others are particularly prominent at certain epochs. Thus, in the neo-Babylonian period, names compounded with Nebo and Marduk far outnumbered the rest, which is in accord with the almost exclusive devotion given to these two deities in Babylonia during the sixth century, though, to be sure, other gods were still worshipped in the old temples erected in their honor. During the Cassite period, as we now learn from Professor Clay's important contribution, we find Enlil (or El-lil), the chief god of Nippur and the head of the older Babylonian pantheon, entering more frequently as an element in proper names than any other, and next to Ellil is a deity whose name has occasioned considerable discussion, though the weight of evidence is now in favor of the form Enmashtu, proposed by Professor Clay.

In the survey of the names compounded with Enlil it is interesting to group together some of the attributes and hopes associated with this chief deity. Enlil is represented as "creating," "taking care of," "protecting," "judging," "giving," "granting life," "establishing," "completing," "hearing." A name, Enlil-nûr-gabba, celebrates him as "Enlil, the universal light"—a close approach to "The Light of the World"; another as "Enlil is my help," "Enlil is our mountain" (shadû-ni), which recalls the famous El-Shaddai, one of the early designations given to the Hebrew deity in the Bible, and which may be rendered as "el is the mountain," i. e., the mighty one. The divine name does not necessarily stand as the first element; frequently it occupies the second place. So we find a series of names beginning with iz-kur, "he has proclaimed," followed by the name of a god, Izkur-Addu, "Addu proclaims," "Izkur-Ea," "Ea proclaims," and another series beginning with the iddin, "he has given." In fact, no less than twenty-five deities are associated with this element, which thus incidentally furnishes us with a survey of the chief gods of the pantheon of the Cassite period.

Instead of gods, the names of temples dedicated to them are substituted. Thus, the name of Enlil's temple in Nippur, E-kur, signifying "mountain-house," appears as an element in E-kur-nadin-shum, "E-kur has given an offspring" where E-kur clearly stands as the equivalent to Enlil; or the names of stars take the place of the deities with which they were identified, as, e. g., in Dilbat-bani, "Dilbat creates," Dilbat, the planet Venus, identified with Ishtar, here standing for that goddess. We also come across such names as Kakkab-Ea, "star of Ea," from which or from a simila combination, a name like Kakkabâ, "star-like," is an abbreviation with an endearing element attached, such as a lover might apply to his sweetheart. Professor Clay has added largely to the usefulness of his work by adding a complete list of elements occurring in the names with careful references.

Through this list, the rather curious fact is revealed that during the Cassite period names containing the element ilu, "god"—the equivalent of the Hebrew El—without further qualification, are very common. Indeed, the number of such names with ilu as the first or second or third element outnumber all other formations. This points to a development of religious thought not unlike that which may be traced among the Hebrews. No doubt, ilu always refers in the Babylonian names to some specific deity, but so does the Hebrew El always indicate Jahweh as a specific deity. The important point is, that among Babylenians and Hebrews the chief deity becomes the "god" par excellence—"god" without further qualification, which represents a step eventually leading to a monotheistic conception of divine government.

Lastly, a feature that is particularly prominent in names of the Cassite period is the large number of foreign names and of names containing foreign deities as one of the elements. Naturally, a large proportion of such foreign deities are Cassitic; and, as a matter of fact, the chief personages of the Cassite pantheon pass in review before us in this nomenclature. Through these names, many words of the Cassite language, as yet little known to us, are revealed. Still more interesting are the large number of foreign names that lead us to the Hittite regions in northern Syria and in central Asia Minor. Dr. Clay groups these names under the designation of Hittite-Mitannian. For the present, it is not possible to differentiate sharply between such as are Hittite and those that belong to a region in northeastern Syria, known as Mitanni. It is not unlikely that the Mitannians belonged to one of the Hittite groups. In this connection our author raises the question whether the Khabiri, who play an important rôle in the Amarna letters dealing with affairs in southern Palestine during the fifteenth century, and who have been identified with the Hebrews, do not belong to the Hittite-Mitannian groups. In favor of this view is the fact that we find among the Hittite-Mitanni names a number which contain the element Khabiri, and it is also of significance that on a tablet of Boghaz-köi—the site of the capital of the Hittite Empire—in northern Asia Minor the "gods of Khabiri" are mentioned. If Dr. Clay's contention is correct, most important conclusions would follow, especially if it also turns out that these Khabiri are indeed the same as the Ibri or Hebrews to which Abraham belongs. Abraham finds Hittites in southern Palestine, for such the sons of Heth undoubtedly are, from whom Abraham buys the cave of Machpelah. This region appears, therefore, at a very early period to have contained Hittite groups, and the question arises whether the Hebrews may not have been at least affiliated with some of these Hittites, as the prophet Ezekiel, in fact, suggests. However, we know so little as to who the Hittites were, what language they spoke, and whence they came, that for some time to come all speculations on the subject must be more or less tentative. Meanwhile, Yale University is to be congratulated on inaugurating its series of Oriental publications with a volume that sets so high a standard for the ones to follow.

The New China: A Traveller's Impressions. By Henri Borel. Translated from the Dutch by C. Thieme. With 48 illustrations. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50.

M. Borel is an official Chinese interpreter in the Dutch East Indies who has made the standard translation of the Confucian Classics into his native tongue. He made his first journey to the capital of China in 1909, surcharged with reverence for its ancient ideals and eager to derive the essence of a national soul beneath the scrap-heap that is left of its former wisdom and beauty. "The chief object of my book," he declares, "is to avail myself of the poet's right to give a chain of personal and subjective impressions and to describe how I felt the tragic death of ancient beauty, overpowered by all that is ugly and vulgar in modern things." Here is a scholar who, after years of residence among Chinese, confesses that he never discovered the soul of the people until he visited the mistreated temples of that shabby old city upon which has been poured the scorn of thousands of unseeing trippers from the West.

As an interpreter of modern China he cannot be acquitted of some exaggeration. All that is vulgar and impious in the present aspect of her society must not be ascribed to foreign influence. There was a wider gap than he is willing to acknowledge between the spiritual conceptions which once controlled that society and the selfish materialism which obtained when the foreigners first arrived. A pride of learning remains, but it is overlaid with formalism and must be accounted unproductive since no priest or statesman in a century has arisen to direct any effective reform or guide his countrymen to new aspects of truth or religion. That Young China at present derives all its inspiration from abroad is in itself a proof that the "ancient eternal essence" of her intellectual life is so jejune as to be sterile. Yet the movement towards the formation of a conscious nation is already well begun, and a resurgent China may in the future find her way back to some, at least, of that antique loveliness which the author laments as dying a tragic death in the dawn of her new day.

Though calling his book a discussion of modern China, M. Borel is not compellingly lured from the monuments of the past to considerations of political and economic conditions. The "call of the East" is strong upon him, and it is a mediæval, not a modern, East that calls. As an artistic appreciation of the temples of Peking his volume should be welcomed by intelligent tourists, whose elementary education in the meaning of Chinese art is seldom even begun. Taken in connection with a few descriptions of the city, such as those of Dr. Edkins and Mrs. Little, it ought to serve as a useful guide—though this is perhaps the last desire of the æsthetic author whose scorn is often voided upon the globe-trotter. However, there is work to be done with this class in Peking as in Paris or Rome, and some few of them can always be educated out of their smug preconceptions. They may cavil at the author's recurring insistence upon the "mystical and esoteric" meanings discovered in old monuments, but these are to be found even in the dilapidated buildings of Peking, if sought for in the right spirit. Here is his plea for a more appreciative attitude in the visitor to the Lama Temple, notorious for its train of truculent priests, the disorderly scum of their order:

> That besides these wretched mendicant friars there are others who pass their life in prayer and meditation; that there is in this temple a library of incalculable philosophical value, full of rare works on esoteric and exoteric Buddhism—all this they do not consider. Nor do they dream it possible that the so-called huo fo, the "Living Buddha," who dwells there invisible to the outer world, might be a spiritually advanced being, highly developed by some mystical initiation. Nor do they know that Eastern music possesses more delicate shades and finer gradations of sound and vibration than the whole and half-notes of our Western scales. The consequence is that the unpracticed or shallow Westerner, unable to discern these more subtle differences of tone and more finely divided vibrations, declares Eastern music to be discordant and unbearable. Nor does such a one understand that Eastern orchestras, as, for example, the Javanese gamelang, use different pitches and rhythms for the morning, daytime, evening, or night, because the vibrations of the ether also differ. After all, is this not the case with all beauty, be it that of line, color, or sound?

One gets from these pages an altogether new conception of a China redolent with subtle emanations and odors beneath the rather grimy exterior of work-a-day life seen by most casual visitors.

The first edition of G. Harvey Johnston's "Scottish Heraldry" was published in 1904, and the reissue of the book now, with revisions and considerable additions, by Scribners, shows that the spirit of the clans is still alive. Any one of Scottish ancestry will find his own account in the book, but we may recommend it also as a very clear exposition of heraldry in general—a difficult subject. There are many illustrations in proper colors.

To the picaresque section of Dutton's Library of Early Novelists has been added Smollett's lively version of "Gil Blas." The introduction, by W. M. Fullerton, undertakes to explain how Lesage used, and transcended, the picaresque form to give a survey of the whole of life. Smollett's English has not the fineness and swiftness of the French, but the Bishop of Granada and Dr. Sangrado play their immortal parts here as in the original, and the interest and wisdom of the story are immortal in any tongue.

The University of Manchester (Longmans) issues, as the fourth number of its English Series, "The Early Life of George Eliot," by Mary H. Deakin, M.A. Prof. C. H. Herford in an Introductory Note calls attention to it as an essay in the direction of M. Emile Legouis's study of Wordsworth's youth. He, says Professor Herford, may be said to have established "the adolescence of genius" as a distinct study. Relatively little stress has been laid hitherto upon the girlhood and early womanhood of George Eliot. The work for which she is remembered was done in middle age, and her biographers have been too intent upon it and its maker as native products to do more than hint at the early conditions and experiences from which both sprang. "Many readers of George Eliot's works," says Miss Deakin, "look on her as a woman of strong, massive, independent nature, and are entirely unfamiliar with the loneliness and pain of the long years in which she lay "inert and suffering, craving for support and encouragement, and fearing that no meaning and no good would ever grow out of her life." In girlhood her strength of mind and feeling wreaked itself on questions of religious belief. From the quiet conformity of her family she swung first to a violent Evangelicalism, and later to free-thinking. In the earlier phase she went to extremes of asceticism, denied herself the simplest pleasures, and painfully followed rules of living which were naturally distasteful to her and which she later saw to be false. Her release from the bondage of Calvinism brought intellectual peace, but no escape from conscience. She now regarded happiness as a duty, and "practiced it steadily, though often her sensitive nature broke bounds and asserted its right to be miserable." On the whole she was successful in her efforts to be happy; her nature was not buoyant, but it was sound. Much of her melancholy belonged to insatiate youth, and was to be outgrown. But though the solemnity disappeared for the most part, the seriousness remained. That distinction is not always apparent in the work which occupied Marian Evans as essayist and reviewer to the verge of middle age. The present study emphasizes the fact that the mellowing of her character and her art was due not merely to the ripening influence of time, but to the development of a single human relation. The nature of Lewes was in many ways complementary to her own. He was brilliant, exuberant. Thackeray once declared that "it would not surprise him to meet Lewes riding on a white elephant in Piccadilly." His high spirits as well as his deep sympathy served to nourish the genius of the woman to whom he could give his life if not his name. But for him, Miss Deakin believes, the novels would never have been written; certainly they would not have been what they are. In her attitude towards this famous union the author is particularly happy; she is successful throughout in subordinating the rôle of critic to that of biographer.

In "Trails and Tramps in Alaska and Newfoundland" (Putnam), William S. Thomas has made a really delightful addition to outdoor literature. The camera rather than the gun has been the chief weapon of his hunting trips, and in catching birds and animals in natural situations he has been highly successful. He does not confine himself to the geographical bounds of his title, one of the longest and pleasantest chapters dealing with the bird life of his home State, Pennsylvania. In the closing chapter he pleads sensibly for a policy of conservation which shall extend a uniform protection by the several States to all bird life, whether technically game birds, song birds, or not, except as long-continued and competent investigation shall prove conclusively that the restriction of numbers of any given species is of substantive value from an economic standpoint. In other words, let our Legislatures cease compelling the bird-lover to prove the right of any given bird to live and positively assume that right until incontestable evidence is presented to the contrary.

"The Critic in the Orient" (Paul Elder), by George Hamlin Fitch, a companion volume to "The Critic in the Occident," is a series of desultory sketches of a dozen cities from Tokio to Cairo. Each represents selections from a mass of newspaper letters by a literary reviewer who found that "even in the debilitating heat of the tropics it was always a pastime, never a task, to put into words my ideas of the historic places I knew so well from years of reading, and which I had just seen." The book is not verbose, however, for the author has rigidly excised all the minutiæ of travel in favor of "the beauty of scenery, the grandeur of architecture, the appealing traits of various peoples." Indeed, the most apt criticism of it is that as a volume of travels its highly colored, interesting scenes want connection, while, as a criticism of foreign lands, it attempts no penetrative interpretation of what is new. But its clear, facile style, its appended hints for travellers, its bibliography, and, above all, its seventy excellent plates and photographs should make it of interest to the general reader, and of value to the tourist.

Five years ago Macmillan published a translation of Paul Dahlke's collection of essays ("Buddhist Essays"), in which, among other things, the author maintained that Buddhism is the only religion in the world "free from the poison of hypotheses." The same firm has now published a companion volume entitled "Buddhism and Science," wherein the author goes a step farther and shows that neither faith nor science can solve the riddle of the universe, but that Buddhism does so very satisfactorily. Every individual has an energy of his own. A force that is "universal" would exist of itself and be "a creation of faith"; an in-force (energy, Karma) is existent only in dependence on its material, corporeality, sensation, perception, discrimination, consciousness. Every being is adequate cause to itself; as a flame maintains itself by its own heat, so every I-process maintains itself by its volitional movements. At death the pulse of energy of this process makes itself known in a new location, passes into a new abode, kindles a new I-process. I am my Karma; without beginning. No entity passes over. The I-process has its in-force from a previous existence. Faith believes; science recognizes only the material world; Buddhism conceives of the I from the standpoint of itself, i. e., intuitively.

The weakness of science is shown in its treatment of physics, physiology, biology, etc. Scientific men demand proof in space and time before they will believe in this "passing over." They call it "telekinesis," they say it is a fact only for faith. They must learn that individual beginninglessness, which is the key-word of Buddhism, is intuitively recognizable. As one falls in love and something passes over from lover to beloved in the very glance of love, and this is intuitively recognized, so Karma-processes are to be recognized. I am a process burning in virtue of a genuine energy that never can be demonstrated, but which demonstrates itself in consciousness. The summation of individual experience is the world. I am a world-maker; there are no worlds in themselves. To put the matter clearly: "The self-integration and self-disintegration of worlds is nothing but the functional concomitant phenomenon of the beginninglessness of the I."

In reviewing Dahlke's previous work, the Nation asserted that his argument rested upon pure hypothesis. Buddhism is as much a religion of faith as is Christianity. It is bolstered up by logic and keen analysis, but it stands and falls with the Karma doctrine, and belief in Karma is a pure act of faith. That "consciousness is Karma" and that "thinking is Karma" is the teaching of Buddhism, but all the pretentious modern Apologiæ pro Buddha have failed to remove that stumbling-block. One might just as well believe in a soul passing over as to believe that consciousness and memory pass over, fasten on new material, and keep on living thus as the various I's in various bodies. Nor will any scientific man be led to believe that the Milky Way and star-clusters are Karmaic energies in passing phases. All this would not be worth three paragraphs of the Nation were it not that these pseudo-scientific expositions of Buddhism are really looked upon by a large number of people in the light of revelations. As a matter of fact, the authors of such works, and Dahlke is princeps inter pares, are neither scientific nor even fair commentators on the texts they extol.

"The Old-Fashioned Woman" (Putnams), by Elsie Clews Parsons, is a very readable book which differs from most books of its kind in the fact that it is based upon some real knowledge of anthropology; for under this gently ironical and slightly misleading title Mrs. Parsons undertakes to show that all the conventional ideas of what is appropriate to sex have their origin in the fancies of primitive men. But why not? Only a little anthropology is needed to show that, not only in sex, but in all other matters, the child of nature is bound by a rigidity and complexity of convention to which culture presents no parallel. And if the object be to show that the mind of woman does not in reality differ from that of man, the tired reader may be tempted to suggest that an important step towards this conviction would be the disappearance of feministic literature.

"Calendar of Letter Books of the City of London. Letter Book L. Temp. Edward IV-Henry VII" (London: Guildhall), edited by Reginald R. Sharpe, is the last to be issued in the present series. According to the original plan, the Letter Books were to be calendared only to the end of the fifteenth century, when the journals of the Common Council and the repertories of the Aldermen begin. That period has now been reached, and though the Letter Books themselves actually extend to the year 1688, no more will be calendared under the present arrangement. At the end of his preface, Dr. Sharpe announces the termination of the series and begs the general reader "to select some one or two of the more full and lively of these Calendars for attentive perusal, since he may gather from them in a week's diligent reading a more vivid idea of the England of his forefathers than he will get from the most brilliant pages of the professed historian." No advice could be more reasonable, and in accepting it the reader will not only acquire a remarkably clear notion of life in London during the Middle Ages, but will be impressed with the value of the material that Dr. Sharpe has rendered accessible. These eleven volumes are a witness, besides, to the learning, energy, and good judgment of the editor, whose labors in this field have found all too little recognition at the hands of historians.

The present volume, covering the period from 1460 to 1497, contains very little that is of importance for the general history of the kingdom. It is, however, rich in all that relates to the administrative and economic life of the City. It is indispensable to students of the history of the craft guilds, supplementing and completing the works of Herbert ("Twelve Livery Companies of London"), Unwin ("The Gilds and Companies of London"), Kingsford ("Chronicles of London"), and the authors of the histories of the various companies. We learn much about the City and the Hanse merchants; about the relation of the companies to the municipal organization, elections, and finance; and more than all else about the activities of the companies through the large number of ordinances, administrative, religious and charitable, and technical, that were submitted to the Mayor and Aldermen for approval and enrolment. Among other matters here mentioned that concerned the guilds are the relations with "foreigners," the wearing of liveries, the rise of the yeomanry organizations, the admission of women, and the question of precedence. In the matter of precedence, it is interesting to note that the "Billesdone award" of 1484, settling the quarrel between the Tailors and the Skinners, is still in force. Two or three additional points may be noted. The Hanse merchants, though in occupation of the Steelyard as early as 1320, did not become the actual proprietors until 1475; the title "Lord Mayor," though known in the fifteenth century, was not generally used until 1534 or 1535; and buildings in London were still roofed with straw as late as the beginning of the fourteenth century.

"The Fringe of the East: A Journey Through Past and Present Provinces of Turkey" (Macmillan), by Harry Charles Lukach, is neither a guide book nor exactly a book of travels. It is the narrative of an inconsequential ramble, illustrated by photographs, with a considerable amount of chit-chat, sometimes historical, sometimes jocose. The author is conversant with the near East and has compiled at least one guide book. In the present ramble he starts from Athens, going to Mount Athos, then to Rhodes, Cyprus, Jerusalem, Samaria, Damascus, Aleppo, then eastward to the Euphrates, back again through Antioch to Latakia, and so down the coast to Beirut. He seems to have had no particular reason for the journey. Most of the places which he visits have been frequently visited and described. There is absolutely nothing new, with the exception of a couple of castles in the Nosairiyeh country. There are no adventures, except the ordinary infelicities which the Oriental traveller experiences at times, and there are no discoveries. The first chapter consists of stories, chiefly familiar, from Nasr ed-Din Khoja. Other chapters are enlivened by stories Occidental and Oriental, credible and incredible, and illustrated by photographs, principally taken by the author, some good and others not. It is a pleasant book with which to while away an irresponsible hour, when one does not wish to be seriously instructed or intensely interested—the sort of book which we would especially commend to the libraries of ocean steamers.

The Rev. Hiram Collins Haydn, D.D., who died at his home in Cleveland on Thursday of last week, aged eighty-one, had been pastor for many years, and since 1903 pastor emeritus, of the First Presbyterian Church of that city. He graduated from Amherst in 1856, and from the Union Theological Seminary three years later. From 1887 to 1890 he was president of Western Reserve University. Among his writings are the following: "Lay Effort: Death and Beyond," "Amusements," "American Heroes on Mission Fields," and "Western Reserve University."

John Haughton Coney, professor of history in Princeton University, died on July 25 in New York city. Professor Coney graduated from Princeton in the class of 1885. After engaging for a time in secondary school work, he became associated about 1895 in the department of history with Prof. W. M. Sloane. When Professor Sloane accepted a chair in Columbia, virtually the entire task of historical instruction in Princeton devolved for a time upon Professor Coney. He came well prepared for the work by a number of years of previous study in Berlin University, where he had given his time largely to the study of Prussian and modern European history. After the enlargement of the historical teaching staff in Princeton, Professor Coney devoted his lectures to modern European history. In this subject his courses were universally recognized as a sterling piece of solid value in the historical curriculum. He did an enormous amount of college work, without noise and without adequate recognition. His colleagues, even better than his numerous students, knew and appreciated his remarkable erudition. Perhaps no more complete master of the detail of Prussian history in all its minor ramifications ever taught in an American college, and his death will leave a distinct void among historical scholars and in the teaching force of his university. Egregii mortalis altique silenti.

Louis-Paulin Passy, historian and archæologist, known as the "father" of the Chamber of Deputies, died at Gisors, France, last Thursday, in his eighty-third year. He was a cousin of the late Frédéric Passy, the peace advocate. He was a monarchist, and had been a member of the Chamber since the foundation of the Third Republic. A prolific writer, he ranged easily over several fields of knowledge.

Science

The Genus Iris. By W. R. Dykes. Cambridge University Press. (University of Chicago Press, American agents.) Folio, with 48 colored plates and 30 line drawings. $37.50.

The horticultural attractiveness and botanical interest of Irises have at last led to a publication befitting their worth. The rather dry and uninteresting, though scholarly, monograph of J. G. Baker of Kew, in 1892, has been the only reliable work on these plants available, either to the gardener, for whom it was too erudite, or to the botanists, who have always deplored its lack of keys. It is greatly to the credit of Mr. Dykes that he should have prepared a volume that, while successfully addressed alike to the horticulturist and to the botanist, is no mere gathering of Iris literature, but a thoroughly comprehensive monograph on the genus. Containing admirable technical descriptions of all the species known to the author, in English, and giving, also, for each species as much of horticultural information as the gardener would ordinarily demand, the book is unique among monographic works of its kind.

As in previous works, Mr. Dykes divides the genus into ten sections segregated by differences of root-habit or by more technical flower-characters; and this is the only method by which one can possibly thread one's way through a group of such size and complexity. There is a key separating these sections one from the other, and keys for each section separating the different species in it. That these keys will be more readily available to the botanist than the gardener goes without saying, but considering the difficulty of the task, the result is admirable. An explanatory chapter, with illustrations on the structure of the Iris flower, will help the uninitiated in the use of these keys. For each species the author has given all the synonyms known to botanists, and a complete account of the distribution, citing all the better known collections of the plant by collector's name and field number, so that from the technical side the work is very complete. Wherever the species presents horticultural difficulties and is of sufficient merit to warrant cultivation, special notes have been added under the botanical description, together with interesting historical notes on its introduction into general cultivation. Both from the botanical and horticultural standpoint the work is quite up to date, including several species from China, new to cultivation through the recent collections of Mr. E. H. Wilson from that country.

In view of the fact that there are many hundreds of magnificent named forms and hybrids of Iris, it is unfortunate that the author has virtually dismissed this phase of the subject in two pages. But it is also probably true that the botanical affinities and parentage of many of these forms are doubtful; nor would the scope of the present work allow of further elucidation. The forty-eight colored plates are beautiful in themselves and satisfactory botanically; they are fitting illustrations for a sumptuous and really comprehensive volume.

The following are science books in Houghton Mifflin's autumn list: "Letters and Recollections of Alexander Agassiz, with a Sketch of His Work and Life," by George R. Agassiz; "The Health Master," by Samuel Hopkins Adams; "The Resistance of the Air and Aviation," by G. Eiffel, translated by Jerome C. Hunsaker; "The Housekeeper's Handy-Book," by Lucia Millet Baxter; "Calm Yourself," by George L. Walton; and "The Hygiene of the School Child," by Lewis M. Terman.

Mr. George Shiras, 3d, gives in the National Geographic Magazine for July a vivid account of his twenty-six years' work as a pioneer in photographing wild animals, especially at night. Many of the sixty-seven illustrations represent the home life of the animals, some of which wander every night within a stone's throw of rural homes. An interesting discovery made a few years ago was the existence of moose in large numbers in the Yellowstone National Park. There are several very remarkable flashlight photographs of deer. A brief description, with seventeen illustrations, of some unfrequented parts of Burma is given by Mr. Charles H. Bartlett.

The distinctive characteristics of geography are the subject of the leading article, by M. P. Vidal de la Blache, in the Annales de Géographie for July. By emphasizing these he aims to show that the conception of geography no longer oscillates between that of geology and of history; that geography has a domain of its own among the sciences. Other articles concern a remarkable earthquake in France in 1682, the description of it being based largely on contemporary records; an atlas and gazetteer of Finland in four volumes which has already reached a second edition; and the Sierra de la Lumbrera in Argentina. Considerable space is devoted to showing the methods employed for the development of the French colonies. Among these is the railway connecting Tongking with western China, which it is believed will make the port of Haiphong a rival of Hongkong. Much work is also going on at Dakar on the West African coast in the construction of docks, for when the projected Trans-Saharan railway is constructed it will be the shortest route between Europe and South America.

Among imported English garden books "Gardens for Small Country Houses" (Country Life Library), by Gertrude Jekyll and Lawrence Weaver, is of much interest. It treats not of plants and seasons, in considering which our practice must always be different from the English, but of garden design, a study which we greatly neglect. It is another book of luxury, for the cost of the average garden here displayed would stagger the average American suburban dweller. Yet it preaches principles which we may well take to heart, of privacy, completeness, and of making nature do her best for us. It is true that the copious illustrations of the book make us, in the midst of a hot and dry summer, envy the Englishman his climate; but apart from this we may very well admire the intensity with which the English designers apply themselves to make the best of their limited plots. The transplanting of selected bits of natural scenery, the beautifying of these by architectural adornment, and the endeavor to create an atmosphere of rest and permanence, are the central intentions. Home-makers can learn much from the study of both text and pictures, especially those which deal with the treatment of slopes and walls, rocks and water, pavings and gates.

The schoolboy of to-day possesses a very different textbook on geography from the one which his father or grandfather carried to and fro. Instead of a thin quarto atlas he generally has an octavo or even duodecimo volume, and instead of predominant political boundaries and statistics of population, he learns of land-forms and their influence on peoples; of map-making in the several types of projection; of the causes of winter and summer; of day and night; of zones of climate; of the depths of the sea; and, besides all these matters, he hears economic questions discussed in so far as they are conditioned by natural resources. Geography has drawn to its aid geology, astronomy, mathematics, and economics, and has become revivified in an extraordinary manner. These new methods are illustrated in two books just published—"High School Geography, Physical, Economic, and Regional" (American Book Company), by Charles R. Dryer, and "Elements of Geography" (Holt), by R. D. Salisbury, H. H. Barrows, and W. H. Tower. Mr. Dryer's book is somewhat more elementary than the other, and is primarily designed for the high school. The boy or girl who goes through its pages will find it no child's play, but will in the end have a very intelligent grasp of the earth. Beginning with astronomical relations and geological processes, the student is conducted through economic geography to the "regional" part of the subject, in which the earth is described by physiographic provinces. Special stress is laid on resources. The volume by the three professors in the University of Chicago is written for somewhat older students, and is designed to cultivate the reasoning powers, as well as to instruct in the physical features of the earth. If anything, more emphasis is laid upon geological processes, and less upon economic resources. The earth is treated in a more general way, and there is less description of special provinces. The volume is largely the discussion of general principles with the earth as an illustration of their application.

Prof. John Milne, an eminent seismologist, died July 31 on the Isle of Wight, England, aged sixty-three. He was well known the world over, having travelled extensively in the United States, Australasia, China, Japan, the Southern Seas, and Europe. For twenty years he was employed by the Japanese Government, for which he established a chain of nearly 1,000 earthquake-recording stations. He also completed a seismic survey of the world for the British Association. Born in Liverpool, he had worked at his profession in Newfoundland and Labrador for Cyrus Field, Sir James Anderson, and others. Later he was geologist to Dr. Beke's expedition into Arabia before taking up his work for Japan. He was the designer of seismographs and of instruments to record vibrations on railways. Among his publications are "The Miners' Handbook," "Earthquakes," and "Crystallography."

Drama and Music

A legendary incident in the life of St. Francis of Assisi has been taken by Josephine Preston Peabody for her poetical comedy, "The Wolf of Gubbio," which Houghton Mifflin Co. announces.

James J. McCloskey, actor and playwright, died Monday in Brooklyn in his eighty-seventh year. He was born in Montreal and was one of the original California '49ers; later he managed a theatre in Marysville, Cal. In 1856 he went to Australia with Charles R. Thorne, and on his return to America played at the old Broadway, Bowery, and other theatres. Among his many melodramas are "Across the Continent," "Through by Daylight," "On Hand," "The Twelve o'Clock Man," "Across the City," and "Nuggets."

Among the soloists to be heard next season with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Margarete Matzenauer, Leopold Godowsky, Leo Slezak, Harold Bauer, Eugen Ysaye, Carl Flesch, Jacques Thibaud, Fritz Kreisler, and Paderewski.

In order to facilitate the efforts of American composers to obtain a suitable libretto for the $10,000 prize competition offered by the National Federation of Musical Clubs the Musical Courier offers a prize of $200 for the best libretto on an American subject which shall conform to the regulations of the above mentioned prize competition.

The Maine Music Festival, which annually is given in Portland, under the direction of William R. Chapman, will take place this year on October 6, 7, 8. The list of soloists includes Mme. Schumann-Heink, Lillian Blauvelt, Mildred Faas, Roberta Beatty, Cornelia Rider-Possart, George Harris, Cecil Fanning, John Finnegan, Max Salzinger, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest J. Hill. The festival chorus includes 800 voices from the cities and towns of western Maine, and the orchestra is that of the Boston Opera House.

"The Caruso among basses," is what some Londoners have called Chaliapin, who recently delighted them as Boris Godounoff. Others call him "a bass Tamagno," and "strangely enough there is an element of truth in both," says Alfred Kalisch in the London World. He declares that > operagoers of long experience are agreed that there has never been a case of an instant conquest of London by an operatic singer comparable to that achieved by M. Chaliapin. . . . Chaliapin triumphed not only as a superb singer, but as an actor of magnetic personality. It is hardly possible to recall a singer whose voice is sweeter, or one whose legato is more perfect, or one who has the art of caressing a phrase more highly developed; while as regards power (by which I mean not only volume but skill in suggesting strength by the quality of the voice) he has no rival.

"German Motet" is the title of Richard Strauss's latest composition. It is for four solo voices and sixteen-part choir, unaccompanied. The words are by Rückert, and the publisher is Adolph Fürstner, Berlin.

On September 24 one hundred years will have elapsed since the death of Grétry. The Belgians are preparing to commemorate this date. They have reason to be proud of this composer, for in his day (he was a contemporary of Mozart) he was one of the most famous musicians in Europe. Following the advice of Voltaire, he went to Paris, where he soon became prominent and popular as an opera composer, and exerted a deep influence on other writers of comic operas, notably Isouard Boieldieu, Adam, and Auber. His operatic principles, which he discusses in his "Mémoires," are similar to those of Gluck; but while Gluck unblushingly wrote pleasing tunes, Grétry held that the singers should eschew melody and content themselves with recitative. In this respect Debussy is his pupil. The first instance of a leading motive (recurring melody) is found in one of the operas of Grétry, who also anticipated Wagner in suggesting that the orchestral players should not be visible.

One of the sensations of the next musical season will be Verdi's "Aïda" overture. He wrote an overture to his greatest opera, but was dissatisfied with it and refused to allow it to be played or printed. Interesting details regarding this affair are now made public in the Giornale d'Italia by the well-known critic, Eugenio Checchi, who got them from Franco Faccio in 1887. Faccio was conductor of the Scala Opera House in Milan at the time (1872) when "Aïda" had its first performances there. He relates that two days before the first public performance of "Aïda" Verdi came to him and said that he should like to have an orchestral rehearsal of the overture. Faccio was surprised, for this was the first intimation he had had that Verdi had composed an overture. The orchestra was promptly summoned, and the piece was played at sight. At the end all the musicians rose and applauded the master. Verdi quietly waited till they had given vent to their feelings, and then he called Faccio to his box and said: "Your orchestra played admirably, but I regret to have called for its services needlessly, for I am going to withdraw the overture." When Faccio asked why, he retorted: "I withdraw it because I do not like it." Faccio's efforts to make him change his mind were all in vain. Verdi had a habit of stubbornly adhering to what he had made up his mind to do; and so it came about that until the present year no one ever heard the "Aïda" overture except its composer and Faccio and his musicians. It is to be played again in the same opera house on the occasion of Verdi's one hundredth birthday, on October 10 next.

"The new Mozart" is the name now given in Vienna to Erich Korngold, the fifteen-year-old son of the musical critic of the Neue Freie Presse. He was only eleven when his pantomime, "The Snowman," was produced at the Imperial Opera in that city. It will be remembered that his "Schauspieloverture" for orchestra was played last winter by the New York Philharmonic, under Josef Stransky, and scored a genuine success. It most agreeably dispelled the current notion that this boy was simply a musico-mathematical freak, a precocious imitator of Strauss, Reger, and Schönberg. While his harmonies were entirely modern, he proved to be not a cacophonist for discord's sake; and, what is far more important still, he proved that he has that rarest of gifts, the faculty of creating melodies. The indications are that he deserves the name of "the new Mozart." His future doings will be watched with intense interest. He bids fair to become one of the great masters. The best article on this wonderful boy that has so far appeared is one by Hiram K. Moderwell in the July Harvard Review (which, by the way, has already taken its place among the leading musical periodicals).

Art

Houghton Mifflin Co. announces for autumn: "The Life of Charles F. McKim," by Alfred H. Granger; "Personal Recollections of Vincent Van Gogh," by his sister, Elisabeth Du Quesne Van Gogh, translated by Katherine S. Dreier, and "The Significance of Art," by Eleanor H. Rowland.

When Mr. Howard C. Levis's "Descriptive Bibliography of the Most Important Books in the English Language relating to the Art and History of Engraving and the Collecting of Prints" (reviewed in these columns September 26, 1912) appeared in London in 1912, the need of an index became speedily apparent. This want has now been supplied by the author in a 141-page "Supplement and Index," the latter occupying more than 90 pages. Print collectors and others who own the original book will welcome this key to its store of information.

Henry W. Poore's "The Conception of Art" (Doubleday, Page & Co., fully illustrated), is, as the title suggests, intellectualistic in tendency. The idea of a special æsthetic sense Mr. Poore scouts. Art arises in the intelligence, borrowing power from the emotions, and its appeal is to the intelligence chiefly. In short, Mr. Poore virtually accepts Croce's dictum, though he does not seem to have read him, "art is expression." Beyond this fundamental conception, Mr. Poore's criticism is entirely relative. Art he constantly reminds us, quoting Coleridge, is "a way." John La Farge, more comprehensively, used to call it "a transaction." For Mr. Poore the concepts of art and beauty do not coincide. A work of art may contain more or less beauty, or none at all, without forfeiting its title. It suffices that the artist's interest be deeply engaged and his idea expressed. Similarly, Mr. Poore tends to break down the sharp distinctions between realism and idealism, etc. All this is in the direction of things as they are. On the point of impressionism our author is less satisfactory. To say that the impressionist paints not a thing but his impression thereof is badly to beg the question. So broad and tautological a definition defines nothing. The isolation of the single impression is what really counts, with a corresponding swiftness and directness of execution. The last chapters, which contain Mr. Poore's comment on the latest schools of art, have been published already in a separate booklet and recently noticed by the Nation. As a whole, the book is of curiously uneven texture. It contains cogent and closely analyzed criticism, much chat and anecdotal illustration, many misprints. Our chief issue with Mr. Poore is that, insisting on a scientific definition of art, he accepts the loose and popular idea of beauty. Perhaps beauty is only our satisfaction in successful expression—the completed transaction between artist and amateur.. This would make beauty relative, but also would constitute it a necessary concomitant of every sensation of art. In general this is a suggestive and interesting book, full of common-sense on topics that are often beclouded by mere rhetoric.

To commemorate its loan exhibition of fine color-prints in May, 1911, the Japan Society of New York has published a carefully illustrated catalogue, prefaced by the lecture delivered by Frederick William Gookin at the opening of the exhibition. The volume is a thin folio in cartridge boards, is beautifully printed on fine paper, and is called "Japanese Colour-prints and their Designers." Mr. Gookin managed to pack a remarkable amount of information within the compass of a public lecture. His paper measures up very well with such compact manuals as Strange's. An even greater distinction of the volume is the illustrations. There are some two dozen color-plates, real facsimiles, mounted on Japanese vellum. These reproductions are made from famous prints in the best condition. Accordingly, this memorial album becomes a necessary auxiliary to the scrupulous collector. Besides, it is a beautiful example of book making, and the Japan Society doubtless will be under pressure to permit a wider circulation than is usual with similar club publications.

Java possesses some of the most wonderful Hindu and Buddhist temples of the world, built probably for the most part between the eighth and eleventh centuries of the Christian era. But they have suffered greatly from many causes—earthquakes, the fanaticism of the Mohammedan conquerors since the close of the fifteenth century, and the utter carelessness and callousness of the Dutch Governors who have allowed innumerable statues to be carried away by greedy collectors and who have permitted these immense temples, built without mortar, to fall to pieces for the want of a little care. Only within the last dozen years have Dutch archæological societies and colonial officials begun to awake to a sense of their duty. They have finally begun to restore, to photograph, and to study intelligently their neglected treasures. The purpose of Mr. J. F. Scheltema, who has just published, through Macmillan, "Monumental Java," is to sum up in popular fashion, with comments of his own, the results of these recent archæological investigations.

Mr. Scheltema is able to speak with some authority, owing to a very wide reading and to personal visits and studies in Java itself for thirty years. He is nothing of a Schliemann or a Winckelmann, and does not deal in exact descriptions in precise feet and inches. Rather he strives to do for the Boro Budoor and the other Javanese temples what Ruskin did for St Mark's and Santa Croce. Like Ruskin, too, his scorn for the ordinary tourist and philistine is unmeasured. Visitors to the Paris Exposition of 1900 will remember the Hindu temple which housed the East Indian section and which Cabaton, in his excellent general account of the Dutch East Indies, refers to as a "very successful copy of the Tchandi (temple) Sari," a "beautiful specimen of Indo-Javanese architecture." It is characteristic of Mr. Scheltema's spirit that he anathematizes this same building as a "sorry spectacle prepared by the miserable bungling of mischievous quasi-scientific enthusiasts," a "mean, ridiculous imitation of one of the Buddhist jewels of central Java, a caricature of the Chandi Sari, the exterior in nondescript confectioner's style, daubed dirty white, the interior made hideous by a purple awning, abomination heaped on abomination." His volume is illustrated by good photographs and is enriched by a good deal of interpretation of Hindu mythology. It is a pity that, in the interests of clearness and good taste, the author did not submit his manuscript to some kindly friend more familiar with English idiom who would have excised some of the metaphors, improved the punctuation, and shortened the sentences.

The second edition of Margaret E. Tabor's "The Saints in Art" (Dutton, illustrated) shows more defects than one usually finds in such compilations. There is in fact little evidence of first-hand knowledge in the book. Since the attempt is made to name a famous picture for each prominent saint, the thing should have been done consistently. A reading of the first three letters suggests the following addenda: St. Agnes, Tintoretto at the Orto, Venice; St. Alexis, Lower Church of San Clemente, Rome; St. Anthony and St. Paul, Jan van Eyck at Berlin and Velasquez at the Prado; St. Barbara, Jan van Eyck at Antwerp; St. Benedict, frescoes at Subiaco and Monte Oliveto; St. Bernard, Perugino at Munich; St. Bruno, Eustache Le Seur at Paris; St. Christopher, Mantegna and others in the Ermitani, Padua; St. John Chrysostom at his titular church in Venice. Oddly enough, this lovely picture is the frontispiece of the book, but is misread a St. Jerome. It would be difficult to find a St. Cecilia "by the Van Eycks" at Berlin. is it necessary to carry these observations further?

George Hitchcock, the American painter, died suddenly Monday on the island of Marken, Holland, in which country he had made his home for many years. He was born in Providence in 1850. He graduated from Brown in 1872, and two years later from the Harvard Law School. But he soon gave up law for art, and studied in Paris under Boulanger and Lefebvre, and then at The Hague under Mesdag. For twenty-five years he had a studio in Edam, Holland, during which time he specialized in flowers, his Tulip Growing, painted in 1885, having first won him recognition in Paris. Some years ago Mr. Hitchcock turned to religious subjects. In this branch of his work may be mentioned The Flight into Egypt, Madonna and Child, Sainte Geneviève, and Hagar and Ishmael. He won gold medals in New York, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Munich, Chicago, and Dresden, was an officer of Franz Joseph Order of Austria, and a member of the Munich Secession, the Vienna Academy of Arts, and American Painters.

The death is announced from Gloucester, Mass., of William Pitt Preble Longfellow, architect, and nephew of the poet. He was born in Portland, Me., in 1836, and graduated from Harvard in 1855. In 1869 he was appointed assistant architect to the United States Treasury Department, and later was editor of the American Architect. He was the author of "Abstract of Lectures on Perspective," "Cyclopædia of Architecture in Italy," "Greece and the Levant," "The Column and the Arch," and "Applied Perspective."

Finance

TWO WAYS OF DOING IT.

Two incidents of last week, affecting the relation of the Government to the financial situation, have shown with unusual clearness how not to do it and how to do it. Government bonds decline sharply on the market; the finance minister of the United States publicly declares that the fall is due to a conspiracy of New York banks. Waiving consideration either of accuracy of the assertion or of official propriety in the action, the immediate conclusion of all experienced people was, that the market for Government securities had been injured by it. This was true for two reasons—that so unprecedented an action would be taken by many holders of such securities as evidence of a desperate situation, and that, even where this was not inferred, a desire to get free from connection with a market where such accusations were flying would have been instilled. Had that statement actually been the precursor of a continued campaign of incrimination, the effect on the value of Government bonds would have been most unfortunate. The statement left the Government bond market as weak as it was before.

Three days later came the announcement that the Treasury would increase the public deposits with interior banks, but with the stipulation that banks desiring such accounts must increase their bond-secured note circulation to a given ratio, if they had allowed it to be retired. Here was an expedient to which capable Treasury officers have in the past resorted. It is the business of a finance minister to support the public credit. The British Exchequer buys freely for the sinking fund when a fright has seized investors in British consols; the French Treasury does the same in a break in rentes. It is a matter of history that Secretary McCulloch actually sent to the Stock Exchange heavy Government buying orders for national securities, on the day after Lincoln's assassination. The present expedient, of granting legitimate facilities on conditions the performance of which would involve purchase of Government securities, has been successfully pursued before. This time, it put up the price of the 2 per cents two points, on the very day of its announcement.

The moral, as the improving tales of our childhood used to put it, is that when a troublesome problem has to be solved, in government or anywhere else, the thing to do is to set practically to work at its solution—not to complain and rail at some one else who is imagined to have created it. This principle has a much broader scope than its application to such passing incidents as those of last week. It concerns the attitude of all branches of the Government towards problems of the day.

It is an old rule, and a very good one, that when something is amiss in the body politic, it is the business of capable public men, first, to find out by calm and dispassionate inquiry what is wrong; next, to discover what will cure it, and then, in a sober and statesmanlike way, to apply the remedy. That was the commonplace method of another period. Nowadays, a substantial part of our legislators seem to prefer, under similar conditions, first, to let their imagination run wild as to what the real trouble is; next, to accuse the most conspicuous persons in the neighborhood of having caused it for their own wicked purposes, and thereupon, to discuss with the utmost heat and fury what punishment ought to be inflicted on them.

But even a child should know which of the two plans contains the larger possibility of usefulness. The first sets things right when they are wrong; the second merely stirs up a cloud of confusion and bitter feeling. As a matter of fact, both have been tried repeatedly in the world's past history. The use of the "conspiracy" theory is itself as old as the application of common-sense remedies—probably much older. But the one has the same relation to the other as the drowning of old women for practicing witchcraft on a farmer's cattle had to the later development of veterinary science, or as the mediæval charge that Jews were poisoning the wells had to the trained physician's struggle with typhoid. From one point of view, therefore, it might be imagined that repeated recourse to the idea that everything unpleasant is the work of malicious enemies and conspirators marks reversion to the public sentiment of the Middle Ages.

Happily, however, every one is aware that these are not the Middle Ages, with their ignorance, bigotry, and superstition; that the times we live in are, in fact, characterized in most fields of activity, as none have been before them, by a spirit of determined inquiry after the facts behind every phenomenon that attracts attention. Sooner or later, this spirit is bound to be wearied and disgusted with the practice of meeting every unpleasant development in a political or financial situation with the cry that some one is "conspiring." Most people are aware from experience that, in the practical affairs of life, such an assertion, if it does not mean hopeless superstition on the part of its author, is apt to mean intellectual laziness or outright incompetency. But this is not a period when any one of these three weaknesses is tolerated. It is not unreasonable, with such facts in mind, to predict that in due course it will be recognized, at Washington as elsewhere, that the practical common-sense way of remedying what is wrong is the wisest way, and that no individual or community ever helped its own condition by permitting its mind to be governed by the delusion of persecution.

A TALE OF HINDOSTAN.
By PERCIVAL CHRISTOPHER WREN, Author of "Dew and Mildew," etc. Crown 8vo. Pp. ix+363. $1.35 net (Postage 11 cents).
The second title indicates the subject of this novel, which tells the story of a Club for Failures which is supposed to have been established in India for Englishmen who have failed there and gone under. The idea underlying the book is that there is some good in every one, even the biggest rascal—an idea on which much of the work of Henry Kingsley is based. The method of arriving at this underlying stratum employed by Father Gregory and John Durham, the managers of the Club, was the exercise of human sympathy.

VOL. XCVII—NO. 2511 THURSDAY, AUGUST 14, 1913 Reg. U. S. Pat. Office. PRICE TEN CENTS

An important announcement by Mitchell Kennerley

THE

MODERN DRAMA SERIES

EDITED BY EDWIN BJORKMAN

Each volume uniform cloth binding, prices various, from $1.00 to $1.50 a volume

CONSIDERING the western world as a whole, the dramatic production of the last fifty years must be held to equal, and perhaps to surpass, that of any preceding period. And this production displays an essential unity of spirit and manner that heralds the final disappearance of national barriers in literature. To make the American public free of this common storehouse of thought and beauty is the object underlying the Modern Drama Series, which aims at appealing with equal force to scholar and layman. It will gradually bring translations from every language that has produced a contemporary drama worthy of notice. It will also include English and American plays of exceptional significance. The editor of the series has within a few years made a reputation for himself as a farsighted student of modern literature and as a successful translator. From those chosen to assist him, three qualities will be exacted: familiarity with the language of the original, artistic command of the English language, and ability to grasp not only the letter but the spirit of the work to be transplanted. Each volume will have an introduction of informative rather than critical nature and a chronological list of plays by the same author.

The following ten volumes of this series will be ready for publication during the coming Fall:

I. (Danish) KAREN BORNEMAN: LYNGGAARD & CO. Two plays by HJALMAR BERGSTRÖM. Translated with an introduction by Edwin Björkman.

Bergström belongs to a group of young Danish playwrights who promise to place their country's dramatic literature in the very front rank of what our own day has to offer. The two plays contained in this volume are characterized by technical perfection, dramatic intensity, psychological veracity, and deep social significance.

II. (French) THE VULTURES: THE WOMAN OF PARIS: THE MERRY-GO-ROUND. Three plays by HENRY BECQUE. Translated with an introduction by Freeman Tilden.

While almost unknown here, Becque is a classic in France. Historically he is interesting as a link between the new and the older, pre-Ibsenian drama. But no such consideration is needed for the enjoyment of his brilliant wit and sharp social satire, "than which there is no better," was the verdict recently given by Arnold Bennett on "The Woman of Paris."

III. (Norwegian) PEER GYNT. A dramatic poem by HENRIK IBSEN. Translated in the original metre by R. Ellis Roberts. With an introduction and notes.

"Peer Gynt" is one of Ibsen's most characteristic plays, and also one of his finest, but its full significance and beauty have never before been revealed to American or English readers. The version made by Mr. Roberts preserves not only the deep-reaching philosophy of the original, but also its poetic glamour and playful charm.

IV. (Italian) THE STRONGER: LIKE FALLING LEAVES: SACRED GROUND. Three plays by GIUSEPPE GIACOSA. Translated with an introduction by Edith and Allan Updegraff.

An adequate English rendering of Giacosa's nervous, almost brutally direct dialogue. Splendid craftsmanship and indomitable determination to get at the realities of life are two other qualities characterizing the great Italian playwright's best work. Love as a mere sex-passion has little place in his dramas; work is, on the other hand, always conspicuous. And few, if any, modern writers have treated business with such a combination of merciless insight and understanding sympathy.

V. (English) THE WIDOWING OF MRS. HOLROYD. A drama in three acts by D. H. LAWRENCE.

This is first of all what a play should be to achieve suspense: a conflict of human wills. But it constitutes also a striking exposition of the difference between the male and the female attitude toward such a conflict and all it involves. The author must be reckoned one of the most promising of the younger writers now making a place for themselves in England.

VI. (American) PAPA. An amorality in three acts by ZOË AKINS.

A startlingly clever and charming piece of dramatic foolery, with a background of biting social satire. There is in it something of Schnitzler's "Anatol" and something of Hope's "Dolly Dialogues." Yet it is wholly and surprisingly original—a bright herald of still greater things to come.

VII. (American) MR. FAUST. A verse play in five acts by ARTHUR DAVISON FICKE.

The Faust legend set in present-day American surroundings. But through that legend the reader glimpses another one, still nearer to the race-heart: the tempting on the mountain. The result is an interpretation of the modern mind, of its strength and its weakness, that has rarely been equalled in accuracy and keenness. And the style of the play is poetical in the finest sense.

VIII. (American) THE RED LIGHT OF MARS, or A Day in the Life of the Devil. A philosophical comedy by GEORGE BRONSON HOWARD.

There is something typically American in both the spirit and the form of this drama, with its optimism, its briskness of phrase and thought, its constant regard for actualities rather than technicalities. While primarily a stage play, it proves once more that the "acting" qualities of a drama need not make it less attractive as reading.

IX. (Russian) THE LIFE OF MAN: KING HUNGER: SAVVA. Three plays by LEONID ANDREYEV. Translated with an introduction by Thomas Seltzer.

Among the younger Russians Andreyev stands in the foremost rank—probably the greatest of those who are writing today. These three plays represent his best work. One of them gives a symbolic interpretation of human destiny. The second portrays the coming upheaval, the rising of the hungry masses. The third presents a new type of revolutionary—one who is to our own day what Bazarov in "Fathers and Sons" was to that of Turgenyev.

X. (German) THE LONELY WAY: INTERMEZZO: COUNTESS MIZZI. Three plays by ARTHUR SCHNITZLER. Translated with an introduction by Edwin Björkman.

The charm of "Anatol" is in these plays, but also much more. There is philosophy—though it be a little sad—and there is, above all, unending tolerance with the foibles and follies of human nature. Their workmanship is exquisite, and in every way they give so much more of the real Schnitzler than do the earlier plays. All of the renowned Austrian playwright's dramatic work will gradually become embodied in this series, and there will be no other authorized edition of it in this country.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF
Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of The Nation, 1865-1906

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait.

Price, $1.50 net postpaid.

The Week

President Wilson expresses his belief that a lobby has been at work in Washington seeking to embroil this country with Mexico. This is a grave charge which should not be lightly made. But the fact had been explicitly asserted in the Senate. On Thursday, August 7, Senator Smith, of Michigan, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, declared it as his opinion that "there is at the present moment in this capital a thorough, practical, systematic lobby, putting forth their revolutionary propaganda with a serious and a definite object of affecting the American attitude towards the Government of Mexico." He was referring to the activities of the former friends of Madero, and to the present supporters of Carranza, with the Constitutionalists in general. But on last Saturday, when the matter came up again for debate, Senator Williams was at once more definite and more sweeping.

In the statement which President Wilson authorized, he intimated that the war lobby was no longer formidable. He believes that it will not now be able to interfere with the Administration's patient and cautious course in dealing with Mexico. Indeed, there has been a marked and grateful falling off in war talk. Senators are speaking less on the Mexican difficulty, and more temperately. Most significant of all, the Hearst newspapers, which for some time pursued a campaign for war with Mexico, lampooning Secretary Bryan, caricaturing President Wilson, and seeking to work up a furor for a "strong" policy towards Mexico, have suddenly shown signs of quitting. They were getting no response; their own motives were falling under more glaring suspicion; and one fiasco after another marked their agitation. The latest is the outcome of urgent appeals for American protection based upon sensational stories of atrocities committed against Americans on a Hearst ranch in the state of Tabasco. A war vessel was sent to investigate, and its commander has reported:

> American subjects not in danger; American subjects have not been threatened; American subjects and foreign subjects have received proper protection from the Mexican authorities. Americans do not desire transportation to leave; American property has not been destroyed, and American interests have not been endangered. The Mexican rebels have committed depredations on an American ranch sixty miles distant, but nobody has been endangered.

When Senator Lippitt, of Rhode Island, declares that the cotton schedules in the tariff bill favor the manufacturers of the South as against New England, he touches upon one of the vital principles of protectionism. Against whom does protection protect? At first thought, any child can answer the question. Fifty years of Republican oratory have made it plain that Dingleyism protects the industries of the nation against the outside world, and the American workingman against his pauper competitors. But now comes a fervent protest against the removal of a tariff wall which protects New England against the South. This is what the patriotism of the high tariff brokers simmers down to. It is not one for all and all for one when it comes to cotton schedules, but Rhode Island against Georgia and Alabama. It is not nationalism, but sectionalism in a geographical sense, even as protection in essence is sectionalism in a class sense when it assures high profits to the mill-owner, the wool-baron, and the lemon-king, at the expense of the public at large. The special interests are not worrying about their enemies abroad; what they demand is to be "protected" against the great mass of their countrymen.

With the assent of more than twenty nations to the general provisions of Secretary Bryan's peace plan, the drafting of the first treaty with San Salvador gives hope of future agreements of the same definite sort. In this instance it may seem hard to regard the first step as the most important. From one point of view, assurance that full arbitration will always precede war with little San Salvador is not a great note. But Salvador may view the matter differently; and if the treaty leads to others in Latin-America, the benefits of the plan will have become tangible. Treaties with and between the great European Powers may then begin to seem possible. In the light of Secretary Bryan's declaration that to further world peace would be his chief ambition in office, this first bit of real accomplishment entitles him to a feeling of gratification.

The resolution for the impeachment of Gov. Sulzer smacks rather too much of drag-net procedure. It looks as if the Frawley Committee were not sure of its ground and had put in about everything it could think of—including some matters upon which it has not taken testimony, so far as we are aware—in order to meet every objection. Lest it be alleged that it is seeking to impeach the Governor for acts committed prior to his inauguration, it asserts that he has been corrupt in office. Was it its duty to report that the Governor "wilfully and corruptly made false public statements"? This only weakens the effect of the indictment. There should have been no appearance of haste in this matter. It is of the utmost importance to the State that this State trial should proceed in an orderly and dignified way, and that the Governor be given not only every right, but due and proper consideration. We believe that he should have resigned, but if he chooses to face trial, then he is entitled to fair play, and the State's reputation will suffer further if this most solemn proceeding is not conducted with scrupulous consideration for the rights of the accused.

If the case of Judge Ben B. Lindsey is to be submitted to the voters of Denver under the recall, we do not envy the task of the citizens in deciding whether the Judge has or has not made good in office. Writing to the Boston Transcript, a well-known Boston clergyman, the Rev. A. A. Berle, just back from Colorado, says: "If you want thrills in Denver, all you have to do is to mention Judge Lindsey. He is the best of men, the worst of men, the idol of righteousness, and the demon of iniquity. You take your choice." . . . Mr. Berle thinks that in the last analysis the question will turn upon the character and intelligence of the authorities one consults and accepts. Many men of eminence in public affairs assured Mr. Berle that Judge Lindsey was "neither by temperament, ability, nor any other qualification, the man to be at the head of the Juvenile Court." Among the university-bred population, he reports, "I could not run down any man who would give him unqualified endorsement, while the overwhelming opinion was such as to make the whole Lindsey story as the country knows it and his Juvenile Court one of the hugest gold bricks the country has ever had passed out to it." He feels, too, that the court record of Judge Lindsey's action in eighty-four cases of criminal assault upon young girls shows that the court "sadly needs overhauling." On the other hand, we have newspapers, like the Philadelphia North American, asserting that all this is merely "the Beast" at work again, and raising funds to help Judge Lindsey defend himself. It seems to be a case rather for a careful judicial inquiry than for rough judgment by the voters.

The death of Senator Johnston, of Alabama, is the second event of the kind to impair the narrow Democratic majority in the upper house of Congress. The loss of Senator Rayner was peculiarly hard, from a party point of view, not only because of his fine debating ability, but because it came at one of those rare times when a Republican Governor sits at Annapolis. Accordingly, as the Legislature was not in session and would not be for a year, a Republican took Rayner's place. Equally untimely is Senator Johnston's death. Ordinarily, the Governor of Alabama would have named a successor, a Democrat, of course, and the party strength would remain as before. But with the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment, all existing laws relating to the filling of vacancies in the Senate were swept away, along with the old provision for the election of Senators. And in Alabama, as in Maryland, the Legislature has not met since the adoption of the Amendment. If Senator Rayner's death had occurred after the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment, the Democratic majority would have been reduced by one instead of two.

The extraordinarily heavy mortality among aviators in the course of the present year may be accounted for in two ways. One is that airmen are constantly pressing forward to the solution of more difficult problems involving greater hazard to life. The other explanation is that the proportional number of accidents is really no greater than formerly. Airmanship has become a profession that must now count its followers by the thousand. Aeroplane flights which a few years ago were topics for newspaper record are now a matter of almost daily routine; it is aerial journeys across or between continents that we are now interested in. If complete statistics of the number of miles traversed by all aviators since the beginning of the present year were available, it might well appear that the mortality rate is not so high as we imagine it to be. At the same time, it must remain a puzzle why, after so many years of aeroplane building, fatalities due to structural defects should be common. It seems to be agreed that Col. F. S. Cody was killed because his machine buckled and broke under the weight of its engine. Surely, if a standard for testing materials is essential in any field it is in this hazardous profession.

People who form their ideas of Chicago from the sort of novel that ocean liners carry should notice the verdict of Maurice Browne, the English founder of the Little Theatre there. He went to Chicago with the usual misgivings. His thought was that he would need five years to establish himself. But as in the first season he not only paid all expenses, but recouped half of his capital outlay, he would naturally be expected to say handsome things of the city. Is it against the charge of rampant commercialism that he defends it? Not at all—a public that would crowd to see Professor Murray's translation of Æschylus, besides Synge, Yeats, Maeterlinck, and Sudermann in an amber and white setting, with Japanese designs, makes such considerations ridiculous. Mr. Browne's defiance is hurled instead at those who accuse the city of the effete and degenerate neuroticism of Vienna. He cites the failure of attendance upon Schnitzler's "Anatol" and Strindberg's "Creditors" as evidence that "public taste in Chicago is not so decadent as has been maintained." On the contrary, sanity of view leans to the other extreme. Commenting on the Chicagoans' desire for an American drama, he predicts local playwrights and a local theatre, "if they can steer clear on the one hand of their sentimental enthusiasm, and on the other of their moral uplift idea." Londoners can probably form little idea of Chicago's amazement when it learns that this manager thought such a line of vindication demanded. Her citizens may appreciate modern drama—but Schnitzlerism and old-world decadence! As a French critic has just pointed out, they regard themselves as altogether too busy for such things.

The case against the shabby policy pursued by this Government with regard to its Ambassadors abroad is too strong to be prejudiced even by the somewhat exaggerated position assumed by our Ambassador to Germany. That Mr. Gerard should be compelled to pay out in rent $1,500 more than his salary is, at first sight, an imposition and a disgrace, but the sense of outrage is somewhat mitigated by the consideration that $1,500 more than the salary means $19,000. For that sum one can obtain a very comfortable home, even in New York. In Berlin a rental of 80,000 marks is a very handsome figure indeed. It recalls what Mr. Dooley said about our Ambassador at St. Petersburg driving from his residence to the comparatively squalid quarters of the Czar.

For some years there has been a rather acrid debate over the relation of Charlotte Brontë to Prof. Constantin Heger (the name is properly so spelled, without an accent), the master of the school at Brussels and the original of the hero of "Villette." Now, at last, Dr. Paul Heger, son of Charlotte's teacher, has presented to the British Museum four letters of Charlotte to his father, and these have been published in the London Times of July 29 and 30, with an English translation by Marion H. Spielmann and various comments. There is nothing to regret in the publication. The writer's character comes out unscathed, rather ennobled, if changed to us in any way. But the letters show that she brought back with her to Haworth a longing for the society of the man she revered as her master, and a craving to hear from him. In one letter, the third, the note becomes passionate with revolt against the isolation of her life. We transcribe a few lines from Miss Spielmann's translation:

Mr. Taylor has returned. I asked him if he had a letter for me. "No; nothing." "Patience," said I, "his sister will be here soon." Miss Taylor has returned. "I have nothing for you from Monsieur Heger," says she; "neither letter nor message." . . .

Day and night I find neither rest nor peace. In sleep I am disturbed by tormenting dreams in which I see you, always severe, always grave, always incensed against me. . . .

I know that you will be irritated when you read this letter. You will say once more that I am hysterical [or neurotic]—that I have black thoughts, etc. So be it, Monsieur; I do not seek to justify myself; I submit to every sort of reproach. All I know is, that I cannot, that I will not, resign myself to lose wholly the friendship of my master. I would rather suffer the greatest physical pain than always have my heart lacerated by smarting regrets. . . .

It would not be easy to characterize with a word the state of the writer's heart and mind as she made this piteous appeal; she herself would have shrunk from any such analysis of her feelings. But it is clear that this passionate regret helped to form the genius that went into the making of "Villette" and "Jane Eyre."

A recent suit for libel in England was treated by press and public as if it were big with the fate of the Empire. The newspapers printed columns about the trial, and it was the one subject of conversation. Yet it was only a horse-trainer prosecuting the editor of a Turf paper for asserting that he was crooked. This trainer, however, Wooton by name, had for years been a great figure in the racing world. As a skilled handler of horses, he had had noble and even royal clients. As witnesses to his good character Lord Derby and Lord Durham appeared in court. And he had the eminent K.C., Mr. F. E. Smith, conduct his case. The defendant's plea was justification. Himself not above suspicion for having been mixed up in racing scandals, he managed his own trial in a somewhat irregular way, legally speaking, but with a great deal of effect. His cross-examination of Wooton was most severe; and on the strength of admissions wrung from that witness, and of independent evidence introduced, he boldly argued to the jury that what he had alleged was no libel but the exact truth—namely, that there was a betting "ring" on the Turf, of which Wooton was chief agent, and that horses were "pulled," that there was "in-and-out racing," and that stables deliberately waged in private against the horses with which they had "declared to win." Apparently, the jury was impressed, for it promptly brought in a verdict giving Wooton one farthing damages, and at its announcement the courtroom broke into applause. The grave implications of this outcome are everywhere admitted in England. It is taken as proof positive that, as one newspaper puts it, the Turf in England has become too "slippery" for an honest man to stand on. We know, however, that there is Scriptural warrant for saying that sinners stand on slippery places.

The findings of the court-martial in the case of the German War Office and the Krupps are in line with the contentions advanced by an exceptionally tender-hearted prosecutor, that the charge of betrayal of army secrets resolves itself into a question of a few "quill drivers babbling over their beer." An odd half-dozen lieutenants have received light sentences. No army official of standing has been involved. The principal lesson of the whole affair would thus seem to be that the Krupp management ought to revise its office procedure in the direction of avoiding waste. The agents of this huge corporation have been spending time and money in the entertainment of petty lieutenants and clerks, when all the world knows that the Krupps are virtually a department of the German Government and army, and as such in possession of secrets of the highest importance. This close connection between Berlin and Essen stands affirmed in the words of the court, and so lends added strength to the main implication of Dr. Liebknecht's original charge that there is in Germany, as in other countries, an unduly intimate bond between the war-makers and the gun and armor-makers.

The Balkan allies emerge from the recent conflict with gains disproportionate to the value of their achievements against the hereditary enemy, the Turk. Without accepting the theory that it is Bulgaria alone that decided the outcome of the war, her efforts in Thrace making the Greek and Servian campaigns a matter of routine victory, it is true that on Bulgaria fell the heaviest fighting and loss. Her gains under the treaty of Bucharest are estimated at 10,000 square miles of territory, with a population of one million. The new Bulgaria will have about 45,000 square miles. Servia apparently doubles her original area of 18,000 square miles. Greece's territorial gains are about the same as Bulgaria's, but it is choice ground, with a large population, including Salonica, the second largest city south of the Danube; her new area should be about the same as that of Servia. Since the latter country gets no foothold on the sea, and is therefore dependent upon Greece for an outlet, it is to be assumed that the alliance between the two countries will hold for some time, and that Bulgaria's dream of a confederated Balkan State, with herself playing the part of Prussia, remains a dream.

The reported flight of Sun Yat-Sen apparently signalizes the failure of the revolutionary movement in Southern China. Even the cycles of modern Cathay can move too fast. What the President of the Chinese Republic, in his statements to the press, would describe as a rebellion set on foot by self-seeking and disgruntled politicians, is, of course, something more than that. The Peking authorities cite a number of revolutionary leaders by name, but they make no mention of Dr. Sun Yat-Sen, who appears to have been the animating spirit in the present uprising of the radical South against the North, precisely as he was the prime mover in the revolution which drove the Manchus from the throne. Self-interest may or may not enter into Sun Yat-Sen's motives, but his political views are sufficient in themselves to explain the revolt against Yuan Shi-Kai. The aim of Sun Yat-Sen has been the establishment of a socialist republic. If he retired from his post as Provisional President of China to make way for Yuan Shi-Kai, it was because he probably perceived that, for the time being, the firm establishment of the republic, as against a monarchical reaction, was the immediate need of the moment. Whether he considers that the time has now come for putting his radical beliefs into effect, or only regards President Yuan as a menace to the entire republican order, a principle is at stake in the present contest. People who know Sun Yat-Sen have described him as an interesting blend of the man of action and the visionary.

WILSON AND LEGISLATION.

President Wilson made it abundantly clear, both before and after his election, that he expected to have a very real and direct connection with Congressional legislation. He spent no time in explaining the justification of such a course by the Constitution; though we suppose that a good lawyer could, if pressed, find all the warrant necessary in the provision entitling the Executive to "recommend" to Congress "such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." This power, with all its implications, Woodrow Wilson quietly took for granted; and never veiled his purpose to have an active part in law-making. This intent of his was, of course, heightened in expression when he went in person to Congress to read his two messages, and when he calmly referred to the members of Congress as "colleagues" with him in the legislative branch of the Government. Thus his theory of the relation of the President to legislation has never been in doubt. But what of his practice? This extraordinary session of Congress deserves the name in more senses than one; in no respect more than for showing the country how a leading man as President can powerfully affect the passage of laws.

It is well to stand off a moment and see what has been happening. In the midst of momentous changes and events, we become habituated to them and lose a due sense of their significance. We may have lived, with the poet, in a perfect star, yet seen it not when we walked therein. But it is certain that any intelligent and detached observer of American affairs—Mr. Bryce, for instance, or Ostrogorski—would regard what has been going on at Washington since April 7 as of capital importance in the history of the development of the President's function. For he would not fail to see that it is the President who has been the chief driving force behind the two great measures that have been occupying the attention of Congress. Both these measures it is now expected will be enacted into law before the extra session expires. If they are, they will constitute an achievement without a parallel in the annals of the American Presidency.

The tariff bill it was comparatively easy to get going. To it the Democratic party was freshly pledged, and the country was ready for the work. But the personal wishes of President Wilson were early stamped upon the bill. It was on his initiative that wool was made free, and sugar ultimately free. This was much to have accomplished, yet the President has done a great deal more by holding his party together successfully, and acting as a kind of dynamo to furnish energy for pushing the bill. But the great wonder is that, along with this bill, by itself enough to fill the mind and exhaust the strength of the ordinary Executive, President Wilson should have had the resource and boldness to devise a measure of still more far-reaching importance. Last May, the possibility of getting a currency bill through at this session of Congress was openly scoffed at by the old Congressional hands in Washington. The President was dreaming. The thing was preposterous. But Mr. Wilson steadily kept at it. First he succeeded in getting the plan tolerated; then it was discussed; then a bill was framed, which was sharply criticised—as it deserved to be—has since been amended and improved until, in its essentials, it has won the approval of the best economic and banking opinion of the country; and now, as crowning miracle, the belief in Washington is veering round to the conviction that the bill will actually be made law before the snow flies.

There is something impressive in the mere promise of such a remarkable record of work done in Wilson's first six months; but the more deeply interesting thing, after all, is the man behind the work. Nothing is so fascinating in public life as the study of a new personality wreaking itself upon old tasks. What are Wilson's methods? Who will tell us the secret of his influence? Outwardly, he has been the least assertive and ostentatious of Executives. To his immediate predecessors he offers the sharpest contrast. He has made no speeches. In blustering or bragging he has never indulged, and he has not gone out on the steps of the White House and called any man a liar. Nor has he allowed himself to be pulled hither and thither in good-natured non-resistance. He has stuck closely to his job. No head of a great corporation could have more rigidly kept office hours, or displayed more industry. Yet somehow, from this business President sitting at his desk, there has come an impulse and a sustained force which have made the legislation that looked impossible two months ago seem to-day almost within sight.

Such effects come by cause, yet it may not be easy to analyze the cause. The work which President Wilson has done ranks him among the skilful politicians, in the high sense of that term, and we are always trying to get at the sources of a politician's power. But we can seldom put the finger on them. Gladstone said that the successful politician was the hardest of all men to understand; he himself had studied many, but was not sure that he had really comprehended more than one or two. It would be folly to attempt as yet anything like a complete account of the ways in which President Wilson works his will. It is evident, however, that he is a firm believer in the light which comes from the striking of mind on mind. He has the historic English conception of taking counsel as a means of arriving, first at wisdom, and then at action. No discussion seems to him properly ended which does not close with the words: "Now, let's to business." And he must also have a fine instinct for the higher strategies of public affairs, knowing when to strike and when to bide his time; and withal a just idea of the value of steady pounding on one idea. Whatever his secret—and we can only guess at it—the fact remains that in the deftest yet most unpretentious manner President Wilson has thus far more powerfully shaped more important legislation than any Executive of our time.

THE REVISED BANKING BILL.

The important changes made by the House Committee in the banking and currency bill, which they submitted to the party caucus in the House last Monday, affect three main divisions—that which prescribes the powers of the national supervisory board, that which provides for issue and redemption of notes, and that which arranges for disposition of the 2 per cent. bonds now pledged against national bank circulation. Criticism from the start converged largely on the power, granted to the national board, to require one regional central bank to discount paper of another. This power, in the original bill, was wholly unrestricted. As amended, it may be exercised only "in time of emergency," only on a vote in which "all members of the board are present and concurring," and only on the basis of a higher interest rate than that prevailing in either of the districts affected.

Certain other powers assigned to the national board—to suspend for thirty days, and for fifteen-day intervals thereafter, "any and every reserve requirement"; to "grant in whole or in part, or to reject entirely," the application of a regional reserve bank for notes; to hold subject to its own review the official discount rate fixed by the regional central banks, and, in the matter of rediscounts by such regional banks, "to determine and define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount"—were also criticised, when the original bill was published, as altogether too unrestricted. In the amended bill, the clauses conferring these powers are left unchanged; but they are modified by a wholly new provision for an Advisory Council, to be made up of as many members as there are regional central banks; each of those banks to elect one member.

This Council is to have power, of its own initiative, to confer directly with the national board, to present to it formal recommendations of policy, and to call for information on any fact relating to that policy; but the fact that it is to have no actual veto power on policies of the national board, has caused a good deal of not unnatural question as to its usefulness in operation. Inevitably, however, a council of so official and representative a character, and endowed with such specific functions by the banking bill itself, would exert great influence. In the light of ordinary precedent, we can scarcely imagine the national board exercising any of the very large powers above referred to without first consulting the Advisory Council. We are inclined, nevertheless, to regard as a weak point in the bill the lack of any provision requiring at least the submission of such proposed policies to the Council, for its advice and judgment, before taking action on them.

The section regulating issue of notes has been radically altered. In its original shape, the bill merely provided for note issues, up to $500,000,000, based on deposit of commercial assets and secured by 33 1-3 per cent. of "gold or lawful money." No provision was made either for automatic retirement of such notes, or for retirement or conversion of the present bond-secured circulation. It established, therefore, nothing except an "emergency currency," with undoubted possibilities of inflation.

This section was first amended so as to provide for the funding into 3 per cent. Government bonds of the 2 per cents now pledged against circulation, at the rate of 5 per cent. of a given bank's holdings every year. The new bonds would not possess the "circulation privilege"; no bank should receive the new notes to a greater extent than its previous holdings of the old ones, and, after the passage of the law, no bank should be allowed to issue circulating notes in any other form than that established in the act. It was at once pointed out, first, that this was bound to depreciate the 2 per cents, because their "circulation privilege" was thus summarily withdrawn, and, secondly, that no provision was yet made to insure automatic redemption.

In the bill as finally amended and as now before the House, both of these very serious defects are dealt with. The first objection has been met by a provision that, pending the twenty years in which conversion of the 2 per cents into Government 3s without the "circulation privilege" is allowed, "every national bank may continue to apply for and receive circulating notes . . . based upon the deposit of 2 per centum bonds," or of any other bonds available for such purpose under the present law. Quite as important as this, an amendment is added whereby notes of the new description, issued by banks in a given district, shall bear a distinctive letter or number, and such notes, when received by the regional central bank of another district, "shall be returned for redemption to the Federal reserve bank through which they were originally issued," or shall be redeemed and cancelled through the United States Treasury. This new provision is of the greatest importance; it converts a potentially inflationist measure into one which provides scientifically for an elastic currency.

THE COST OF EUGENICS.

Good causes, like good people, must often pray to be saved from their friends. The eugenic idea has suffered much at the hands of the eugenists. If one needs assurance on this point one need only compare the extraordinary welter of beliefs and claims which have gathered around the term eugenics with the provisions of such a law as went into effect in Pennsylvania two weeks ago, and has been consistently described in the newspapers as the "eugenic" marriage license law. Henceforth, in that State, it is necessary for candidates for marriage to appear at the License Bureau in person and make sworn reply to forty-eight questions. Among other things, one is required to say whether he or she is imbecile, epileptic, or suffers from a transmissible disease. Pennsylvania is not so exacting as Wisconsin, which requires a physician's certificate instead of a mere affidavit. But the principle is the same. Studying that principle in all its implications, one may approve or doubt, but there is no incentive to the feeling of contemptuous aversion and disgust which the eugenic idea as exploited by its reckless votaries has aroused among thinking people.

For what these facile race-breeders, human stud-farm trainers, and supermen cultivators have done is to violate the sense of the dignity of life and of the individual, the complex of tradition and sentiment and instinct rooted in the heart of man, the wisdom of civilization's experience. It has been hard to keep patient with these peculiarly offensive examples of the "forgawdsaker" class, as H. G. Wells has called it. "For Gawd's sake, let's reconstruct the human type, just as we are reconstructing the art of bricklaying." To be sure, there has been no occasion for alarm. One might know that their absurd claims would yield before the commonsense and the higher sense that regulate the broad conditions of life. As embodied in a marriage license law, like those of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, eugenics ceases to be a fantasy of magazine science and becomes an issue of distinct appeal to the minds and consciences of reasonable men.

The usual objection to sumptuary laws will hold only in part against this drastic example of sumptuary legislation. It is not a paradox to say that Wisconsin's or Pennsylvania's marriage regulations may be generally evaded without destroying their usefulness. For many years to come their results must be expected to be educational rather than actually preventive. The Philadelphia newspapers speak of the embarrassment of the prospective brides when confronted with the awkward question concerning transmissible disease. It is precisely this hesitation to confront a question so deeply affecting a woman's happiness and that of her children that the new law ought to educate away. The law may not be directly effective in preventing diseased parentage; but it can set a stigma on disease. By dint of mere repetition the law can popularize the ideal that men should enter marriage free from guilty physical taint. Fear of the law's penalties for perjury will be far less efficacious in the outcome than the daily process of emphasizing the need of higher standards of conduct and greater frankness in the relation between prospective husband and wife.

Such is the gain which one may reasonably expect from legislation of this nature. The gain will have to be paid for; that is certain. How large the cost will be, the future must say. The price may be a heavy one; it will be exacted in many forms. We have already spoken of the first obvious result that attends all sumptuary legislation. There will be evasion of the law; there will be false swearing; there will be wide opportunity for maladministration of the law by the agents of the State. A broader consideration is connected with the well recognized rule that when marriage is made too difficult, immorality ensues. The tragic fact must be faced that the physical effects of vice among the men of every civilized community are widespread, and the strict enforcement of a law no more drastic than Wisconsin's would produce marked social changes. Will the eugenist's gains be counterbalanced by the statistics on the social evil?

Objections of a broader nature are based on the consideration that in many phases the modern spirit is hostile to the perfect functioning of laws of this kind. The physician is to be made the arbiter of our most intimate destinies at a time when a great many people are increasingly disinclined to take the physician and his craft so seriously as might be. It may be that this growing skepticism is due to the very progress which has been made in the study of the laws of health and disease. Discoveries are coming so fast as to render few discoveries absolutely stable. How, for instance, shall we define "transmissible disease"? With regard to one form, and the most serious of all, of course there is general agreement. But what of plagues like cancer, or tuberculosis? The latter is, strictly speaking, not a transmissible disease, in the sense that it is not an hereditary disease. But tuberculosis in the tenement districts is virtually as transmissible as if it were hereditary. How will the law regard it? The wide implications of eugenic marriage legislation can only be suggested here.

LOCAL AND SPECIAL EXPOSITIONS.

The refusal or hesitation of various European nations to exhibit at the San Francisco Exposition, to the apparent chagrin of its directors, should do more than call attention to the fact that such fairs have been overdone. Since 1901 we have had the Pan-American, the St. Louis, the Jamestown, the Alaska-Yukon, the Lewis and Clark Expositions, and now we are planning a sixth. The recent international decision that it was inadvisable to attempt exhibits more than once in three years would fall heavily on the United States alone. But the present attitude of European countries might point another lesson. Why insist that all our expositions should be international?

There seems to have been a feeling that it is impossible for a national or local exhibition to attract either tourists or interested inquirers. Since the Centennial there has not even been a State exposition that has aroused marked attention. Some municipalities—Boston, Chicago, and other cities—have planned industrial exhibitions upon a small scale, as an evidence chiefly of city patriotism. But no enterprise of this kind has ever reached any magnitude, while a national exposition has as yet been all but unheard of. The genuine artistic and industrial impulse has been wanting. The public base their judgment of an exposition too largely upon its size, its pomposity, its cosmopolitan air, and the gay waving of foreign flags above it, to have taken kindly to the other idea.

The local or special exposition should not come, of course, as a mere substitute forced by the impossibility of procuring exhibits from abroad. It ought to answer to a definite demand. When the various sections and States become competitively interested in one another's products—their arts and crafts, their styles of architecture, interior and exterior, their schools of furniture and metal design, the lines along which painting and sculpture are developing—it will follow as an educational and commercial need. As exchanges of ideas these expositions will not require huge palaces of stucco and plaster; simple, substantial halls, designed with an eye to lighting and interior attractiveness, will better harmonize with the exhibits. Nor will they be founded upon a patriotic fervor. They may seem to hark back to such occasions as the early European fairs, of which Paris alone held a dozen between 1800 and 1855. But their spirit, at once utilitarian and artistic, will be different. They should represent not so much the impulse towards amusement or sight-seeing or celebration, as an effort to compare the best social and household conveniences, the best articles of ordinary manufacture, of the various workshops, designing rooms, and factories of the country. Withal, they should be to the casual European or South American visitor an index to the products and artistic by-products of American life.

In Germany notably, fairs of this kind have become almost a matter of course in recent years. In Munich, in Baden, in Dresden, in Nuremberg, in Leipzig, frequent expositions of the work of local and national shops and ateliers draw studious visitors from all over Western Europe. Arts-and-crafts exhibitions have virtually become an annual affair, moving from city to city. That at Dresden in 1906, and at Munich in 1908, attracted wide attention, if from nothing but the novelty of the designs offered. This summer three Kunstausstellungen have been held in three different sections—one at Berlin, one at Munich, and one at Düsseldorf. In spite of the fact that all three, and especially the one at Munich, with its 3,600 objects, have provided foreign rooms, they are predominantly German. Nor do the expositions of art and industry differ greatly in a land whose chief boast is that it has united art and manufacture. From the interiors of Biedermeier to those of Müller's disciples, from the exhibits of the Berlin Porcelain Company to those of the Dresden works, the rooms are imbued with an artistic personality which gives the keenest zest to competition. And from a long succession of model dining-rooms, offices, kitchens, and halls filled with manufactured goods, the visitor passes into galleries hung with paintings or set with pedestalled statuary. It is possible for an architect or designer to found a school through the medium of such exhibitions alone. And their commercial and advertising value, as well as their contribution to public taste, is incalculable. Munich recently enrolled its millionth visitor for the year. Their educational value has resulted in a great expansion of their scope. Leipzig is now engaged, as Frankfort was some years ago, in an exhibition of books and bookbinding. Karlsruhe has originated a travelling Kunstausstellung. Düsseldorf last year held an "exhibition of city building," with 600 exhibitors, and 4,000 articles grouped under such heads as Industry, Civil Engineering, and Sanitary Arrangements. With its historical and modern town pictures, its models and photographs of remarkable monuments and buildings, its reproductions relating to the designing of streets and drainage plants, the whole was nothing short of an illustrated history of German towns.

From such local and popular expositions, founded upon a sober, businesslike desire for instruction in industry and art, and a hope to further their development, the promoters of American expositions might learn much. Our present State fairs are remotely comparable to them. They are attended by a class seriously intent upon the lessons to be derived from a comparative range of farm products, machinery, and appurtenances, they depend upon public and not governmental support, and their exhibitions are local in character. Such expositions as the Europeans have could well take the place of half our struggling international exhibitions, exchanging for the glitter of foreign bazaars a healthier interest in national endeavor. They would relieve us of the charge of a silly infatuation with world's fairs, as also of their expense and waste.

ROBERT C. OGDEN.

A whole section of this country should mourn the death of Robert C. Ogden. A man of unusual business sagacity and rare success, living in a prosperous Northern city, what was it that led him to devote every spare moment to the educational awakening of the South? What made him the leader in a crusade for learning which for unselfishness and in devotion to the interests of the lowly has scarcely been surpassed? Why was it that in ever quiet, modest, unassuming ways he went about the South laboring for its mental and spiritual advancement, unsparing of his purse and of himself? Primarily, we think, it was the greatness of his heart; no just appeal to it ever failed. Then it was the genuine patriotism of the man, that earnest wish to be of help to the masses of his fellow human beings, which is at the bottom of every deeply religious nature. It was as if he saw in every little child upon which his gaze fell on his trips to the South the possibility of a Phillips Brooks, an S. C. Armstrong, or a Lincoln, and he burned forthwith with the desire to smooth that child's path so that it might have free play for such talents as Providence had bestowed upon it.

As a boy, Mr. Ogden was one of the New York militia called out to repel the raid of Lee into Pennsylvania. Not unnaturally for one of his sympathies, he enlisted after the war at Hampton under a great general of peace—Armstrong. He was one of those quick to see that the real problems of the war did not end with Appomattox, and that many of dread import began upon that field. Without guile, without enmity towards anybody, he brought to the work at Hampton a zeal and a skill which, after many decades, ended but yesterday. Hampton without Mr. Ogden? It hardly seems possible, were it not that Dr. Frissell is there to labor on, and had not they together builded for the future as well as the present. But modest as he was, and ever insistent upon effacing his own personality, the time came when Mr. Ogden had to enter the whole field of education in the South. With Dr. J. L. M. Curry he was a leading spirit at the Capon Springs Conference in 1898, which must ever be recalled as a landmark in the true reconstruction of the South.

Out of this gathering has grown the annual Southern Educational Conference over which Mr. Ogden regularly presided with rare grace, dignity, and tact, until failing health forbade. To it he took for years, on a special train, men and women who labor in similar fields, and mould public opinion—in the North at least. "Excursions into ennobling experiences"—a gifted pen has termed these trips with complete accuracy; such they are, not only for those pilgrims from the States with compulsory education, but for those who come in ever-increasing numbers from the South itself. Momentous things have happened since that small beginning. In almost innumerable communities the public conscience has been quickened and the community spirit aroused. As a result of these conferences came the Southern Education and General Education Boards, with their stupendous Rockefeller benefactions, and a great movement is thus well under way.

Rarely is it given to a man to reap such a harvest of good will and behold such fruits of his labors as did Mr. Ogden. This, we fancy, may have made it hard for him to feel that the end of his labors was at hand; such demonstrations of personal affection as were his at the annual gatherings no man could receive unmoved or relinquish without pain. The attacks of prejudice, the abuse of those special interests and capitalists who saw in State-wide education in the South merely an effort to end the exploitation of the bodies and souls of mill-children, these recoiled from the serenity of his character all but unnoted. He knew how to value and how to disregard them, and his gaze was bent not upon the obstacles, but upon the incalculable benefits to be gained when every Southern child, white or black, should have that education which is its birthright. To some it seemed at times as if his methods were too complacent and too conciliatory; as if there was some lack of the fiery indignation of the reformer. But Mr. Ogden's tactics and his character corresponded; and out of all the complex of emotions and of men inevitable in so far-reaching and difficult a crusade, his figure stands out as that of a constructive educational statesman of first rank—a courteous, kindly, generous-hearted, high-minded man, whose modesty and self-effacement alone prevented his being a great national figure.

SCANDINAVIAN BOOKS.

BERGEN, Norway, July 30.

When Sweden's most prominent lyric poet, Gustaf Frøding, died last year, he left behind a certain amount of work in manuscript, some of it being merely fragments. He had given permission to his nurse, Miss Trotzig, to go through it and select for publication whatever she and the publisher might find to be of sufficient worth. The result is a volume entitled "Reconvalescentia," with the sub-title "Gustaf Frødings sista dikter" ("Gustaf Frøding's Last Poems"), a small book of about 100 pages of great interest (Stockholm: Wahlström & Widstrand). The poems are nearly all characteristic of Frøding and some of them show him to have been a wonderful master of rhythm and form. Not unnaturally, the gloom of his later years left its mark on his work; yet the "Värmländska låtar" ("Tunes from Värmland"), included in the volume, have the same musical charm which gave distinction to his earlier verses. Other recent books of poetry deserving attention are "Antika Kaméer" ("Antique Cameos"), by Sigurd Agrell, "Dåd och dröm" ("Deeds and Dreams"), by Bertil Malmberg, and "På vaxtafla" ("On Wax-Tablet"), by Torsten Fogelqvist. The first-named is the most noteworthy, but all three show abundantly that Sweden is still rich in lyric poets.

Four essays on Robespierre by the Swedish historian, Johannes Heüman, put together into a small volume of 100 pages, are of great interest. The author aims to show that Robespierre was the grand tragic figure of his revolutionary age and the faithful guardian of Rousseau's impracticable democratic ideas. If Robespierre had fought for these ideas and hidden his personality, he might have succeeded in becoming the leader of his people, the author maintains, but it was his tragic fate to be guided by his personality. The little book does not intend to be a biography, but contributes much to a just valuation of Robespierre and his relation to the revolutionary movement.

Among new Norwegian books must be mentioned a great national work, "Vore høvdinger" ("Our Chieftains"), published by subscription, through F. Bruns, of Trondhjem. The work contains short biographical sketches of the most prominent Norwegians of all eras in political and economic life, or in the branches of literature, science, and art, each article being accompanied by a large and handsomely executed picture of the subject; it is edited by the professor of history at the University of Christiania, Halvdan Koht. The text is furnished by the best authorities in the country. Though each sketch is very short, never running beyond four large quarto pages, the writers have succeeded in compressing the most essential facts and characterizations into this narrow frame. So far seven parts have appeared; the publication of the remaining twenty-seven parts will be completed, it is hoped, by the spring of next year, when Norway celebrates the centenary of her independence. Each part contains two biographical sketches, and the whole work will include seventy pictures. The price is 1 krone for each part. This monumental work ought to prove valuable not only as a reference book, but as a fitting memorial of Norway's intellectual achievements.

A somewhat similar work, also published by subscription, is Per Nissen's "Fædrelandet" ("The Fatherland"), being published in parts by H. Aschehoug & Co., Christiania. This book is a popular description of Norway, dealing with the geography of the country, trade and economic conditions, Norwegian institutions, Constitution and administration, military relations, communications, education, art and industry, and so forth. It aims to be a practical and accurate guide, and, to judge from the way in which it begins, the purpose is likely to be fulfilled. The author was until recently a general in the Norwegian army, and besides possessing a vast store of knowledge, embracing most varied fields, he is the master of a clear and vivid style which will be apt to catch the interest of the public at large. An abundance of excellent illustrations add to the value of the work, and the price is only 50 øre for each of the twenty parts to which it will run.

The most noteworthy of new Norwegian novels is the strong and well-written story, "Eli Sjursdotter," by the young author, Johan Falkberget. It has already caught the reading public.

The Danish author, Otto Rung, is an able writer and psychologist. His works, "Sidste kamp" ("The Last Battle"), "Skyggernes tog" ("The March of the Shadows"), "Lønkammeret" ("The Closet"), and his drama, "Broen" ("The Bridge"), have made him one of the most widely read and admired of Danish writers. His latest novel, "Den lange nat" ("The Long Night"), recently published, maintains his high standard. It has an adroitly woven plot, an absorbing psychological interest, and its language possesses a haunting freshness and melody. The story centres on an old usurer who has risen to a position of great independence by corrupt methods, yet whose power is gradually fading, owing to a sickness which finally bereaves him totally of his sight. So subtle is the treatment that in the end the author contrives to win over the reader's sympathy for this rather repulsive character. A pretty love-story is interwoven with the main plot. Otto Rung is not too local in his interests to be widely enjoyed.

A popular historical work, "Anno 13," by Morten Pontoppidan, gives a vivid picture of the events and conditions in Germany during the period 1806-13 and of the final throwing off of Napoleon's yoke. The book is written with strong German sympathies and pronounced admiration for the country's heroic fight for liberty. It will appeal to everybody who likes history popularly presented.

A short biography of the Danish philosopher, Harald Høffding, by Erik Rindom, contains some interesting information about a famous man and contributes to a better understanding of his position and influence. The lyric poet of Jutland, Jeppe Aakjær, has published a small volume of addresses which he has delivered on various occasions. The contents includes chapters on Robert Burns, Holger Drachmann, Bjørnson, Blicher, and discussions of more general Danish topics. They are well balanced and make a readable collection.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

There are Scott collectors, although the multiplicity and popularity of Sir Walter's writings make their pursuit perhaps more laborious than difficult. There is no adequate Scott bibliography known to me. When it appears a place should be found for this octavo pamphlet of 2[illegible] pages:

The Mauvais Pas.
A Scene in the Alps, illustrating a passage in the novel of Anne of Geirstein.
By the
Rev. Edward Stanley, M.A.
Rector of Alderley.
Not published.
Macclesfield,
Printed by J. Swinnerton, Courier and Herald Office.

It will be noted that the name of Scott's heroine is misspelled in this title, although it is correctly given in the text of the tract. "Anne of Geierstein" was published in three volumes in 1829. Lockhart tells how, one snowy morning, Scott gave some friends who were at Abbotsford the sheets of about a volume and a half to read in his library while he was at work in the adjacent room, but looked in on them occasionally. He found them delighted. Mr. J. B. S. Morritt and Sir James Steuart, of Allenbank, were both familiar with Swiss scenery, and were amazed at the happy manner in which Scott had caught the local color of a country in which he had never set foot. But Ballantyne "totally condemned" the story. It was finished before breakfast, April 29, 1829, and after breakfast Sir Walter began to write his "Compendium of Scottish History" for Lardner's Cyclopædia. Such was the zeal with which he strove to retrieve his fallen fortunes.

"Anne of Geierstein" made her public début in May, and in the September issue of Blackwood appeared "The Mauvais Pas." It is signed with the initials E. S. Another article thus signed appeared in the number for April, 1830, and is entitled "The Port of Vennasque; a scene in the Pyrenees." The fame of the brilliant son, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, has somewhat obscured that of the saintly father. Edward Stanley was born January 1, 1779, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and became, 1805, rector of Alderley, a living in the patronage of his father, Sir John Thomas Stanley, of Alderley Park, and in 1837 he was appointed Bishop of Norwich. He died September 6, 1849.

The tract must have appeared some time between 1829 and 1837.

The reader should now take down his Scott and read in the first and second chapters of "Anne of Geierstein," the account of the manner in which "Arthur Philipson" braves the dangers of the mountain path leading to the Rock of the Vulture. This is the scene of the first meeting of Arthur and Anne, the intertwining of whose fates is the theme of the story. Having thus refreshed his memory he may compare Scott's account with these quotations from Stanley's narrative of his adventure on the Mauvais Pas:

From the point where we had stepped upon the ledge, quitting the forest and underwood, this circular face of precipice commenced, continuing, without intermission, till it united itself with its corresponding headland on the right. The only communication between the two being along a ledge in the face of the precipice, varying in width from about a foot to a few inches; the surface of the said ledge, moreover, assuming the form of an inclined plane, owing to an accumulation of small particles of rock, which had, from time immemorial, shaled from the heights above, and lodged on this slightly projecting shelf. The distance, from the time taken to pass it, I guessed to be not far short of a quarter of a mile. At my foot, literally speaking (for it required but a semiquaver of the body, or the loosening of my hold, to throw the centre of gravitation over the abyss), were spread the valleys of the Dranse, through which I could perceive the river meandering like a silver thread; but, from the height at which I looked down, its rapidity was invisible, and its hoarse brawling unheard. The silence was absolute and solemn; for, fortunately, not a zephyr fanned the air, to interfere with my precarious equilibrium. . . . We had proceeded a good part of the way, when, to my dismay, the ledge, narrow as it was, became perceptibly narrower, and, at the distance of a yard or two in advance, I observed a point where it seemed to run to nothing, interrupted by a protuberant rock; I said nothing, waiting the result in silence. The guide before me, when he reached the point, threw one foot round the projection, till it was firmly placed, and holding on the rock, then brought up the other. What was I to do? Like Arthur Philipson's guide, Antonio, I could only say, "I was no goat-hunter, and had no wings to transport me from cliff to cliff like a raven."—"I cannot perform that feat," said I to the guide; "I shall miss the invisible footing on the other side, and—then!" . . . They were prepared for the case; one of them happened to have a short staff; this was handed forward, and formed a slight rail, while the other, stooping down, seized my foot, and placing it in his hand, answered, "Tread without apprehension, it will support you firmly as the rock itself; be steady—go on." I did so, and regained the ledge once more in safety. . . . Thus persevering, with the speed of a tortoise or a sloth, the solemn slow movements of hand and foot forcibly reminding me of that cautious animal, we at last drew near to a more acute point in the curve of this gaunt amphitheatre, where it bent forward towards the river, and consequently we were more immediately fronted by the precipice forming the continuation of that on which we stood. By keeping my head obliquely turned inwards, I had hitherto in great measure avoided more visual communication than I wished with the bird's-eye prospect below; but there was no possibility of excluding the smooth bare frontage of rock right ahead. There it reared itself from the clods beneath to the clouds above, without outward or visible sign of fret or fissure, as far as I could judge, on which even a chamois could rest its tiny hoof; for the width of whatever ledge it might have was diminished, by the perspective view we had of it, to Euclid's true definition of a mathematical line, namely, length without breadth. At this distance of time, I have no very clear recollection of the mode of our exit, and cannot speak positively whether we skirted any of this perilous wall of the Titans, or crept up through the corner of the curve by some fissure leading to the summit. I have, however, a very clear and agreeable recollection of the moment when I came in contact with a tough bough, which I welcomed and grasped as I would have welcomed and grasped the hand of the dearest friend I had upon earth, and by the help of which I, in a very few more seconds, scrambled upwards, and set my foot once more, without fear of slips or sliding, on a rough heathery surface, forming the bed of a ravine, which soon led us to an upland plateau, on which I stood as in the garden of Paradise.

It may be that the Alpinist of the twentieth century would be less impressed by these dangers than the nineteenth century tourist.

Stanley's tract contains also an account of the formation of the Lake of Mauvoisin by the descent of a glacier, and of the inundations of the Val de Bagnes in 1595 and 1818, drawn up from the memoir of M. Escher de la Linth.

There is in addition a preface in which Stanley states that he had some reasons for believing that the details of his adventure had reached the ears of Sir Walter Scott and furnished him with the groundwork for the perilous meeting of Anne and Arthur.

The rarity of "The Mauvais Pas" may be judged by its absence both from the British Museum Catalogue and from Martin's monograph on Privately Printed Books.

"OF THE PEOPLE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your recent editorial on Lincoln's Gettysburg Address suggested to me that perhaps you or some of your readers might be able to furnish some light on a question which has interested me of late—the exact significance of the phrase "of the people."

In quoting the words you follow the usual punctuation, that of Lincoln's final authorized version. The customary emphasis given by speakers fits this punctuation, and I suppose would be not unfairly represented by writing thus: "and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." That is, the phrases are treated as logically coördinate and of equal importance, and we have a threefold description of the type of government which Lincoln desired "should not perish from the earth." This way of taking the words seems open to one rather serious objection—the difficulty of giving to the preposition "of" a clear-cut meaning which shall distinguish it from, and entitle it to rank as a true coördinate with, the prepositions "by" and "for." Probably the explanation most commonly given would be that "of" is equivalent to "originating with," "deriving its sanction and ultimate authority from," the people.

The form of the words, at least, would seem to admit another interpretation. The "of" might express the objective-genitive relation of our Latin and Greek grammars, and "government of the people," in the sense of "government exercised over the people," be taken as the common base of the expression; this "government of the people" characterized, with a twofold emphasis, as "by" and "for" the people would then give us the type of government which Lincoln sought to have perpetuated. With this view we should drop the first comma in writing, the stress on "of" in speaking. Or it might be still better to think of each phrase as modifying all that goes before it—to omit both the first and second commas (as Lincoln himself did in his original draft), and to give a crescendo emphasis in delivery which might be indicated thus: "and that government of the people by the people FOR the people shall not perish," etc.

The double possibility of interpretation has probably occurred to many. The second, or "objective," explanation of "of" here seems to have several considerations, historical as well as logical, in its favor. The questions I should like to ask are: (1) Was any interpretation covering this point ever given by Lincoln himself? (2) Have we any testimony from one who heard him speak as to the emphasis, pauses, or intonations with which these words were uttered? (3) Has the question here raised been discussed anywhere in print?

THE NEW LAUREATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "There will be disappointment in some quarters over the selection of Robert Bridges as poet laureate," so said the Nation, in its issue of July 24, and so there was disappointment, I trust, in many quarters over what the Nation said regarding that event.

Robert Bridges surely needs no apologies on his behalf, even when they emanate from so distinguished a source as the Nation, and, above all, he is not a poet who is to be damned with faint praise. The extracts from his work given by the Nation are quite sufficient to demonstrate the high levels on which his poetic feet tread; and when we consider the great mass of that work, and the variety of it, including a large number of lyrics of a high order, including the seventy-nine sonnets that comprise "The Growth of Love," ought we not unreservedly to acclaim him, and congratulate Mr. Asquith on his keenness of discrimination?—who, indeed, may well opine that the laureateship should be bestowed, not in expectation of rewarding Odes, but rather as a crown of honor on one presumably near the close of his career. True, there is nothing of the bizarre or the violent in Bridges; he is refined without weakness, he is deep-thoughted without being too heavy for the Muse to carry; and he possesses that essential of all true art—restraint. Besides, his work is informed through and through with the spiritual, as the best poetry surely is.

His "Growth of Love" is a great performance, but as it is comprised in a series of sonnets, against which there is more or less of ignorant prejudice, it seems never to have commanded that attention it deserves. In France art makes its way, even when embodied in sonnets. For instance, Heredia stepped into the French Academy up the stairway composed entirely of the 118 sonnets of his Trophies. True, he had done other work, but it was on his sonnets that his admission was based. The sonnets of "The Growth of Love" partly follow Shakespeare's in matter of form, and many of them certainly breathe their fragrance in matter of substance. If this letter is not already too long, I would wish to include in it two of the sonnets from "The Growth of Love," No. XXVII on the modern ocean steamer, and the beautiful prayer embodied in the final sonnet.

XXVII.

The fabled sea snake, old Leviathan,
Or else what grisly beast of scaly chine
That champed the oceanwrack, and swashed the brine
Before the new and milder days of man,
Had never rib nor bray nor swindging fan
Like his iron swimmer of the Clyde or Tyne,
Late born of golden seed to breed a line
Of offspring swifter and more huge of plan.

Straight is her going, for upon the sun
When once she hath looked, her path and place are plain:
With tireless speed she smiteth one by one
The shuddering seas and foams along the main:
And her eased breath when her wild race is run
Roars through her nostrils like a hurricane.

LXXIX.

Eternal Father, who didst all create,
In whom we live and to whose bosom move,
To all men be Thy name known which is Love,
Till its loud praises sound at heaven's high gate.
Perfect Thy kingdom in our passing state,
That here on earth Thou mayst as well approve
Our service as Thou ownest theirs above
Whose joy we echo and in pain await.

Grant body and soul each day their daily bread:
And should in spite of grace fresh woe begin,
Even as our anger soon is past and dead
Be Thy remembrance mortal of our sin:
By Thee in paths of peace Thy sheep be led,
And in the vale of terror comforted.

THE ITALIAN TREASURY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: An editorial in the Nation of July 3 quotes from an article written by the ex-Minister of Italy, Luigi Luzzatti, in the Corriere della Sera, in which he spurns the charges of political corruption recently brought against his country. While not denying the gross official frauds in connection with the building of the Palace of Justice, he asserts that the Italian Treasury, since the unification of the kingdom, has been absolutely free from even a suspicion of corruption.

It may well be that no dishonesty can be laid at the door of any single official of the Italian Treasury, but to the minds of those who have lived much in Italy and know the true conditions there, the question arises at once: How about the foundation upon which that Treasury was built? Is that clean? Confiscation has a more respectable sound than the homely word robbery; but when any Italian public official flouts indignantly the charge of corruption, the thought must come to an unprejudiced onlooker; How did they get their money in the first place?

The post office, for instance, is in a noble building in the heart of the city, with beautiful cloisters enclosing a large grassplot planted with shrubs and trees, always fresh and green, a place at once suggestive of retirement, calm, and peace. Now it is never free from the pell mell of people rushing to and fro. A rather uncommon design for a post office it must seem to many, as they buy postage stamps at one of the windows opening on this most lovely cloister. How many of these visitors from other lands realize that this was the Convent of the Poor Clares, built for them, and as much their own property as are the private palaces of Rome the property of their rich owners. The Poor Clares, whose lives are spent in service among the poor, were turned out of their home by the Italian Government, and not one centime was ever paid for the property taken from them. Is that a Government immune from dishonesty?

This is only one small chapter in the long story of robbery (or "confiscation," if the term is more pleasing to modern ears) that has gone on all over the United Kingdom. The wealthy laity are unmolested, but those who give their lives in service to God and mankind are despoiled because they do not fight in their own defence. Not only church edifices and religious houses and colleges and schools have been seized by the Italian Government, but personal property, church effects, MSS., and private records of the orders, etc., etc. The list is a long one. The astronomical instruments presented to the celebrated Jesuit astronomer, Father Secchi, even after the promise had been given that these should be left untouched, were gobbled up with the rest.

Indignant protestations of immunity from all dishonesty in the official Treasury from such a Government would be amusing were it not in truth such a grim and very real tragedy. J. G. ROBINS.

Literature

THE CONTINUATION OF ROPES'S "CIVIL WAR."

The Story of the Civil War, in Continuation of the Story by John Codman Ropes. By William R. Livermore, U. S. A. Part III: The Campaigns of 1863 to July 10. Book I: Chancellorsville, Operations against Vicksburg, etc. Book II: Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Tullahoma, and Gettysburg. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 2 vols. $5 net.

It is more than fourteen years since the second volume of John Codman Ropes's "Story of the Civil War" was reviewed in these columns. In spite of some undue severities of judgment, the work took rank at once as a masterpiece of military literature, and still remains the best account of the early operations of the war. Upon the death of the author, in 1899, the publishers announced that an effort would be made to have the work continued by a competent hand; and the present volumes, together forming Part iii of the series, are the fruit of that attempt. So far as knowledge of military science goes, no more competent authority than Col. Livermore could have been procured; and he has the further advantage of having enjoyed intimate personal acquaintance with Ropes during the preparation of the original volumes.

One does not read far, however, in the volumes now published without being struck by the difference in the methods of the two authors. In accuracy and fulness of technical and general knowledge, in careful study of topography, and in attention to the details of military movements and plans, Col. Livermore is in no way inferior to his predecessor. His text, as well as his footnotes, shows thorough acquaintance with the voluminous literature, documentary and personal, of the Civil War. Yet in certain other important respects commendation must be more sparingly given. Ropes united in rare perfectness the painstaking accuracy of the scholar and military expert with the charm of the accomplished writer. In a field highly technical and detailed, he knew what to select and what to leave out. In Col. Livermore's volumes, on the other hand, it is often hard to see the forest for the trees. His pages are crammed with military detail, important and unimportant, and studded with paragraphs virtually meaningless save as the statements of the text are traced out on the map. When to this annoying lack of proportion is added a literary style rarely rising above the level of matter-of-fact narration, we have as the inevitable result a work whose bewildering details of position and manœuvre, of attack and defence, of charge and retreat, often obscure the course of events, and leave the reader with no clear impression of what is happening. There could be no more striking illustration of this defect than in Col. Livermore's account of the battle of Gettysburg, where an absolutely exhaustive analysis of the military operations affords, nevertheless, no more intelligent view of the conflict as a whole than most of the participants themselves probably enjoyed.

Qualified, however, as the praise of Col. Livermore's performance must be on all save technical points, it is nevertheless fair to remember that the period with which he deals differs, in important respects, from that which engaged the attention of Ropes. The military operations of the first twelve months of the Civil War, disheartening as most of them were to the North, had at least the interest, very significant for the historian, of the untried and the experimental. No one then knew how great the war might become or how long it might last. The operations on the Mississippi from April, 1862, on the other hand, and the campaigns of 1863 to and including Gettysburg, were the critical period of the war. Beginning with "gloomy failures" East and West, the period ends with notable Federal victories. The days of crude experiments and untrained men were passing, and those of great campaigns and grand strategy had come. Holding, as he does, that "the manner in which the troops were directed in campaign, and especially in battle, had more influence on the result than is generally appreciated" (Bk. I, p. iv), Col. Livermore is amply justified in narrating and discussing military operations more fully than did Ropes. We have no quarrel with him for dissecting every army and eviscerating every campaign. But it is also true that into this same critical period fall some of the most brilliant operations of the war. The taking of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, the sundering of the Confederacy by the recovery of the Mississippi, and the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, rank in modern warfare as operations of the first magnitude; and we cannot but regret that Col. Livermore's pages, of the highest value on the technical side, should as a rule leave the reader with the impression, not that the events were great, but only that they were extremely complicated.

To summarize either the narrative or the technical contents of these volumes would far exceed any reasonable limits of a review; and we must confine ourselves to comments upon a few points only, and to notice of a few of the author's more significant judgments. The story opens with the second attempt on Vicksburg, in July, 1862; an attempt which failed because Halleck, having divided the army which he had assembled at Corinth, was too weak to cooperate with Farragut (I, 21). On July 17 Halleck went to Washington as general-in-chief, leaving Grant in temporary command of the Armies of the Tennessee and the Mississippi. In October, Rosecrans repulsed the Confederates at Corinth, thereby insuring his own military reputation; but Col. Livermore concludes that Grant, though overestimating the strength of the enemy, and in error in supposing that his army could not live off the country, was right in cutting short the pursuit of Van Dorn beyond the Hatchie (I, 42). January, 1863, saw the failure of a third attempt on Vicksburg, the responsibility for which is to be ascribed in part to Lincoln's mistaken confidence in McClernand, in part to Halleck's effort to support Lincoln without losing Corinth, and in part to Grant's loyal attempt to carry out Halleck's orders (I, 68).

The objective points were now Vicksburg and Richmond, with the Emancipation Proclamation as an additional incentive to the vigorous prosecution of the war. Upon Hooker rested the responsibility of insuring Federal success in the East. Hooker's course at this time will probably continue to be debated for many a day to come. Col. Livermore's judgment is that, while Hooker "was accredited with skill in conducting a fight under his own eye," "his mind was not equal to the task of directing and coördinating the operations of large bodies of troops of whose relative positions he could judge only from reports" (I, 115). For his apparently rash course in dividing his army, in the face of the enemy, at the passage of the Rappahannock, the author expresses approval, on the ground that "his movements are so carefully planned that if any part of his line is attacked, it can hold its ground, or fall back until so reinforced as to outnumber the enemy" (I, 127); and although by May 1 he had lost his chance to surround or capture Lee's army, "he still retained complete control of the situation" (I, 148). For Lee's plan of attacking Hooker in flank at Chancellorsville, however, there is no praise; and Jackson's movement had the partial success that it did only "through the stupendous blunders of Hooker, and especially through the persistent negligence and blind credulity of Howard" (I, 151). After Hooker's disabling injury "it is hardly profitable any longer to consider his motives. There is, in fact, no reason to suppose that his orders would have been wise, even if he had not been struck" (I, 211, 212). The judgment is severe, but it cannot be said to be undeserved.

For Grant's course in his fourth attempt on Vicksburg, in February, 1863, there is frank and pointed criticism:

> There can hardly be a doubt but that, by some expedient, Grant could have found means, by land or water or both, to convey his men across the peninsula opposite Vicksburg; and to this end his first efforts should have been directed from the moment he decided to send his main force down the river.
> If Grant could open a route west of the Mississippi to a point south of Vicksburg where troops could embark, he could send steamers and barges without troops, protected by cotton, hay, and grain, down past the batteries to ferry the troops from New Carthage to the eastern bank; he could supply them by the same route, or by barges sent down the Mississippi; and then choose his own point of landing below, gain the bluffs, and advance to the interior, or fall back on the fleet (I, 234, 235).

In such a plan, Col. Livermore thinks, Porter would have coöperated. Had Lincoln not expressed so decided an interest in the old canal, Grant would have been saved the "series of experiments" which consumed time and diverted the enemy and the public, but in which, as he later admitted, he "never felt great confidence." For Grant's final operations behind Vicksburg, on the other hand, Col. Livermore speaks a hearty commendation, declaring them to have been "wisely and prudently conducted," and a more than ample offset to his "imprudence" at Shiloh and his "repeated failures to reach Vicksburg by other routes" (II, 328). The later surrender of Port Hudson, however, was not due to the fall of Vicksburg, but to the greater success of the siege operations and the exhaustion of the garrison (II, 401).

Nearly half of Part ii is devoted to Gettysburg, the whole plan and course of the battle being examined in the greatest detail. Col. Livermore's opinion of Lee at this point coincides with that of Fitzhugh Lee, namely, that Lee, whose knowledge of strategy was at least equal to Meade's, yielded to "tender-heartedness" in not withdrawing Ewell's corps after having decided that Longstreet was to attack. That he would not have so yielded had he not expected to succeed, is as probable as that he would not have expected success "if he had not so often violated the principles of grand tactics with impunity. . . . He thought that it was better to risk the consequences of a false move, than to offend his subordinates or demoralize his own army. He was gambling in the art of war." With fewer troops than Meade, and a line twice as long, his plan to attack Meade's left could have succeeded only by "concentrating there the main body of his army, and keeping the rest of it out of action, while making demonstrations to deceive Meade as to the point of attack" (II, 440, 441).

The sixty maps and plans which accompany the text are of the greatest usefulness. The scheme of a volume in two parts seems an unnecessary obstacle to easy reference, however, and the proof-reading has not always been carefully done. There are two indexes, of persons and topics, and a full analytical table of contents.

[OLD HEROINES AND NEW.]

The Glad Heart. By E. Maria Albanesi. London: Methuen & Co., Ltd.

The Beloved Enemy. The same.

The Long Engagement. By E. S. Stevens. New York: George H. Doran Co.

Fire and Frost. By Maud Cruttwell. New York: John Lane Co.

The Opening Door. By Justus Miles Forman. New York: Harper & Bros.

Despite the advent of the cigarette and the incipiency of the vote for women, many of the most popular English novelists still find it possible to deal with the old materials of romance, still find profit in the sharp contrast of feminine and masculine, still believe in the ingenue and the rough conquering male, still drop the final curtain to the tune of "The Voice that Breathes O'er Eden." To this faithful and not unrewarded band belongs E. Maria Albanesi. The stories in hand are characteristic. "The Glad Heart" was published three years ago, and is still running to fresh editions. "The Beloved Enemy" is new, but will doubtless survive the current season. Ellen Milner, the heroine of the earlier tale, is as fair and fond a juvenile as may be found in the pages of William Black or Mrs. de la Pasture. Left penniless by the spendthrift squire, her father, she never dreams of setting forth to conquer the world of men in the manly fashion of the maiden-to-date. There are open to her only the two immemorial occupations of helpless femininity—to be a governess or to be a companion. An unmarried middle-aged man of her acquaintance finds her a place as companion, a place such as only a heroine of her vintage could have endured for a day. But she does endure, and gratitude to the stupid gentleman who has procured her discomfort is easily converted into love when, in the end, she discovers the wonderful fact that he wishes her to be his. And so presently "the pretty white gown was on and fastened, and the wreath and veil adjusted"—and the curtain drops to the familiar air.

Betty of "The Beloved Enemy" is a less conventional figure. At the outset she even threatens to be modern. We soon perceive, however, that her individualism is of the butterfly and not of the queen bee. She scorns the honest but humble youth who lays his heart at her feet. Her punishment is marriage to a weakling and the conversion of the misprised youth into a multi-millionaire. But, of course, we are not to be disappointed of our final curtain. Betty herself has not only trials to bear and perils to weather, but a transformation to undergo. Here the author compasses a really fine bit of character-study. Instead of violently converting her Betty from pleasure-lover to prig, she shows her under the daily discipline of life gradually developing innate elements of strength; so that when her bearish but faithful millionaire (an American who speaks the tongue neither of men nor of angels) finally wins her, we feel that he is a really lucky fellow: which is as it should be.

"The Long Engagement" offers a good opportunity for transition, since it contains two heroines, one of the older type and one of the new. Melody Waller is sweet and feminine and unpractical —of the Betty type, though less selfish and with more sense of humor. She has been engaged for some years to a poor schoolmaster, who is saddled with three sisters, and has a morbid notion of his responsibility for them. The engagement, for no clear reason, has not been announced. Even her father, a retired colonel whom she adores, does not know of it. To the humiliation of this half-furtive relation is added the fact that Schoolmaster Dominick has fallen to a way of taking her rather for granted. The prospect of their being able to marry does not improve. Altogether, when the colonel loses his money, and wishes her to marry a rich baronet—but we shall not rehearse the rest of Melody's story, since there is a thrill at the end of it which should not be forestalled. Enough to hint that, at the eleventh hour, she proves herself worthy of the reader's affections in a very old-fashioned way.

Dominick's sister Joan is the other heroine, a girl of the wide-eyed, independent, good-fellow type. With her sisters, mere caricatures of unco' guid spinsterhood, she has nothing in common. Quite ignorant of men, she is ready to trust them all as brothers. Revolt against being a burden upon Dominick leads naturally to a brief experience in a London office. It culminates in a scene with her employer in a private dining-room which recalls the "feature" scene of Mr. Wells's "Ann Veronica." No such destiny as Ann's is in store for her, however. She remains a fledgling in the flock of the emancipated, and the unadvanced reader will be glad to see the nice girl on the way to marriage with a nice boy before we have done with her.

With the two remaining novels in our group, we are in for the real thing: the modern heroine in diverse aspects of her glory. The author of "Fire and Frost" has little to say of equal political rights. Her plea is for the moral and physical independence of woman. Indeed, she holds a brief for spinsterhood as the ideal state. The continuance of the race is nothing to her, a wife is a degraded person, and a mother is a victim. Her Clare Glynne is a successful and enviable person, so long as she is content with her independent means, and her freedom to potter about among the art treasures of Italy. But she permits herself to drift into marriage with an Egyptian prince, and, worse, to fall in love with him. He is good for nothing, but that is a mere incident. If he had been the noblest of men, Sibyl's passion for him would, we gather, have still been debasing. She is conscious of her error, and presently confides it to an old friend. He assures her that the soul is at war with the senses, that love and desire have nothing in common, and that she must meet her husband on the only meeting-ground possible—that of affection. At this point the old friend places a sympathetic arm about Clare, the gesture is misinterpreted by observers, and a divorce ensues, providentially freeing the lady from her bondage, and setting her in the right way again. The last we hear of her is as author of a remarkable and instantly famous book, "a study of character under the veil of romance, . . . defending the cause of Woman versus Man with such force and ability, with such impartiality and comprehension, and, above all, with such delicate tact, that even the men themselves have had to applaud."

Such praise would be a trifle too high for Mr. Forman's story, but it defends the cause of Woman in dignified and even appealing fashion. It is not a mere tract, but a good story in itself. Its people are real. Its heroine is human and lovable as well as modern. She dawns upon us as a maiden of the old school in type and training. She has the profile of a Greek goddess, and is just "finishing" her education at a select school which has never advanced beyond the standards of 1830, which carefully prevents its pupils from learning anything of value, and prepares them for life by asserting that "the Crown of Womanhood is Sacrifice." Then comes a sudden awakening to the perception that human experience is not the affair of a few banalities and timidities and platitudes, but a field of action in which each must play his part. And finally comes the slowly growing conviction that her own part must have something to do with the struggle of her sex for self-respect and self-expression. Her first attempts to serve "the Cause" are failures. She is not made to be a district visitor or a public speaker in the interests of suffrage. In a moment of reaction she becomes the wife of a man whom she really loves. The man has utter contempt for "the Screaming Sisterhood," weariness and the self-protective instinct keep her silent, and for a time she is able to smother her sense of public duty in mere private happiness. But she cannot kill that sense, and it presently emerges, to the dismay and rage of the husband. He attempts high-handed methods, whereupon she lays down the law: marriage is a free partnership; there can be no question of petty dictation on either side. "That means you defy me straight?" he said. "Defy? Oh! Why, yes, in the sense you mean it, I suppose I do. I'm a grown woman, mistress of myself, married to you by my own free will—your wife, not your servant. I oughtn't to have to claim the right to think my own thoughts, choose my own friends, if they are respectable, speak what decent words I may wish to." In the end the husband is enlightened, and we leave him giving suffrage dinners, and calling complacently upon his infant daughter to repeat the only phrase she knows: "Votes for Women." The history sounds raw in the abstract, but it is skilfully and—a rare thing in narratives of this order—amiably told.

AN INDUSTRIOUS LIFE.

All the Days of My Life. By Amelia E. Barr. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.50 net.

The casual reader who glances at the sentimental sub-title, "The Red Leaves of a Human Heart," may be tempted to close this volume at the beginning. But he will be rewarded if he resists that temptation. For Mrs. Barr has told with frankness, simplicity, and extraordinary vividness the story of an unusually full and varied life. The style is unliterary, at times even ungrammatical; but Pepys has been forgiven for worse sins against grammar than Mrs. Barr is guilty of. Like him, she has the keenest sentimental interest in herself and in all the details of her past life; she can describe exactly the dresses she liked herself best in and the dinners she most enjoyed, forty, fifty, or sixty years ago. Such a zest in small pleasures is a godsend to the autobiographer; one might almost say that it is a mark of the great autobiographer. It inspired, for instance, some of the most famous passages of Rousseau's "Confessions."

As one reads the book one cannot help being reminded of another seventeenth-century worthy, unlike Pepys in all but his restless energy; of Cotton Mather, and his motto, "Fructuosus." Entering the career of matrimony at nineteen, Mrs. Barr brought into the world nine children; entering the career of authorship at thirty-nine, she wrote more than sixty books, besides countless short stories, sketches, essays, and poems. The vicissitudes of both these careers, either of which would have exhausted the energies of two or three ordinary women, she describes with great vivacity. The daughter of a Methodist minister in the north of England, she received the rather haphazard education regarded as sufficient for girls in those days, and taught for a year and a half in a girls' school. Many little episodes of this early life are lovingly chronicled. The day when her father brought home the first boxes of "Congreve or Lucifer matches" was a red-letter day in the family:

> My father took us all into a dark room and permitted each person to strike a light. Laughter and exclamations of wonder and pleasure greeted each fresh match as it burst into instantaneous flame, and even Ann (the old servant) was enthusiastic. . . . We had both read and heard wonderful things of these matches for nearly three years, but the first put upon the market were intended only for the rich; for they were in more or less costly caskets, the cheapest of which was sold for a guinea.

At nineteen Amelia married Robert Barr, a prosperous young merchant of Glasgow. As was natural, Robert's mother was bitterly opposed to his marrying a girl who was English and Methodist, and Amelia's trials with her new relatives are amusingly described. Best of all, perhaps, is the account of how, after her husband had failed in business, she stole a march on her mother-in-law in spiriting the family away to America without the old lady's knowledge. This required a strategy truly Napoleonic. Robert himself, however, was a thorough Scot, and Mrs. Barr complains humorously of the trials his Scottish reserve and obstinacy brought upon her. "It is scarcely an exaggeration," she observes, "to say that no Scotchman ever tells his wife the truth, and the whole truth, about his affairs." Later, in Texas, "he wanted to rent a farm, and get away from the fret and friction of the times. I pointed out that neither of us knew anything about farming, and that Texas farming was special in every department. . . . There is, however, no use in talking to a Scotchman who has made up his mind. God Almighty alone can change it, so I took to praying. Perhaps it was not very loyal to pray against my husband's plans, but circumstances alter cases, and this was a case that had to be altered." It is pleasant, but perhaps needless, to add that it was altered.

Throughout the Civil War the Barrs lived in Austin. Later they moved to Galveston; and here in the terrible yellow fever epidemic of 1867, Mrs. Barr lost her husband and her two remaining sons, and herself narrowly escaped death. Less than three months later, a son, the ninth of her children, was born, to live only a few days. From this series of blows, which would have crushed most women in body and spirit, Mrs. Barr rallied with indomitable courage. For the sake of her daughters, she resolved that she must live; and within a few months she had regained vigorous health. For a year and a half she supported her children by taking boarders; but this venture proving unsuccessful, she moved to New York to begin life anew. "I had five dollars and eighteen cents in my purse," she says. "I had no relatives in America, no one I felt at liberty to ask assistance from. I stood absolutely alone in the battle of life, but I was confident that God and Amelia Barr were a multitude."

The sequel proved that this confidence was entirely justified. Mrs. Barr soon found that she could write what people liked to read; and for much of her work she was pretty well paid. Poetry, for instance, was with her a mere incidental; "the vision and the faculty divine," as she says, "were not mine"; yet for fifteen years she made a thousand dollars or more a year from the sale of her verse alone. Her industry is almost incredible; it puts to shame even that of a writer like Anthony Trollope. Between March 25 and April 30, 1883, for instance, her diary shows that she wrote a complete novel, "Cluny Macpherson," working on it eight or nine hours a day, and that during the same period she wrote twelve poems and short articles in her leisure moments.

Meanwhile her comments on her home life are as interesting and lively as ever. An amusing light is thrown on the sharp distinction she always made between life and fiction by the following bit of conversation with one of her daughters, whom she had reproved for seeking counsel of a Catholic priest. Mrs. Barr had asked:

> "But why not go to God for advice?"
> "Mamma, there are things like love letters, for instance. Would you go to God with them?"
>
> "Yes," I replied. "Love letters may be very important things. At any rate, your mother might be better than a priest."
> "Mamma, dear, you know that you have a fixed conviction that love affairs should only occur in books. Now Frank is not a 'character,' he is a real, living, very delightful man."

It would be impossible, in any adequate notice of the book, to ignore its account of the author's religion. To Mrs. Barr religion means a direct personal relation with God; but it also means some other things. Like Cotton Mather, to whom we have already compared her, she believes firmly in angels and demons, in dreams and signs and warnings. She believes in reincarnation, because only so can she justify what seems to be undeserved suffering. She speaks of her religion as freely and plainly as Bunyan or Mather did of his. Certainly her own life is evidence of the truth of her advice: "I press upon the young, not to be ashamed of their disposition to be sentimental or religious. It is the sentimental young men who conquer; it is the men steeped in religious thought and aspiration who do things."

The total impression of the book is one of immense energy, tempered by homely kindliness, sentiment, and humor. It is a "human document" of rare interest and vitality.

The Fall of the Dutch Republic. By Hendrick William Van Loon. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3.

It goes without saying that, since Motley's day, every one has heard of the rise of the Dutch Republic, even if many have never known anything else about it; but with respect to its latter end it is probably true, as Mr. Van Loon says in his preface, that most English readers are in the predicament of his friend who was not aware that "the thing had ever fallen." Mr. Van Loon assures his readers that it did fall, and he proposes to explain in popular language why it fell.

The language which he employs is indeed popular in the sense of being easily understood; popular, also, in being generally interesting, spiced with a kindly sort of satirical humor at the expense of the people whose qualities and foibles he so thoroughly understands. It is true, the humor sometimes, and rather frequently, falls to the level of the commonplace—"Divine Providence was kept working overtime listening to all the prayers of patriotic citizens," is the sort of thing the discriminating reader would prefer omitted. Yet occasionally one comes across something excellent, as in the preface, where the author remarks that "some few, who had taken English history in college, had dim recollections of a certain William of Orange who, as the husband of Queen Mary, had played some sort of rôle in the works of the late Lord Macaulay."

The title of the book is a good one. But for all that one might find it difficult to maintain that there ever was a

Burlington Public Lib

Dutch Republic, or, if there was one, to say just when it fell. A most persistent characteristic of Dutch history was the rivalry between the regent families of Holland and the House of Orange. When the former, who were backed by the bourgeois class, were in the ascendant, the government was an oligarchy; when the latter, which found its support among the nobility and the people, was dominant, it was a more or less effective dictatorship: in either case, Dutch political institutions were republican only in form. Mr. Van Loon understands this perfectly, and he is nowhere more satisfactory than in describing the complex and cumbersome machinery of the provincial governments, or explaining how the real power fell sometimes to the regents and sometimes to the Stadtholder, or narrating the circumstances which brought the one or the other to the fore.

And if we were content to call this curious mixture of Regents, Stadtholders, and town councils a republic, nothing is easier than to say that it disappeared, like so much else of the ancien régime, in the revolutionary upheaval—virtually when the French armies entered and took possession, formally when the Batavian republic was established in March, 1895: and in an external sense these events constitute the fall of the republic. Yet Mr. Van Loon carries the story scarcely beyond 1783, closing with a very sketchy account of the later events. By the fall of the republic he would have us understand something more vital than the mere overthrow of a form of government. He is, indeed, concerned to trace the causes of the decline of Dutch influence in the eighteenth century—the failure of Dutch heroism in war, of Dutch achievements in art and letters, of Dutch ascendency in trade, of Dutch prestige in politics and diplomacy—rather than any changes in the externals of social life.

The explanation Mr. Van Loon finds primarily in the enervating effects of great material prosperity. In the eighteenth century the rich burgher class was mainly intent on investing safely the wealth which their ancestors had accumulated. They wished, above all, to cut their coupons regularly in order to live comfortably without too much exertion. The result was a marked relaxation of moral fibre, a decay of civic virtue, a dearth of heroic characters. And, inasmuch as a great deal of Dutch wealth was invested in France, the fear of offending France resulted at last in the breach with England, which, as Mr. Van Loon thinks, was the chief mistake.

There is much truth in all this; and yet one may well question whether Mr. Van Loon has sufficiently emphasized the fact that both the rise and the fall of Dutch power were inseparably connected with the larger aspects of European politics. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries circumstances, in so far as diplomacy is concerned, were almost all in favor of the Dutch; in the eighteenth almost all against them. One may well doubt whether they could have won independence without the aid of France and England; and certainly in the seventeenth century the exigencies of French and English politics left the Holland merchants a wonderfully free hand in exploiting the East Indies. But in the eighteenth century the Dutch were caught between two fires: their chief political enemy was France, which, nevertheless, they could not afford to offend because so much of their capital was invested there; their chief political friend was England, whose commercial interests in India and America were nevertheless diametrically opposed to their own. Now, the rivalry of France and England was perhaps the most fundamental thing in eighteenth-century diplomacy, and the helplessness of the Dutch, bound to England by the need of protection and to France by the desire for profit, lay precisely in the impossibility of taking sides in the great struggle. And the dilemma was the more perplexing inasmuch as it accentuated the old opposition between the House of Orange and the Regents of Holland; the former was pro-English, the latter were pro-French.

Mr. Van Loon does not fail to exhibit this dilemma, and for the most part he confines himself to explication. But his sympathies are rather with the House of Orange—although he clearly appreciates the contemptible abilities of its representatives—and he is quite of the opinion that the breach with England was the fatal mistake of all, a mistake for which the Dutch paid "with complete political annihilation, and with almost a century of stagnation." Surely, this is to overshoot the mark. The breach with England was only temporary, after all. The Triple Alliance of 1788, one of the great triumphs of Pitt, put the Dutch in a more advantageous position diplomatically than any they had held since the time of the great William; and when "political annihilation" finally came, it came in spite of the effort of England, backed by a European coalition, to prevent it. Apart from the French Revolution, one may say there was little danger to Dutch independence; but with the Revolution, it is difficult to suppose that the result would have been different whatever policy the Dutch Government might have adopted.

Dawn in Darkest Africa. By John H. Harris. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the Earl of Cromer. With illustrations and a map. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.50 net.

To help forward the march of progress in West Central Africa is the object of the author in writing this book. The information in it was gained during missionary work, beginning in 1898, which included extensive journeys, a recent one having been "something like 5,000 miles through the western equatorial regions." Before becoming a missionary he held a responsible position in a leading commercial house in London, and so gained insight into foreign and colonial questions. As Lord Cromer says in his Introduction, he has brought an exceedingly evenly balanced mind to his task and does not confuse the ideal with the practical in his suggested solutions of the problems presented to the African administrator.

He begins with a brief description of the native and his medley of customs, and shows that he is by nature a trader and often a successful farmer. One in Southern Nigeria has developed 200 acres of land so that he "has now a turnover of nearly £20,000 a year." The all-round industry of the woman is so great that "hardly anything comes strange to those deft fingers and muscular arms." Then he treats of the effects of civilization on the African and the white man's burdens in his Government. These can be borne successfully only by having a high class of officials. Here Lord Cromer supports him most emphatically, saying, "I have always held that 75 per cent. of the influence of British officials for good depends on character, and only 25 per cent. on brains." Mr. Harris believes that if the officials should refuse to drink any intoxicating spirits in public for three years, the detestable liquor traffic, with slavery the greatest of West African curses, would decrease by at least one-half. "The natives, rightly led by the press, and the movement supported by the officials and by the ministers of the native churches, would take fire, so to speak, until the drinking of spirits would become 'incorrect form.'"

The embarrassing labor question is discussed at length and attention is called again and again to the fact that slavery still exists in the Portuguese colonies. In regard to the great natural products of the region, rubber, oil palm, and cocoa, he shows that through the ruinous policy of the late King Leopold the supply of rubber in the Belgian Congo is almost exhausted. In the British provinces the cultivation of the cocoa plant is beginning to grip the native mind to such an extent that the exports from Southern Nigeria alone have increased from 288,614 pounds in 1903 to 6,567,181 pounds in 1910. A brief sketch of the progress of missions, with favorable references to the Roman Catholics, and a forecast of the future of West Central Africa, concludes the work.

His suggestions in the last chapter, entitled The Map of Africa Re-arranged, are based on his conviction that the financial burden of caring for the vast Congo region is too heavy for Belgium to bear, and that the French have practically failed in their rule of the Equatorial African colony, formerly known as the French Congo, because of their following King Leopold's methods of treating the natives. He believes, therefore, that a ray of hope would come to the darkest region of the Dark Continent if the Belgian Upper Congo and the French Congo should be transferred to Germany. This would unite the Cameroons with German East Africa, giving to the empire a great and uninterrupted trans-African colony governed on the right principles. Mr. Harris tells nothing of his own work, but supports his assertions and conclusions often by his own experiences with the natives and from information derived from them. His book is not a personal narrative, then, in any sense, but it might be rightly termed a treatise on the main principles which should guide those who are called to rule a backward and primitive society. It is well illustrated by sixty reproductions of photographs, and has a map of Central and South African colonies with "mother countries" drawn to the same scale.

Godoy: The Queen's Favorite. By Edmund B. D'Auvergne. Boston: Richard G. Badger.

The historical truth about Manuel Godoy is stranger than most fiction. In 1784, as a poor but handsome youth of seventeen, he rode into Madrid from his native province of Estremadura to seek a career. His face and his effrontery were his fortune. Through his brother he became a bandoleer in the Royal Guards. As guardsman he stood duty at the royal palace, attracted the attention of the powerful and passionate queen, Maria Luisa, and became her lover. Through her favor he became the trusted adviser of the stupid king, Charles IV. Then, for nearly twenty years, this provincial upstart ruled the Spanish Empire with a power more absolute than that of the absolute King himself. The strong-willed Queen ruled her husband, and through her favor Godoy ruled the state. But the Queen was many years older than the favorite, and not beautiful. It was not unnatural that Godoy soon fell in love with the charming young Doña Tudó; though he could live with her only in secret, he loved her more deeply and permanently than any one else; and after his downfall he married her in order to legitimize the two children that she had borne him. Meanwhile, however, at the command of the King, he married one of the King's nieces, whom he did not love. The author thinks it probable that the Queen was responsible for this match; she thought her relations to Godoy would be less likely to become a subject of public scandal, and that she should be less worried by jealousy of Godoy's other loves, if he were formally and decorously married to a woman to whom he was indifferent.

The facts of Godoy's life, therefore, are not lacking in interest and historical importance, and they have lost nothing in Mr. D'Auvergne's telling; for he knows how to tell a good story well. He is justified in his "hopes that the book will prove interesting to the general reader." But this is not the only purpose of his biography. "It is an earnest attempt to do tardy justice to a patriotic statesman on whom his countrymen have been too long allowed to lay the blame of their own folly." With this in mind the author has carefully studied Godoy's own memoirs and much of the best modern literature of the subject; he has even dipped into the papers of the Foreign Office for a few reports from English agents in Spain during the Napoleonic period. In his statement of facts he is accurate, but in his interpretation of the facts and in his comments he often goes as far from the truth in one direction as Godoy's detractors have gone in the other. He would have us believe that Godoy always pursued, under the circumstances, the wisest and most successful policy for Spain, and that he was even a match for Napoleon in intrigue. Unfortunately, events proved otherwise. Nearly every move which Spain made under his direction after 1796 brought disaster and disgrace to the royal family and to the Spanish nation. He himself was mobbed, deprived of all his offices and power, and made a miserable wandering exile for more than forty years, until his unnoticed death in 1851. That the author believes Godoy to have been a great and wise statesman may be due to his own idea of the requirements for statesmanship (p. 60): "There is no great mystery or technic in the so-called science of politics; common-sense and a cool, courageous head will enable any man to deal with the problems which diplomatists pretend are almost insoluble."

Notes

Longmans, Green & Co. announce the publication, in parts, of "The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures." The general editors are the Rev. Cuthbert Lattey, S.J., and the Rev. Joseph Keating, S.J. The first named has prepared Part I, "The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians," newly translated from the original text, with introduction, critical and explanatory notes, appendices, and map.

The same house will add shortly to the American Citizen series "Organized Democracy," by Frederick A. Cleveland.

The Century Co. issues this week: A new book of short stories, "Murder in Any Degree," by Owen Johnson; Alexander Irvine's tribute to his mother, "My Lady of the Chimney Corner"; Jack London's story of his life, "John Barleycorn," and Robert Haven Schauffler's "Romantic America," with many illustrations.

Four novels appear this week from the press of George H. Doran Co. They are: "Rue and Roses," by Angela Langer; "Because of Jane," by J. E. Buckrose; "A Garden of Spices," by A. Keith-Fraser, and "Rising Dawn," by Harold Begbie.

Early in the autumn the Outing Publishing Co. will bring out: "The Coming of the Law," a novel by Charles Alden Seltzer; "Our Southern Highlanders," by Horace Kephart; "A Year with a Whaler," by W. N. Burns, and two outing handbooks—"Tennis Tactics," by R. D. Little, and "Ice Boating," by H. L. Stone.

The following volumes will be issued by Little, Brown & Co. in a few weeks: "The Double Life of Mr. Alfred Burton," by E. Phillips Oppenheim; "Joan Thursday," a new story of adventure, by Louis Joseph Vance; "The Prince Imperial," a biography of Napoleon III's heir by his tutor, Augustin Filon; "The Tragedy of Mary Stuart," by Henry C. Shelley, and "Wards of the State: An Unofficial View of Prison and the Prisoner," by Tighe Hopkins. In the last-named book the discussion is confined in the main to imprisonment in England at the present time.

A new detective story, "The Insidious Dr. Fu-Manchu," by Sax Rohmer, is in the list of McBride, Nast & Co.

The autumn list of Frederick A. Stokes Co. has, in fiction: "The Soul of Melicent," by James Branch Cabell; "Dave's Daughter," by Patience Bevier Cole; "The Headquarter Recruit, and Other Stories," by Richard Dehan; "A Modern Eve," by May Edginton; "Anne, Actress," by Juliet G. Sager; "The Heart of the Desert," by Honoré Willsie, and editions of Dickens's "Christmas Stories" and "A Christmas Carol."—Miscellaneous: "The Pleasures of Bookland"; "Lord Lister, his Life and Work," by G. T. Wrench; Alfred Noyes's "Collected Poems"; "You Can," by George Matthew Adams; "The Maxims of Noah," by Gelett Burgess; "Japan as I Saw It," by A. H. Exner; "Prince Charlie," by William Power; "Football for Public and Player," by Herbert Reed; "Mary, Queen of Scots," by H. T. Skae, and Oscar Wilde's "The Happy Prince."

Henry Holt & Company have a long list of autumn publications. It includes, in fiction: A new novel by William De Morgan (title not given); "The Garden Without Walls," by Coningsby Dawson; "Making Over Martha," by Julie M. Lippmann; "Mother's Son," by Beulah Marie Dix; "The Dust of the Road," by Marjorie Patterson; "Bransford in Arcadia, or The Little Echippus," by Eugene Manlove Rhodes; "What Happened in the Night, and Other Stories," by James Hopper; "All Men Are Ghosts," by L. P. Jacks; "The Morning's War," by C. E. Montague; "The Yoke of Pity," by Julien Benda, translated by Gilbert Cannan, and "Pity the Poor Blind," by H. H. Bashford.—Gift books: "Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales," illustrated by W. Heath Robinson; "The Home Book of Verse," in two volumes, by Burton E. Stevenson; "Village Life in America (1852-1872)," third edition enlarged and illustrated by Caroline Cowles Richards, with an introduction by Margaret E. Sangster; William James's "On Some of Life's Ideals," and "The Arabian Nights," edited by Frances Jenkins Olcott, illustrated by Munro Orr.—Economics, government, and sociology: "Social Insurance," by I. M. Rubinow; "National Supremacy: Treaty Power versus State Power," by Edward S. Corwin; "Mercantile Credit," by Prof. J. E. Hagerty; "Marxism vs. Socialism," by V. G. Simkhovitch, and "The Jews of To-day," by Arthur Ruppin.—Miscellaneous: "Ten More Plays of Shakespeare," by Stopford A. Brooke; "Modern English Literature," by G. H. Mair; "The Mastery of Grief," by Bolton Hall; "The World Soul," by H. Fielding-Hall; "Napoleon." by H. A. L. Fisher, and "The Confessions of a Tenderfoot," by Ralph Stock.

We have received from Macmillan a de luxe edition in two volumes of Pater's "Marius the Epicurean." It is beautifully printed in Riccardi type on handsome Riccardi paper, and of the thousand numbered copies struck off two hundred and fifty are reserved for this country. The title-page has been engraved after the design of Mr. Herbert P. Horne. The price is ten dollars, net. In addition, twelve copies have been printed on vellum, of which ten are for sale. The style of this work and the hero's eclectic procedure make a choice edition eminently fitting: "Marius," cheaply printed, would be a distressing spectacle.

"Poems," hy Alice Meynell (Scribner), designated as "The Collected Edition," includes the contents of her two previous volumes, "Preludes" and "Later Poems," and in addition a few after verses hitherto uncollected. As a record of two decades —Mrs. Meynell's first volume was published in 1893—the book is not remarkable for bulk. Nor is it, to be quite truthful, particularly remarkable for range. In her own words Mrs. Meynell may be described as "a poet of one mood," and that a rather subdued one. And the mood is singularly persistent; it is that of her later as of her earlier poems. To judge from the evidence of her poetry itself, her temper is that of a naturally religious spirit in an age of unfaith. Hence the tinge of melancholy, of spiritual homelessness, which characterizes her expression.

But though Mrs. Meynell's verse may be lacking in volume and compass, it does possess a rare distinction of its own. Tenuous it may be, but it is as fine in its way as it is tenuous. To analyze the secret of its spell is difficult; but it lies as much as anything in imparting to its subjects a kind of familiar intimacy, in bringing great and abstract matters closer through the medium of plain and simple associations. In this manner the lofty is not belittled or prettified; it is endowed with a nearness and friendliness and warmth it did not have before. Of this homeliness and familiarity of conception the little poem entitled "The Lady Poverty" is an admirable example:

> The Lady Poverty was fair:
> But she has lost her looks of late.
> With change of times and change of air.
> Ah slattern! she neglects her hair.
> Her gown, her shoes; she keeps no state
> As once when her pure feet were bare.
> Or—almost worse, if worse can be—
> She scolds in parlors, dusts and trims, > Watches and counts. Oh, is this she
> Whom Francis met, whose step was free,
> Who with Obedience carolled hymns,
> In Umbria walked with Chastity?
> Where is her ladyhood? Not here,
> Not among modern kinds of men;
> But in the stony fields, where clear
> Through the thin trees the skies appear,
> In delicate spare soil and fen,
> And slender landscape and austere.

The reader's perplexity over the preface to John D. Barry's "Intimations" (Paul Elder) is but deepened by the book itself. For one does not easily see how what the author calls "the controversial method" could be applied in essays on such topics as "To Understand Is to Forgive," "Cleanliness," "The Kindness of the Poor," "Smiling," "Truth," and "Anger." Nor is it obvious how the "more profitable way" which he declares himself to have followed in developing these topics can be said to be "out of fashion." Perhaps the author is here indicating his belief that little or nothing that he has said in these essays could possibly be denied by any intelligent and reasonable human being; which is true enough, but not necessarily a merit, nor an uncommon characteristic of either writing or talk to-day. It is only fair to the book, however, to say that it contains a good deal of shrewd and suggestive comment, enforced by examples that are almost always apt and fresh, and usually drawn from the author's own experience rather than from his reading. The essays, in fact, are not at all hookish, but are distinctly popular, as their first publication in a newspaper, the San Francisco Bulletin, might perhaps lead one to expect.

Prof. C. Alphonso Smith's "What Can Literature Do for Me?" (Doubleday, Page) is not a volume of didactic meditations, but consists of information, exhortation, and advice, all for the most part extremely elementary, and evidently addressed to the entirely uninformed but aspiring student. The six chapter headings promise a systematic, if somewhat thin and sentimental, treatment of the educational possibilities of literature. The argument is rarely close, and is often unmindful of the heading under which it is placed. The heading of chapter two declares that literature "can keep before you the vision of the ideal," and that of chapter five notes that "it can show you the glory of the commonplace." Perhaps the fact is lamentable, but it is nevertheless true that neither of these promises is likely to make a very strong appeal in quarters where appeal is most needed. Some of the advice in the book has the same unfortunate quality as these headings. For example, it will hardly prepossess a real student of literature in favor of this book to find a certain remark on page twelve, in the midst of the conventional censure—implied only, to be sure, but obvious—visited upon several editions of the "Ancient Mariner" for giving some information about the poem and its author, "but not a word as to what the poem has in it for you and me, or of you and me." Here is the remark: "The first thing to do is to find yourself in the poem itself"; a remark which the writer proceeds to elaborate at some length. A remark like this is not excusable on the ground that the author is addressing the uninformed and immature; it is in the wrong manner for address to intelligence of any grade. Chapter three, the longest in the book, though rather loose as a whole, contains some really shrewd remarks. The best of these the interested reader may find for himself on pages 119 and 121. There are also some excellent pages in the last chapter, dealing with what Professor Smith calls our dynamic and our static vocabularies, respectively. The first consists of the words of which we are complete masters; the second, of those which we merely understand, but do not use. At the end of the book there is an index of authors mentioned in the text. It contains something more than 150 names.

Any book should be welcome that makes the inner experiences of the man Job real and significant, and from this point of view Mr. James Strahan's "The Book of Job Interpreted" (Scribner) may be warmly commended. Written in popular style, its interpretations are judicious, and the leading religious ideas of the book are set forth clearly and sympathetically. The English reader can hardly find a better guide than Strahan to the understanding of the greatest of the Old-Hebrew poetical works, which ranks at the same time among the greatest religious productions of the ancient world.

Mrs. Sarah Pike Conger, widow of the late American Minister at Peking, has published through F. G. Brown & Co., of Chicago, a little volume of sketches entitled "Old China and Young America," dedicated to her child friends. The stories are of the simplest kind, told with an old-fashioned didacticism sufficient for their audience, but without much saving grace of humor. Mrs. Conger's admiration for the redoubtable Empress Dowager of China seems to have suffered no diminution since the facts of her career have been made public before the world. Her story, she tells the little ones, "portrays a depth of character that he who looks can perceive, who listens can hear its melody, who feels can know its warmth." A tribute like this shows how genuine must have been the old Empress's personal charm, but a true account of her life would be strong meat for babes if given in detail. There is not much in the book besides personal reminiscences and the gossip of interpreters recounted with a credulity that strikes us as astounding in one who lived six years in Peking. One of her anecdotes will bear repeating: Two Russian soldiers were looting the house of a decent Chinese in Peking after the Boxer débâcle, when the owner, unable to save his property, played the Russian national anthem on his flute. To his amazement, the despoilers stopped abashed and left. The householder happened to be a member of Sir Robert Hart's famous "Foreign Band," and had been told that the Russian hymn was a prayer. It served its purpose as a prayer.

"A Gentle Jehu in Japan" (Dodd, Mead), by Ethel McLean, consists of letters written on a three months' trip to Japan, embellished with some colored photographs. They cover a conventional and limited itinerary and are neither sprightly nor informing. We are told that her day's motor ride around the Island of Oahu cost forty dollars, but that "one can make arrangements through an agency, if one is not particular as to whom one goes with, for six dollars a head." And here is the sort of thing we learn from her in Japan: "Leaving our trunks behind at the hotel, to be sent to the station to meet us as we pass through Kobe on our way back to Kioto, in response to a telegram—which, by the way, worked very satisfactorily—we took a 9:30 train from Sannomiya to Onomichi, arriving at the latter place about 4:30 after a comfortable and extremely pretty ride." There are pages quite as interesting as this, but, since a Jehu connotes horsemanship, why should we not hear of the author's driving anywhere in the book?

Henry Greenleaf Pearson's "James S. Wadsworth of Geneseo" (Scribner) is a well-written piece of biography. As the owner of large estates in the Genesee valley, Wadsworth's intelligent interest in agriculture, and the system of tenant farming which he established, early attracted attention; while his wealth and social position, joined to an extensive acquaintance in England and on the Continent, drew to his hospitable home most travellers of note who visited America during the second quarter of the last century. He entered political life as a Van Buren Democrat, but later joined the Republicans, became a recognized leader of the party in New York, and was strongly supported for a place in Lincoln's Cabinet. At the outbreak of the Civil War he was active in sending to the front supplies for the New York troops. Failing of appointment as major-general, he became an aide to McDowell, and presently a brigadier-general and military governor of Washington, in this latter position distinguishing himself by his interest in the freedmen and his stout resistance to the continued enforcement of the Fugitive Slave law. In 1862 he was nominated for Governor of New York on the Republican-Union ticket, but was defeated by Seymour. After the battle of Gettysburg, where he commanded the First Division of the First Corps, he was sent to the Mississippi valley to investigate the condition and treatment of negroes; then he rejoined the Army of the Potomac, and in May, 1864, was mortally wounded at the Wilderness battle. The account of the unseemly behavior of a drunken Confederate during Wadsworth's last hours, given by Capt. Z. B. Adams, of the Fifty-sixth Massachusetts, and quoted by Mr. Pearson without comment, has lately (New York Times, July 20) been denied by the surgeon in charge of the hospital, and apparently needs reëxamination.

The twelfth and thirteenth volumes of the publications of the Irish Texts Society, being the numbers for 1910 and 1911 respectively, have lately been issued. In spite of some irregularity in the appearance of its volumes, the Society has steadily pursued its work and has now brought out a considerable series of documents of literary and historical value. Of those now in hand, volume twelve is an edition by the Rev. J. G. O'Keefe of the story of the "Frenzy of Suibhne" (Buile Suibhne), and volume thirteen is a continuation of the Rev. J. C. MacErlean's edition of "The Poems of David O'Bruadair." Father MacErlean's first part was reviewed some time ago in these columns. In the second (to be followed by still another) he includes the poems of O'Bruadair, written between 1667 and 1682. They are of the same general character as those of the earlier period—elegies, epithalamia, and pieces of political satire—and are of interest to the historian as expressing the opinions and sentiments of the Gaelic population of Ireland in the time of the Restoration.

The text edited by Mr. O'Keefe is one of the most curious of Irish tales. It relates the adventures of an Irish King Suibhne (Sweeny) of the seventh century, who, as a result of the curse of St. Ronan, went mad in the battle of Magh Rath. His madness took the peculiar form of levitation, which is mentioned in a number of other Irish stories. He became volatile like a bird, and spent the rest of his days in intermittent flights about the land and periods of wild life in the forest. The situation afforded a fine chance for the fancy of the story-tellers, and the narrative is worked out with much skill in the regular mixed form of prose and verse characteristic of early Irish saga. It is hard to set a definite date for the document, which is written in the artificial Middle Irish literary language that was long maintained in use. Though the manuscripts are all modern, certain references which occur in texts of the Old Irish period prove that the tradition of Suibhne's madness is of ancient origin. There are reasons, nevertheless, for regarding the existing tale as a late literary treatment of the theme rather than as an early popular saga. The editor's work on the text and translation is very competently done, and his introduction is useful as far as it goes. It is to be regretted, however, that Mr. O'Keefe did not supply a fuller discussion of the fundamental element of volatile frenzy. He does not even bring together the other references to such madness in Irish literature; he says nothing of the Scandinavian traditions of flying or leaping maniacs to whom was applied in Old Norse the phrase vertha at gjalti (in which the term gjalti appears to be derived from the Irish geilt); and he makes what is at least a very dubious suggestion in connecting the story of Suibhne with that of Merlin as the Wild Man of the Woods. The wild man in the story of Grisandole, to which Mr. O'Keefe particularly refers, seems to be originally a shape-shifting fairy who comes to separate his wife from a mortal rival. The type is probably represented, more or less completely, in a number of Irish sagas, but we see no sufficient reason for regarding Suibhne as an example of it.

At the time of Padre Luis Coloma's admission to the Real Academia Española, his "Jeromín," which has now been translated by Lady Moreton ("The Story of Don John of Austria"; Lane), was accurately described as an example of a new type of book, half novel and half history. It does great credit to Lady Moreton's frankness and honesty that she prints this significant warning in a prominent paragraph at the beginning of her preface. Provided the reader keeps it clearly and constantly in mind, the present volume will afford him both pleasure and profit. It contrives to string together—without regard either to authenticity or to the question of relevancy to the career of Don John—a large number of the most famous stories and traditions of the Spain of Philip II, unknown, for the most part, to the average English and American reader, but also thoroughly well worth knowing. The introduction of a number of contemporary letters at various points in the text may tempt the unwary to forget the manner of book with which they are dealing, and to treat it as history pure and simple; but if so, it will not be just to blame either author or translator, for both have given fair warning. Let us hope, in conclusion, that Lady Moreton underestimates the intelligence of English readers when she expresses the belief that they are unfamiliar with the fact that an "auto da fe consisted in hearing the sentences pronounced on the prisoners of the Inquisition, not in witnessing their execution, and that in most cases the condemned were garroted before being burnt."

Progress in India is most significantly shown in the present interest in the condition of the "Untouchables," those who are regarded as so debased that the privileges of the Hindu social system and the religious rights of the orthodox classes are denied them. According to the last census they number about eighty millions, or one-sixth of the entire population of the country. This fact has excited so much attention that a book has recently been published in Madras entitled "The Depressed Classes: An Inquiry into their Condition and Suggestions for their Uplift." It is described as a "progressive symposium," and consists of twenty-three articles by well-known writers including the native prince, the Gaekwar of Baroda. Two of the four European contributors are Sir Valentine Chirol and Mrs. Besant. This conviction that something is owed to these "outcasts" and that they have undeveloped mental powers and capacities for usefulness is almost wholly due to the educational work of the missionaries among them. Some of their children have competed successfully in university examinations with Brahmans and other privileged classes, and are to be found occupying positions of honor and responsibility in most departments of the public services, as also in the learned professions of law, medicine, and theology.

Science

TO BETTER THE RACE.

The Task of Social Hygiene. By Havelock Ellis. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.50 net.

At first glance this book may seem to the reader a departure from the topics to which the author has devoted himself. Ellis declares, however, that it has been growing slowly for about twenty-five years and represents the general attitude of his other work with some extension in various directions. In no way is it the outcome of a sudden impulse or based on any popular demand from the extended and extending movement which is now going on and which, we may add, manifests increasingly hysterical tendencies. He purposes to consider selected problems of progress, but with a clear perception that there is no general progress in nature, even the groups that progress paying the price of that progress by some loss. The task of this hygiene is not to make sewers, but to remake love, with the mission of bringing a new joy and a new freedom into life; a serious scheme—to some almost a religion—but a scheme in which every man and every woman will soon be called on to take a share.

The introductory chapter points out that social hygiene is really a development of that social reform of the second quarter of the nineteenth century which came when modern industrialism, grown from small beginnings in the previous century, began to manifest conditions subversive of individuality. This reform cleaned up cities and policed them, regulated conditions of work, developed national education, and finally began to safeguard the child and to extend the guardianship to the prospective mother. In such an outline Ellis obviously has English conditions more clearly in mind; but the outline will serve. The characteristic feature of the movement is that for the most part it dealt with an improvement of the conditions of life, concerning itself little or not at all with quantity or quality. As the movement has gone on quite a different feature has been added, or at least has come to the fore: the sense of social responsibility, now growing into a sense of racial responsibility. Thus it is that we have come to have a widespread interest in eugenics in the sense of a really scientific study of the influences which make for the betterment of the race and the conscious and deliberate application of our knowledge of these influences, which is a very different programme from that of some over-zealous eugenists. Some forms of eugenics are really of great age, but Ellis holds that Campanella, three centuries ago, was the real prophet of the science, without, however, for a moment wishing to depreciate the importance of Galton's share in arousing an indifferent public. Galton clearly understood that human breeding can never be carried on in the same way as animal breeding. He recognized that man needs knowledge, not legislation. Animals may be bred from the outside, compulsorily; but in the case of man, intelligence and will must work together and with a sense of responsibility. The problem of the race has become one of quality, aggeneration rather than regeneration, since this involves the idea of a previous degeneration which for the race is not really in evidence. Families come and go, aristocracies arise and then fall, but these are in themselves no distinct indication of racial decadence. There is perpetual social regeneration. "The world is forever dying. The world is also forever bursting with life." The diminishing birth-rate has no terrors for him, as he shows at length in a later chapter.

After this introduction come eleven chapters enlarging upon these questions and touching upon other matters related to the general subject. Considerable space is given to the woman question, which is held to be largely one with eugenics, since the breeding of man is to so great an extent in the hands of women. A portion of this is a simple reprint of a magazine article twenty-five years old. Here, in considering the development of the movement, the suggestion is made that its modern advocates may well take Mary Wollstonecraft for a model as to genuine insight concerning questions of the social condition of women. In the next chapter, on the newer aspects of the movement, there is some repetition, but this is more than redeemed by an account of the growth of the woman question in Germany and in some other parts of Europe. The suffragette outburst is more or less condoned, or even thought to be good in awakening an interest in the movement in those who had not thought about it before. Of course, this was written before the recent manifestations which may well awaken doubts as to the ability of women to handle public affairs. This is an important practical outcome of the movement, and involves questions the seriousness of which does not seem to appeal to our author. No doubts trouble him in his advocacy because he looks upon suffrage as merely incidental and has no fears that women by gaining the freedom they seek will spoil their position. The sexual instinct, he is sure, may be trusted to keep the halo bright even amid the disenchantment of co-education, and the independence of women will restore to sexual selection its due weight in human development. On the other hand, it is foolish to exaggerate the expectations of great things merely because they are new, and to talk of a new heaven and a new earth when it possibly may prove to be merely a new purgatory and a new hell. The real gain, he thinks, will be that woman becomes an independent factor in the racial uplift—and as to romantic love, to which an entertaining section is devoted, it is declared probable that true romantic love is yet to come. The growth of its ideals must be based on facts carefully gathered and considered, and ought to be no longer hampered by an utterly mistaken comparison with animal breeding.

The waning interest in family history, inferred from the disappearance of the family Bible, furnishes the text for a discussion of records and their keeping that there may be information necessary to permit forecasts as to the probable character of offspring. We feel pretty sure that this will prove to be the greatest problem in the eugenistic programme and are skeptical of the solution given here; in fact, we doubt if Ellis quite fully appreciates the difficulty. The eugenic ideal can be established only by a gradual absorption, and when effective will act unconsciously.

Coming to the education of the child, Ellis points out that here we deal with an uncompromising rationalist and realist who accepts only what answers his needs. The usual religious teaching has little value, and early piety is almost certainly pathological. As to sex hygiene, the teaching has been and still is unqualifiedly bad. Ancient half-truths are taught dogmatically. The teaching has been bad because partial; it remains bad because there are no qualified teachers, not even the parents having the proper knowledge or fitness. The obvious inference that it might be well to begin at the top and educate downwards does not seem to be drawn, but stress is laid upon the dangers involved and the desirability of taking time in these matters and going slowly, small comfort to some enthusiasts on this side the ocean who wish to do things, and that overnight. And in the next chapter, in a very helpful consideration of the futility of expecting a regulation of general morality by rigid laws and hasty legislation, short cuts to the millennium, the point is well made again that training in sex hygiene will accomplish little if there go with it no training in moral responsibility.

The remaining chapters deal with questions which are a little more remote, and the discussion of them, although highly entertaining, calls for less comment. First comes the removal of war, the war against war, and Ellis points out at length the conditions which in time may bring this about, but he reminds the reader that, even if some union of the greater nations should be made to this end, there will always be the possibility of war behind it all, that ultima ratio concerning which men otherwise as far apart in time and thought as William Penn and Jules de Gaulthier are in accord. The possibility of an international language is considered at some length, with an admirable summary of the efforts thus far made. The philologists would probably complain that their side of the problem gets no adequate statement. Although to Ellis there is no longer any probability that English will become the world language, he urges that if that did happen it would be a great detriment to English people, because they would then have but one language and no sort of compulsion to learn another, a condition which leads to degeneracy, the defect of the English mind being its insularity. He might have added that the American mind from this point of view is even more insular. The final chapter deals with Individualism and Socialism and deserves attention particularly from those that are taking a first plunge into the deeper waters of Socialism. To be brief, Ellis holds out that after all in their modern forms these are largely matters of temperament, and in practice are by no means so far apart as the leaders and shouters would have us believe. Socialists and individualists are born, not made, and the common man is both without any practical difficulty. "No one needs Individualism in his water supply, and no one needs Socialism in his religion," and, as Ellis has elsewhere pointed out, marriage is individualistic and the concern of individuals, but procreation is very much the concern of society.

"Intensive Farming," by L. C. Corbett; "Pigeon Raising," by Alice MacLeod, and "Taxidermy," by L. L. Pray, are forthcoming additions to the Outing Publishing Co.'s Handbooks.

Forthcoming publications of McBride, Nast & Co. include: "Practical Tree Repair," by Elbert Peets; "Making Fences, Walls and Hedges," by F. C. Hallard; "Making Built-in Furniture," by Abbott McClure, and "The Lighting Book," by F. Laurent Godinez.

The following are science books in Holt's autumn list: "The Wonder of Life," by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson; "The Living Plant," by Prof. William F. Ganong; "Science from an Easy Chair," by Sir E. Ray Lankester, and "Popular Botany," by A. E. Knight and Edward Step, 2 vols.

"The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter" (Macmillan), by James Sutherland, is the narrative neither of a sportsman nor a scientist, but of one whose primary aim was the money value of the tusks of the elephants slain. If this imparts to the book something of the odor of the shambles, it is nevertheless true that the author gives a very interesting presentation of certain features of African jungle life, with which his serious business has brought him into close and prolonged contact. Against sportsmen who are dull in their perception of the ethical requirements of sport, Mr. Sutherland occasionally defends his own position with some spirit. For instance, "When an old hunter chances, in his reading, to come across an account of three white men all helping each other to kill one poor lion, he feels his gorge rise, and, after making every possible allowance for the state of modern civilized nerves, is disgusted to think that such a wretched farce should masquerade under the name of sport." He does not agree with the view that big game in Africa is in process of rapid extermination. Taking into consideration the many game reservations in the Congo State, in German, Portuguese, and British East Africa, and Uganda, the thousands of square miles of uninhabited territory in different places where the hunter rarely appears, and the recent promulgation of laws for the protection of big game by all civilized countries having African possessions, he predicts a decided increase in the numbers of such game. Such an outcome he regards as a serious calamity, since the tse-tse fly, so deadly to domestic animals, follows the big game, breeds in its droppings, and varies with its increase or diminution, thus materially affecting the possibility of successful colonization by Europeans. "The matter reduces itself to the simple question—is Africa going to serve as a colony for surplus European populations, or as a collection of big game preserves?" Possibly modern science and the intelligent conservationist may be able to avoid so harsh an alternative. The author has for many years maintained his health and spirits in the jungle with a success for which his specific is, a fundamentally sound physical constitution, ability to get along without the "good things" of this life, a mental balance that can withstand moral temptation in its worst form, and that equable temperament which refuses to be worried by the petty disappointments and discomforts of a pioneer's life. Mr. Sutherland adds to his other qualities something of the sly humorist, as when he puts into the mouths of his native trackers language of a complicated sentence structure and sesquipedalian diction sufficient to set a civilized listener to looking over their scanty clothing for a Phi Beta Kappa key.

Music

As the Verdi centenary approaches, all Italy is preparing to honor her greatest master. Milan, the country's musical metropolis, will have not only a series of Verdi performances, but a parade, on October 10, in which Italy's leading musical organizations will be represented, and many eminent artists will march personally. The parade will stop at Verdi's tomb, in the Casa di Riposo per Musicisti.

Professor Humperdinck is engaged on the orchestration of a new work for the stage which, it is announced, will surely be produced before the end of the year. It is not stated whether it is an opera or a play with incidental music. The text is by Robert Misch, and Adolph Fürstner in Berlin is the publisher. The hero of the work is Field-Marshal Blücher.

Dittersdorf in his day was accounted a greater man than Mozart. To-day his name is known only to students of the history of music. An orchestral serenade composed by him was played at a concert of ancient music in Baden-Baden last month. The programme included also a symphony in D major by Haydn, which had never before been played in public. The manuscript came from Prince Fürstenberg's library at Donaueschingen.

"MacDowell's music makes an appeal to the American public that nothing else does," says the Chicago pianist, Harold Henry, in Musical America. He is particularly enthusiastic about the "Keltic" sonata. He has played the MacDowell sonatas in his recitals through the Middle West, and has found that even in communities which were not particularly devoted to music, the works of America's foremost composer are always received with enthusiasm.

More and more the conviction is gaining ground that, while music is often a blessing, it is quite as often, if not oftener, a plague. A plague it certainly is in restaurants, and between the acts in theatres, and on the streets, which surely are quite noisy enough without bands or organ-grinders. As regards summer resorts, a writer in the Frankfurter Zeitung complains that bands have become a great nuisance at the famous "Kurorte," to which tens of thousands resort for rest and recuperation. Not only is it no longer possible to eat, or to read a newspaper, or to chat in peace, but one cannot any longer take a walk in the woods without being molested; for, with diabolical ingenuity, band-stands have been erected in the most romantic and formerly secluded spots, and often they are so close together that one can hear simultaneously two bands playing different pieces. For most patients bird song and the voices of forest trees would be infinitely more agreeable and soothing than the band music; wherefore, the writer referred to implores the physicians, whose word is law, to banish the bands altogether, or, at least, to restrict their activity.

The Austrian dramatic soprano, Lucy Weidt has been engaged to sing the part of Kundry at the production of Wagner's "Parsifal" in Milan on January 1, 1914.

Probably no feature of the past musical season abroad attracted more admiring attention than the series of concerts Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave in some of the cities of Germany. Since Rubinstein's historic concerts, nothing quite so big had been undertaken. What this other Russian pianist did was to illustrate in six concerts the development of the pianoforte concerto from Bach to the present day. Besides Bach, his list included Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Weber, Rubinstein, Liszt, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Saint-Saëns, Rachmaninoff. In addition to playing these pieces, Mr. Gabrilowitsch also appeared as conductor of some of the works on the programmes. In both capacities he got glowing tributes from the critics of the leading newspapers of Berlin, Munich, Dresden, and other cities. One of the epithets bestowed on him was: "the most many-sided of living pianists."

Paderewski's piano concerto will be played in this country next season by Katherine Goodson, who has been at Morges this summer to get his ideas as to its interpretation. The neglect of this work by concert pianists has been a detriment to themselves, as well as to the public, for it is one of the most inspired and genuinely pianistic works of its kind. Mme. Goodson's revival of it will probably lead to its general adoption by the professional concert-givers.

Arthur Nikisch, after receiving ovations in London as conductor of the Wagner operas at Covent Garden, returned to Berlin to arrange the Philharmonic concert programmes for next season. Among the novelties he intends to conduct are a sinfonietta by E. W. Korngold, Richard Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium," Georg Schumann's Variations on the choral "Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten," and a symphony by Heinrich Zöllner, presumably the third, in D minor (opus 130), which is to be printed in Bremen this month, and the first performance of which will be at a Gurzenich concert in Cologne. Professor Nikisch has also placed on his list Strauss's "Domestica," Elgar's "Cockaigne" overture, and a serenade by Dvorák.

One-act operas are to be the fashion in Italy next season. Puccini, Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Giordano, Franchetti, and others are said to be at work on them. Concerning Puccini's, it is reported in Italian journals that its name will be "Il Tabarro," and that it is based on a French play by Gold —a play which evidently took "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci" for models. It is "verism" at its worst. The mantle, after which the opera is named, belongs to a fisherman who folds it about his wife's lover, after murdering him on a boat; and when the wife comes to embrace him, he removes the mantle, and bids her embrace the corpse.

Art

GASTON LA TOUCHE.

PARIS, July 15.

A painter has died whose work was purely for the pleasure of the eye and of the imagination, which is the mind's eye. Before our late painters began putting doctrines into their work, his painting would have been accepted with no after-thought as Art.

> But the Devil whoops as he whooped of old:
> It's clever, but is it art?

The painting of Gaston La Touche is art, negatively and positively. It is a rebirth of Watteau when Watteau's world is forever dead; but La Touche has seen it through magic casements where his winged fancy has been let loose to roam. His friend Rostand describes such art in verses like itself, written for a catalogue of La Touche's work five years ago:

> 'Tis a dream and holiday
> Fairer far than we can say.
> A Court carriage here he brushes,
> Mirrored in a fording place;
> And its red reflection rushes
> Exploding o'er the water's face—
> An umbelliferous fusee
> Such as he can make us see.
> And he hangs his lamps of gold
> To the blue of the forest old,
> While higher far than we can handle
> Up he sends his Roman candle.

There is all this and much more in the art of Gaston La Touche. With all apology to the poet for the translation of his lines, his poetry does for the imagination what the painter's colors do. Cyrano with echoes of real loves and battles, and La Touche's ladies and gallants from a still more real Versailles, have alike been planted by their artists

> Amid a world how different from this!

The painter's slumberous yellows, for which he has been criticised, do but add the gleam,

> The light that never was on sea or land.

And so we might go on from Keats to Wordsworth, capping verses to express the sane heart's gratitude, in the present drought of school-mastering science and in grooves of change down which the world now spins to machine music, for these visions of fresh life—

> Beside a sea that could not cease to smile,
> On tranquil land, beneath a sky of bliss.

So long as art ranges from puzzles to physiology, no insistence can be too great on the salutary fact that an artist has been found in Gaston La Touche who painted for pleasure—his own first, and the beholder's afterward. And all his art was in the pleasant land where he was born.

This was at Saint-Cloud. He was sixteen years old when the German invasion came to burn and destroy the palace in which the Second Empire had shown him an authentic imitation of Versailles just beyond, with its shadows of grand ladies and gentlemen leading their lives of lasting ease among the trees and statues and fountains of the glorious park. The vision got into his head and it would never out. In vain his family struggled against such a vocation.

First, he would paint. He found his way to Manet, who was the terror of art authorities of that day, and, to tell the truth, is answerable for much of the Art Terror which is imposed on our suffering eyes to-day. From him the untrained youth learned never to admit to his palette any pigment of bituminous black—and he has never done so. Then he found his way across the forest to the engraver Bracquemond, who made him see the necessity of line-drawing, which new Art vituperates like the fox who cried that the grapes were sour. Gaston La Touche was all his life a believer, and he recognized when his colors ran ahead of his drawing. To a critic who made the remark, he sent half his visiting card with the words scribbled on it: "Half thanks for half a compliment."

He found out for himself the sunny capabilities of water colors; and his solitary, unpatronized hard work forced a way for him into the high and dry official Salons. In 1884, at thirty, he won a third medal and a second four years later, and the silver medal—never quite the highest official honor—at the Paris Exposition of 1889. Next year he joined the secession of the Champ de Mars which is now the semi-official Société Nationale. He lived to see himself elected president of its painting section—a supreme honor.

To tell the truth, Gaston La Touche's life was solitary like his art. A loving wife stood between him and the petty cares and annoyances of life; and he found among his children a little world of content. Then he had fit friends, though few. Among them was Walter Gay, an American painter who in far-off ways resembled him most. Both lived and loved amid past glories of Versailles—Walter Gay in painting faithfully interiors whence the student of artistic furniture and decoration may learn the details of art styles; and La Touche in peopling the Grand Monarch's park with "shapes that haunt Thought's wildernesses."

Swans mingle with court ladies bathing in marble pools; and fauns and satyrs with cloven hoof grin through foliage resplendent in alternate sheen and shadow. The gold of autumn leaves strews bosky nooks. In the real lives, as we know, there were tragedy and hate; but the painter has doubly distilled all into fair comedy and love. What is the use of remembrance and history, if we cannot draw from it romance that has abandoned our own gray world? When wrangling artists who insist sourly on painting only what they see shall be forgotten, Gaston La Touche will still find mortals to gaze on his pictures with delight—because he has painted what he did not see in Saint-Cloud of to-day.

With his sunny play of imagination, there went a great air of distinction—something so wanting to most painters of to-day. It was also in his own retiring manner and in his confidence, when it had been won. It was not a family inheritance, for he, too, was of the people. Perhaps, the aura of royal days, without their petty shadows, floats over all this region. Edmund Spenser had another such imagination when he sang of sweet Thames, running softly.

Gaston La Touche, in like wise, a flock of nymphs chanced to espy among the swans of Versailles's waters. He was not of the new cosmopolitan France from which art and poesy have long been swiftly fleeing, but a true heir of its past ages, of which he painted present visions. He has died a comparatively young man, not yet sixty; but his art was perennially young. He said of himself:

> Painting was always my fixed idea. My parents held out against it, and I am thankful to them for it—for their opposition only anchored me more firmly to my preference. I needed to draw just as one needs to eat and drink. S. D.

Miss Elsie de Wolfe has put into a book the chronicle of her experiences as interior decorator. It will bear the title, "The House in Good Taste," and will be published by the Century Co.

Among the art books announced by McBride, Nast & Co. are "House Furnishing and Decoration," by Abbot McClure and H. D. Eberlein; "Symbolism in Architecture," by Arthur H. Collins, and "A History of English Glass Painting," by Maurice Drake.

Elizabeth Haig, in "Floral Symbolism of the Great Masters" (Dutton, illustrated), has chosen an attractive theme, and has carried out her task with considerable diligence and enthusiasm. Besides the flowers of symbolic meaning—chiefly the lily, the rose, the carnation, and violet—the palm is treated, and also the symbolism of fruit. Perhaps the most interesting features of the symbolistic process are the extension of the use of the lily, to signify purity, and the consecration of the rose, Venus's flower, to indicate celestial love. The cucumber, which appears so often in pictures of the early Paduan school, is interpreted as Jonah's gourd, the symbol of death and resurrection. A study of Gentile da Fabriano's pictures, particularly on the flower-decked frame of the great Adoration, would have supplied our author with excellent examples. In general, one may cavil only at an unnecessary profusion of misprints and at a few misleading statements. That Siena, the City of the Virgin, preferred the cult of the Christ Child to that of his Mother needs demonstration. Schöngauer's prints are erroneously called drawings. Botticelli's Santo Spirito altar-piece is not lost, but is a chief ornament of the Berlin Gallery. The best modern opinion accepts Giotto's authorship of the Dante portrait in the Bargello. The Virgin's Adoration of the Child is not of fifteenth century invention, but may be traced far back into the fourteenth. It is drawn from the "Meditations" ascribed to St. Bonaventura. Such minor corrections could be multiplied, but it is enough to say that this unpretentious essay is interesting to read and adequate as a popular presentation of the theme.

David C. Preyer, art critic, met his death in New York on Tuesday by falling from a window of his apartment. He was sixty years old and a native of Holland. Besides articles contributed to the publications of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in which institution he was actively interested, he wrote books on works in foreign museums. It is said that he had visited every important museum in the world.

FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES OF THE HARVESTS.

Not often has the outcome of the great agricultural harvests of the United States been awaited with greater interest than this year, and not often has the result, as thus far indicated, promised contrasts so remarkable. The Department of Agriculture's monthly estimate, on the condition and promise of the various grain crops, was published last Friday afternoon. Comparison of its report with that of a month before was certain to give a broad view of what had happened to the crops, for good or ill, during July. That month, as it happened, was a period when prolonged and severe drought in the Southwestern corn belt beyond the Mississippi, was known to have injured the corn crop very seriously, but when, at the same time, the harvesting of the winter-sown wheat crop and the growth of the spring-sown wheat were known to have progressed most favorably.

Summed up, the report cut down the corn crop's "average condition" as compared with the opening of July, by 11 per cent. It showed a loss of 299,000,000 bushels for the country from expectations of a month ago; a shrinkage of almost exactly 10 per cent. The estimated loss in Kansas—98,000,000 bushels—is sensational; it amounts virtually to a crop failure, the condition being only 30 per cent. of normal, and the indicated yield only 62,000,000, as against 174,000,000 last year. But the Government report also showed winter wheat to be an absolute high record. It raised the estimate on winter wheat 27,000,000 bushels above the June forecast, and increased the spring wheat estimate 15,000,000. The indicated total wheat crop is only 4,000,000 bushels under the record-breaking harvest of 1901. In particular, the three soft winter wheat States—Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio—whose wheat crop failed last year, have raised 86,000,000 bushels more than they then produced, and have harvested a normal crop.

The unpleasant fact in regard to the corn crop is that last Friday's Government estimate, large as is the reduction in the crop's condition from a month ago, does not by any means represent the full measure of damage done. The Government based its estimate on returns sent in at the close of July; but the fierce heat and drought have continued, especially in Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma, ever since, and the damage has necessarily been progressive. The grain trade believes that, if the actual present status were translated into figures, the condition percentage would be 5 to 10 points below the Government's; some private estimates of this week have figured up total loss of 300,000,000 bushels thus far in August, on top of July's 299,000,000 loss.

If we take the Department figures as they stand, the showing is not so disastrous. The Department's actual estimate of the country's probable yield of corn, though falling 450,000,000 bushels below the record-breaking harvest of 1912, nevertheless exceeded the final yield of such other recent years as 1911, 1909, 1908, and 1907. But all these comparisons were necessarily superseded by the fact that the destructive drought and heat, in the Southwestern corn States, continued uninterruptedly up to the present week. Therefore the question came up for fair consideration, what was to be the bearing of this agricultural misfortune on the industrial welfare of the country as a whole, this coming twelvemonth.

The famous years of "corn crop shortage" have left a somewhat varied record. The older generation would remember, as possibly the most calamitous of all, the year 1881, when the country's corn yield decreased half a billion bushels, to by far the lowest figure since the railways had brought the trans-Missouri corn fields into close touch with Eastern markets. It was so, however, because the drought which burned up the country's corn destroyed a great part of its other crops as well. The year's wheat output of the United States dropped off a hundred million bushels; its cotton crop was hurt. A blow was dealt to the extravagant Stock Exchange speculation of the period, and to general business.

For a quite different reason, the still more famous corn crop shortage of 1894 was long remembered. It came in an unlucky year. The country was just emerging from a great financial panic; it was confronted with widespread insolvency of firms and corporations, and with a labor uprising which went so far as to seize almost the entire transportation facilities of Chicago. Under such circumstances, the 400,000,000-bushel loss in corn seemed like a finishing stroke to all prospects of revival, even though the year's harvest of other crops was fair.

There is left, in the list for the past three or four decades, the "corn crop failure" of 1901. The most singular fact about that event is that people seldom recall or think of it—this notwithstanding that the actual shrinkage, from the by no means "bumper" yield of the preceding year, was greater than that of either 1894 or 1881. The reason for this attitude towards that latest sweeping corn crop disaster lay no doubt partly in the fact that surrounding and visible prosperity was so great as to obscure the incident. Prosperity did in fact continue after 1901, on an extensive scale. But economic students would probably give another answer to the question why the shortage in corn, that year, was felt so little.

Except for that one crop, it was a year of "bumper harvests." The country's wheat yield then touched the maximum of our history, before or since; the cotton crop ran close to the previous maximum. In other words, the agricultural outcome, taken as a whole, was such as to leave the failure of the corn crop a minor event of an undoubtedly prosperous twelvemonth.

Perhaps the greatest interest in these three comparisons lies in the fact that, even granting far more disastrous results to the corn harvest than were indicated in last week's Government report, the harvested winter wheat crop and the present promise for spring wheat and cotton are repeating the story of 1901. It is a case, in other words, for the balancing of unexpectedly good agricultural results against the unexpectedly bad. Even the Stock Exchange has not yet interpreted the news from the corn belt as a formidable obstacle to the progress of financial recovery.

Notwithstanding the fact that a number of writers whose names stand for thoroughness of method have interested themselves in the life and teachings of Francisco Ferrer, the alleged Spanish anarchist, whose judicial murder in 1909 excited such protest throughout the civilized world, curious misconceptions exist regarding Ferrer's aims and ideals. Hence the special importance of the present book, which affords a first-hand and conclusive impression of the program of education which so stirred the animosity of the conservative and clerical element in Spain.

Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of the Nation (1865-1906)

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait. Price $1.50 net, postpaid.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait. It likewise preserves the notable letter of appreciation addressed to Mr. Garrison by more than two hundred contributors to the Nation on the completion of his fortieth year of service, and his acknowledgment thereof.

State Papers and Speeches on the Tariff

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY
F. W. TAUSSIG
Henry Lee Professor of Economics in Harvard University.

8vo. 385 pages. $1.00.

A series of papers and speeches first collected in 1893, illustrating the mode in which the tariff problem has been approached by great statesmen at critical times in tariff history. They provide a stimulating introduction to a study of the present tariff situation.

British Social Politics

By Carlton Hayes $1.75

A REVIEW.

"American readers owe to Carlton Hayes the best opportunity they have yet had for becoming acquainted at first hand with the details of recent epoch-making legislation on social problems in the United Kingdom. . . . These measures, all of which have been enacted within the last half dozen years, constitute the most remarkable group of laws dealing with social questions in recent European history, and any one who wishes to know exactly what their provisions are, what are the ideals which prompted them, and what the forces which approved them, will find all that he wants in this single volume, drawn from authoritative sources and absolutely trustworthy."—The Living Age.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 21, 1913.

The Week

Occurrences in Washington have served to bring out again in a strong light the glaring defects of the Senate as a body for the dispatch of public business. On Thursday of last week Senator Simmons, in behalf of the Democratic majority, sought to get the Republicans to agree to take a vote on the tariff bill at a day fixed. Consent was refused. And there is no way, under the Senate rules, by which this or any other contested bill can be brought to a vote, so long as a single Senator objects and is prepared to take and hold the floor against it. If Senator La Follette insists upon speaking for a week, there is no power in the Senate to stop him, even though all its members and the whole country are infinitely weary and disgusted. Yet this admission and perpetuation of futility and impotence are supposed to be consonant with the dignity of "the most august assembly on earth"! Thoughtful Senators know that this cannot go on. The Senate must show that it can be a reasonably prompt and business-like body, under its existing rules, or else those rules will have to be changed. The theory of the present system was that a house of Congress in which business can be transacted virtually by unanimous consent alone would always be made up of fair-minded gentlemen. But if a handful of prejudiced and unscrupulous men have got their clutch on the throat of the Senate, it is perfectly obvious that the old theory has broken down.

When the Attorney-General of the United States made his reply to the Senate inquiry concerning espionage upon Federal judges, and attempts by the Government to influence their decision in certain cases, the matter was discussed only briefly. Mr. McReynolds denied that there had been any investigation of judges by secret agents of the Department of Justice, except in the two or three instances where charges had been filed, and where it was desirable to have them looked into. One of those judges was Archbald, afterwards impeached. To this form of espionage nobody objects. But if what Senator Borah alleged, on his official responsibility, is true, there has been a far graver interference with the courts by Federal authorities:

> I have no doubt of the fact myself that for the last several years there has been such action upon the part of the department, through special agents and otherwise, as was calculated to influence judges in their decisions and in their conduct where the Government was interested. In different ways and by different methods other than by the usual practice, judges are given to understand the views of the Government as to what the law is and what the decision should be, and in different ways and by different methods judges are relieved and others whose views of the law are more satisfactory are substituted.

The Attorney-General specifically denied having knowledge of anything of this kind, and it is nowhere asserted that the present Administration has been guilty of it. If Senator Borah can show that Roosevelt was or Taft was, it will be a public duty for him to do so when the matter comes again before the Senate.

With mixed feelings sober-minded people of New York read that the Assembly had voted articles of impeachment of Gov. Sulzer. Impeachment is the final high recourse of the representatives of the people. It is a weapon which should be seized only in dire need, and never should be grasped by hands not themselves clean. It is staggering to think of this great instrument of the Constitution, laid up with awe, as it were, for use against corruption or oppression, employed by men notoriously corrupt to glut their vengeance. Whatever the faults and follies of William Sulzer, he might have steeped himself in corruption, for all that Tammany would have cared, had he been willing to do in all respects as he was bid by Murphy. The trial must now go on; and it is a satisfaction to believe that, whatever the enmities or malice entering into the framing and voting of the articles of impeachment, they will be argued before a tribunal which may be expected to do serene and impartial justice. We shall realize now the value of the Constitutional provision that the Judges of the Court of Appeals are to sit with the Senate when cases of impeachment are tried.

Meanwhile the political downfall of Gov. Sulzer is one of the most wholesome things that have occurred in this generation. Whatever the result of his impeachment, he is ruined as a public man. In this fact there is a certain consolation, not so much because it will be a terror to evil-doers, as because it will be a reminder to muddled thinkers. Since last October William Sulzer has been the occasion of an enormous amount of intellectual obfuscation on the part of many people ordinarily clear-eyed. Despite the warning of the proverb, they thought it possible to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Sulzer's public career was perfectly well known. That he was a cheap man, of a vanity so colossal as to be a joke, a charlatan, a shallow-pate — all this was as well known as anything can be known in politics. It was not suspected generally that he was not straight, but the fact that he was a flighty and insincere and untrustworthy man he himself had demonstrated in a thousand ways. Yet merely because he chanced to be nominated and elected Governor of New York, we were assured by men whose sanity had never been called in question that Sulzer had suffered a sea-change and was no longer the man everybody had known him to be. We fancy that some of these rash endorsers of Gov. Sulzer would now give anything to recall their words. It is possible that even President Wilson might be glad to expunge his statement of last October, in which he spoke of Sulzer's nomination as that of "a man whose reputation for integrity and independence is unquestionable, a man of high principle, devoted to the public interest."

As the devil can quote Scripture to his own ends, so the voting-machine scandal in Chicago shows that corruption may avail itself of reform measures. The city's million-dollar purchase was not only declared honest at the time, but welcomed as a step towards purer elections. Now it seems probable that it was neither. Suspicion that the price paid was exorbitant is followed by allegations that the manufacturers offered, and newspaper men accepted, bribes for the support of the contract, and proof that the machine may actually facilitate fraud. Exhaustive tests show that by a slight manipulation a particular candidate or party will receive an ostensible majority, and not a vestige of evidence will be left. Whether the manufacturers of such devices are required to guarantee honest election officials may be doubted. At any rate, for a city to pay huge sums, involving apparent peculations, for the means of corrupting its own elections, is something to have left even Hogarth's electioneers wondering. It is to be hoped that between ex-Gov. Deneen's energetic investigation and a rather unsavory newspaper feud, the whole truth may be brought to light.

To indict a whole nation is impossible, but to indict an entire press is easy—in Chicago. Promising to "wage a fight on the venal newspapers to the end of the campaign," Commodore W. H. Thompson, "one of the deepseagoingest men" that ever signed checks on the bridge of the Chicago Yacht Club, recently announced himself for Mayor before the Lorimer Republican Club. "The mentioning of my name," he is reported as saying at a dry-land picnic, "means a bitter political battle between the people and the crooked Trust press." The Lorimerites have long breathed the asides of a heavy stage villain concerning the Chicago newspapers. But note the difference in the real Tartarin. Two days later, the Commodore mailed to the venal Trust press nine columns of water-carnival press-agent matter. "The Associated Yacht Clubs offer all these articles for publication," he remarked; "the coöperation of the press is required to make Chicago's second water carnival a success." Nor was he treated resentfully. "The newspapers are doomed, of course," said the Record-Herald. "But can't we save the naval pageant? Can't the Yacht Club's Mr. Thompson prevail on the Lorimer Club's Mr. Thompson to postpone their destruction until after the water carnival?"

Smashing the Democratic machine in Baltimore is a job that is seldom undertaken seriously, but the new primary law has stirred the progressive members of the party to renewed efforts. The provision that any candidate may have the ballot-boxes opened and the ballots recounted is relied upon to insure a fair count in the first place. Then, although not much is said about it, the character of the national Administration must have some effect upon the situation. At all events, the Progressive Democratic Organization is planning a fight for control of the party machinery. To this end it has obtained the nomination of candidates for the State Central Committee in each of the four legislative districts in Baltimore City. It further intends to name a full legislative ticket in these districts. The magnitude of the task before it, however, is shown by the fact that this organization does not think it advisable to enter the lists for sheriff, judge, clerk of courts, or Congressman. It will have candidates for delegates to the State Convention in all of the city districts, and be quite satisfied to win places on the State Committee and in the Legislature. As usual, the financial sinews of war are mainly on the side of the existing organization.

The noteworthy thing about the new charter adopted by Dayton, O., is its break with the theory of commission government as it has been understood hitherto. For Dayton, while declaring by a vote of two to one in favor of a commission, declares at the same time for that separation of legislative and executive functions which has been decried by advocates of commission government as a relic of an outworn system. Dayton's commission will do what any city council does, pass ordinances. Its Mayor will have the honor of being the "political head" of the city, and of presiding at commission meetings. But the man who will loom large in the city government will be the "city manager." Appointed by the so-called Mayor, dependent for his salary upon the commission, he will exercise control, through appointments and removals, and subject to civil service regulations, of the entire administration, exclusive of the courts and schools. In other words, commission government has swung around to the point of restoring the office of Mayor, but with the difference that he is appointed by the Council instead of elected by the voters. This is Cabinet government in little. It may be a wise development. At any rate, the evolution thus recorded is a warning to reformers not to be sure that old ideas of government have suddenly become archaic, and that by the simple process of discarding them we can have the millennium.

This may be a wealthy country, but it will have to be a good deal wealthier before its Legislatures can make both ends meet, at least with their present free and easy way of spending money. Illinois was reported a few days ago as facing bankruptcy, and Georgia is now on the verge of the same precipice. Her Legislature is informed by the Governor that of the $75,000 now in the treasury, $25,000 will be required for its own expenses, $20,000 for the State Sanitarium twice a month, and no taxes are in sight until autumn. The teachers of the State, for the first time in thirty years, are having to go without pay. The Georgia Constitution was amended in 1911 so as to limit the borrowing power of the State to a deficit created by delay in the collection of taxes, but the force of this amendment was lost upon the first Legislature to meet after its adoption. As the Governor says in his message: "If, by reason of excessive appropriations, the taxes shall have been exhausted in the fall of the year, the Governor cannot borrow for the purpose of running the government." Recourse must be had, accordingly, to "patriotic financiers" who have confidence in the intention of the Legislature to put the finances of the State upon a sound basis.

The National Association of Manufacturers is not the only body which believes that through its powerful influence the political stars move in their courses. Another modest organization is the Grange, a branch of which in Massachusetts has been enlightening the world as to its great achievements. Thus we learn that the Grange, and the Grange alone, "has done more good for the country than any other organization, or all other organizations together, and has done more to bring about great and needed reforms than all the others. The Grange brought about the secret ballot, the initiative and referendum, rural free delivery, the parcel post, the popular election of United States Senators, and will eventually bring about woman suffrage." The name of the speaker was not Mulhall, but Odlin, William Odlin, of Andover, and he was never in doubt for a moment as to what the facts are. He is certain, for example, that "Bryan and Roosevelt, in advocating certain reforms, including woman suffrage, have simply been picking bouquets from the kitchen garden of the Grange."

A new use has been devised for the Congressional Record by a Representative from Oklahoma. He discovered in a magazine an article by a colleague. As he explained to the House, it teemed with brilliancy, pathos, and a devotion to the church. "It deserves to be read and referred to," he said, "in every church and Sunday school in the United States." The quickest way to get it read, of course, was to have it reprinted in the Record, where, in addition, it would "be preserved for those who come after us." Consent was given, and American literature was officially enriched by an essay on "Why I Attend Church." The first paragraph is sufficient illustration of the brilliancy and pathos which the Oklahoma Representative vouched for:

> It is sweet on a summer's morning, when the air is aquiver with the love songs of the birds and fragrant with the odor of roses blown, to hear the music of the church-going bells, an invitation to the world-wearied to enter God's temple and find peace, because the instinct of worship is in the heart of man, and the church is the temple of the living God.

The report of Huerta's ultimatum, inherently improbable on the face of things, has been officially contradicted by the Mexican Foreign Office. On the contrary, Mr. Lind is now declared to be in direct consultation with Huerta, and thus a distinct gain emerges out of what appeared to be a very grave situation. Even if we assume that Huerta was behind the so-called ultimatum, the fact that he has so speedily decided to repudiate it is an exceedingly reassuring circumstance. Step by step Mr. Lind has made his way. At first he was to be expelled from the country. He was not expelled. Then he was to be denied all means of communication with the Foreign Office. He did not find it difficult to get into touch with the Mexican Foreign Office. Personal communication between Mr. Lind and President Huerta was declared impossible. The impossible has taken place. Undoubtedly, the present situation is very delicate, but every reason exists for a continuation of the policy of patience and caution to which President Wilson has so resolutely adhered. Such uncertainty and vacillation as have characterized the relations between the two Governments have been all on Huerta's side.

That Parliament should have been prorogued, not to meet again till next February, and the Liberals left undisturbed in office, must both enrage and depress their Conservative opponents. For the latter have been frantically demanding that an appeal to the country be taken at once; and their shouts and prophecies must have deceived many of the rank and file of the party into thinking that there would be a speedy dissolution and a general election. As it is, the Asquith Ministry will have time to recuperate and to compose differences in preparation for the session of next year, when the Parliament Act will come into automatic operation, and all the critical bills of the Liberals can be made law without the consent of the Lords. It is, indeed, a Coalition Government, and Coalition Governments have been historically the easiest to defeat and break up. But it is the Tories themselves who have supplied the cohesive power to the present Coalition. By refusing to let any of its measures get through the Lords, they have simply compelled its differing members to stand together for at least three years, until they could each attain their desired legislation in the teeth of Conservative opposition. That was all along the obvious logic of the English political situation, to any one who looked at it dispassionately; and the foolish attempts of the Conservatives in the past few weeks to beat the Government on some "snap" division—even concealing members in a Commons bathroom to effect their surprise—show that they are beginning to perceive this.

The Kaiser's reported objection to having Austria borrow his rattling sabre and his mailed glove for the purpose of frightening the obstreperous Slav of the Balkans is natural. German influence is bound to profit, of course, by the increase of Austrian prestige in the Near East. But, after all, Germany has interests of her own in the North Sea, and she cannot give all her attention to her ally's quarrels. Austria, on the other hand, has good reason to press for a revision of the Treaty of Bucharest in which Bulgaria has been so thoroughly humiliated. That treaty marks the second check administered to Austrian ambitions in the Balkans within a year. The first came with the emphatic victory of the Balkan allies over the Turks. The appearance of a new military Power in the Balkans shut off the Austrian drift towards the Ægean. Still, it was some consolation that the leadership in the Balkans should be with Bulgaria, whose relations to the Triple Alliance were much more friendly than those of Servia or Greece. Indeed, it seemed that the rise of a Balkan Confederacy under Bulgarian dominance would not prove altogether unfavorable to Teuton influence. But then came the crushing defeat of Bulgaria by Servia and the Greeks; and what Servian sentiment is with regard to Austria has been made plain to the Government at Vienna.

It is usually held that the difficulty in combining high art with money-making lies in pleasing the public; but the case of Mlle. Moissé, this year's "first" at the Conservatoire in comedy and tragedy, shows the usefulness in Paris of making a second-rate impression. State training is conditioned on an agreement that all laureates shall give two years at low pay to the Comédie or Odéon. If outside theatres make glittering offers, the ransom from the subventioned stage is their $3,000 tuition. Mlle. Moissé decided to serve her country; but others have not. Where clever students see their weaker fellows sure to outstrip them professionally, a premium seems placed on feigned dulness. Moreover, the prestige of "firsts" is lessened by the frequent comment that Conservatoire prize-winners seldom reach celebrity. But as college men here go on striving for Phi Beta Kappa in spite of dismal reports of the alumni, in Paris there is still sharp competition within the Conservatoire. It is not only that Daudet's "Man with the Golden Brain" finds recreancy to his talents hard, or that the prize is still of great honor. The Conservatoire instils a healthful ideal of public service, and there is attraction in the high standards of the state theatre.

WHERE IT LEAVES MURPHY.

One thing stands out in all the manifestations in favor of Gov. Sulzer. They are intensely anti-Murphy. It is not that Sulzer is admired or trusted, but that Murphy is detested and feared. In the face of the grave charges against Gov. Sulzer, which are so strongly evidenced and which he has not met in a way at all satisfactory, he could hardly have a friend—or, at any rate, a defender—in the State, were it not for one circumstance. That circumstance is named Murphy. Hatred of him almost takes on the guise of love of Sulzer. It is an extraordinary phenomenon. Men are writing letters to the press and talking to each other in the street who completely admit the worst that is alleged against Sulzer, yet who, in the same breath, declare that he ought to be supported simply because Murphy is fighting him. "If you would rise," was the advice of an old politician to a beginner, "make for yourself enemies." But the most skilled practitioner in politics could scarcely have been prepared for the remarkable demonstration of the value to William Sulzer, at this political juncture, of Charles F. Murphy's implacable enmity.

The explanation lies deep in human nature. Men believe in fair play, and are nauseated by hypocrisy; and in all the Sulzer affair they are convinced that Murphy is neither square nor honest. They know that the Tammany Boss would have supported, without a scruple, the crookedest Governor on earth, if only he could have used him. As for Murphy exposing and punishing corruption, that is a spectacle to give the whole State what Lloyd George called a "cross-Channel" feeling. It is casting out a devil by the prince of devils. This is unquestionably the sentiment which moves so many to take the position that it makes no difference how guilty Gov. Sulzer is, since it is Murphy who is trying to pull him down. They are appalled, and no wonder, at the thought of Tammany laying unclean hands upon that great emergency weapon of the Constitution—impeachment. And confused as is their reasoning and mixed their morals, the fact remains, and must be reckoned with, that they speak by the thousand in witness of the perfect hatred in which Murphy is held by the people of New York.

Taking all these outbursts as not pro-Sulzer, but anti-Murphy, where do they leave the Tammany Boss? What effect will they have on his political power in the State and in this city? How will those in office, and those who hope to be there, be influenced by all the proof that the greatest political sinner is regarded as not so black as Murphy? One remark may be confidently made. The popular feeling that has been shown will not be lost on the Acting Governor. Even if Mr. Glynn found no promptings of decency in his own heart, he could not be such a fool as openly to lend himself to Murphy, and sink himself in a common destestation. A test case may come soon. Tammany people have put it about that one of the early acts of Gov. Glynn would be to revoke the commission of Mr. Hennessy, whom Gov. Sulzer has set to work, under the provisions of the Moreland law, investigating conditions in various departments of the State Government. Now, it is immaterial whether Hennessy has found or could find anything damaging to Murphy. The mere fact that Tammany is afraid of him and wants him called off is a compelling reason why he should be kept on. If Mr. Glynn were to order him to drop his probe, the darkest suspicions would be confirmed. The whole movement to impeach Gov. Sulzer would then be declared throughout the State a Tammany conspiracy, and if the Acting Governor were to help it out, he would in the act damn himself as deep as Murphy.

In the coming municipal campaign, it is possible to take two lines of argument about the effect of this State-wide disclosure of hostility to Murphy. It may be said that terror of him has increased along with hatred of him. Politicians thinking of a break with him will tremble as they see Sulzer's fate. In a way, the power of the Tammany Boss has never appeared so tyrannical, brooking no opposition. But on the other hand, there must be a smouldering resentment even vaster than the one that is manifesting itself. It is not simply a question of Sulzer's friends seeking to take vengeance on Murphy. There will be multitudes quietly preparing to make their ballots speak their mind about him. It is not impossible that the very moment which seems to mark his exaltation to the pitch of effrontery and of power, may be the one at which he is to be cast down. Certainly, the motives and the occasion for striking hard at Murphy exist to-day as never before. Standing before the people as the most loathed figure in public life—revealed as such in the very hour of his imagined triumph over Sulzer—there ought to be fibre enough and fire enough in the community to keep his foul grasp off the throat of New York city.

GERMANY'S "RED POPE."

Readers who are interested in the notable career which closed with the death of August Bebel, the leader of the German Social-Democracy, can do no better than turn to Bebel's own story, "My Life," which appeared in this country last spring and has been reviewed in the Nation. The narrative is carried only to the year 1878, when Bebel was less than forty, but by that time the Socialist movement in Germany had passed its formative period, and Bebel's own life had been cast into its permanent mould. Simply, forcibly, without egotism and without the affectation of modesty, he has set down the facts of a courageous and busy life whose details justify the characterization of him in the Socialist press as the "proletarian champion of the German proletariat. His childhood was one of privation. His father, a non-commissioned officer in the Prussian army, died of consumption when the boy was four years old. His mother died of consumption when the boy was thirteen. He began to earn his living as a turner's apprentice. For many years thereafter, so he has written, one of his unrealized ambitions was "just once to eat my fill of bread and butter." Before he was twenty-one he was taking an active part in the workingmen's movement in Saxony.

Our ultra-revolutionists of to-day in politics, in art, in social philosophy, have made it a habit to sneer at the parochialism and the timidity of the age that goes by the name Victorian. What our arch rebels overlook is not only the fact that in this Victorian age were laid the beginnings of the great revolutionary movements of to-day—Darwin, Ibsen, and Karl Marx were contemporaneous with the antimacassar and the Friendship's Garland—but that the revolutionists of that day fought more strenuously for the things they believed in and brought greater sacrifices to the cause than the bold radical epigrammatists of to-day. The men of Bebel's time were concerned with ideas, but they were also, and distinctively, men of action. They were robust and single-hearted. Their economic and political beliefs were not overlaid—and badly confused—by vague æstheticisms and mysticisms. As in the case of Bebel, they often had to build up their own lives while they were building up social movements. Bebel knew privation, toil, the inside of state prisons. It was in his cell at Hubertsburg that he worked out his own education. For two and a half years he studied, read, wrote—he has given us the formidable list of books in his autobiography. That was the reason why to the last he held the discipline of the party firm against sudden innovations in revolutionary theory and practice. He knew, from personal experience, what it had cost in labor and sacrifice to lay the foundations of the Socialist party structure.

After the death of Liebknecht Bebel was the only survivor of the notable group associated with the birth of the German Social-Democracy—Karl Marx, Ferdinand Lassalle, Friedrich Engels, Liebknecht, and himself. But he had personality as well as prestige. He was a stirring orator, a brilliant tactician, and a man of unsullied private life, generous, sympathetic, eminently approachable. He needed all his resources. On the one hand there had grown up a school, of which Eduard Bernstein is the best-known exponent, which rejected some of the fundamental conceptions of the Marxian economics and advocated coöperation between the Social Democracy and the non-Socialist democratic elements in the Reichstag. On the other hand he had to combat the influence of the revolutionary extremists who, under the stimulus of the late upheaval in Russia, advocated the general strike and other forms of direct action which are now associated with Syndicalism. Bebel was afraid that a policy of opportunism might lead to party disintegration, and he had before him the example of the French and Italian Socialists. He was afraid that a general strike, by precipitating a direct trial of strength with the armed forces of the Empire, would lead only to reaction. He recognized the argument of hard facts. He was aware, for instance, of the growth of the national spirit in Germany, fostered in part by Imperial militarism and the traditional rivalry with France, and he went so far as to declare that in case of a defensive war with France he should be among the first to shoulder a musket and march to the frontier.

Bebel was called the "Red Pope" by the opponents of Socialism in sneering allusion to his unquestioned personal authority in a great democratic movement. But there is peculiar appropriateness in the nickname bestowed upon him when we consider that he regarded it as his principal duty to maintain a broad catholicism of Socialist doctrine and organization, so as to allow for divergent opinion within the party while preserving its unity. A party counting more than four million votes, or one-third of the entire electorate, is bound to chafe under inaction, especially when its opponents stand ready to borrow from its programme and win the credit for innovations forced upon them. But it was Bebel's belief that the Socialist party, like the Catholic Church, can wait. The highly interesting question is whether the German Social-Democracy can produce a successor to Bebel capable of continuing his work, or whether the Kaiser's Socialists are immediately to become a prey to the conflicting tendencies that have characterized the Socialist movement in other countries and are, indeed, inherent in the radical temper.

AGAIN THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

Once more the old question of a tunnel between France and England has been revived. The British Prime Minister has again solemnly received a deputation of prominent men who favor its construction, and to them he gave the time-honored answer. He was glad to promise them full consideration of their proposal, and happy to admit that new factors had arisen which warranted a review of the Government's historic opposition to the scheme. Indeed, it had already been receiving the attention of his Government and of some of the departments, which he was sure would approach the matter with unbiassed minds. But, of course, the adverse decision reached in 1883 and endorsed by every successive Government could not be lightly set aside. There must be proper deference to the "long chain of authorities." The Government must secure "absolute strategic safety"; on the other hand, it was naturally deeply interested in improving means of communication between England and the Continent. In other words, the answer was as diplomatic and as unpromising as was to be expected from a Prime Minister striving to be judicial and noncommittal.

The committee which appeared before Mr. Asquith was an unusual one in that it represented all sections of the House of Commons and included no representatives of any railway company or of the old Channel tunnel company. Its sole purpose, its speakers declared, was to benefit the commerce of the two countries, France and England. They brought up a new point, the question of the food supply of England in case of war with any other country than France. If the Channel should be closed to the British fleet by reason of mines, submarines, and airships, the proposed tunnel would make it possible for England to draw in all the foodstuffs which could be obtained from France, or by shipment of neutrals into French ports. Mr. Asquith was, like every other statesman, deeply concerned in procuring "the best and freest outlet for food," and, of course, inlet, too. But the thing that weighed upon him chiefly was the military consideration. He could not get away from the fact that Lord Wolseley—a very substantial British military authority—had pronounced against the scheme, and he professed to be much disappointed that the committee had not brought evidence with it to show that there had been a change in the British military point of view—as if that point of view could change under a hundred years on any question.

It is precisely on this military rock that the tunnel project has been wrecked so many times. The British army cannot think of a tunnel without seeing hordes of French soldiers pouring through its mouth and shouting with glee over the final fruition of the Napoleonic plan for an invasion of the British Isles. To a lay mind, it should seem as if a couple of tons of dynamite, or even the deft use of a couple of batteries of artillery, would be sufficient to make the tunnel unusable should war arise between France and England. Moreover, that phase of the question seems never to have impressed the French imagination as it has the English. Thus the Manchester Guardian feels that "the mouth of a tunnel" is "the least promising of all avenue.

of invasion," yet it believes that a conclusive argument against the tunnel is that it would increase "our liability to panics, great enough as it is." This constitutes surely another reason for revising the belief that John Bull is a purely stolid, phlegmatic person, not to be compared with his volatile and excitable neighbor across the Channel. When so liberal a newspaper as the Manchester Guardian condemns a great project like this on a purely psychological ground it must be admitted that the difficulties in the way of the tunnel are almost insurmountable.

To a foreigner it should seem as if a real statesman could easily find his way out of this dilemma, by a joint undertaking between France and England that in the event of hostilities the tunnel would be neutralized, or by engineering devices which would permit the flooding of the tunnel on twenty-four hours' notice, or by the construction of sufficient fortifications at the ends to make invasion impossible. But this is one of those military problems, like the matter of armament, in the face of which statesmanship is always ready to announce that it can find no solution. This is the more singular in view of the fact that there actually was signed in 1876 an agreement between France and England for this very tunnel. Had the English company then had the money in hand, the tunnel would have been built. But by 1883 the militarists got control of the situation, and since that time the Government has not only been not friendly, but actually hostile, to the plan. Now, the militarists fear not only France, but Germany. Preposterous as it may seem, it is actually argued that Germany might conquer France again, and then, looking for fresh fields, might march her soldiers into England. Could this imminent menace to Great Britain's freedom be disposed of by some fortunate turn in Continental politics, such as the establishment of a Triple Entente, comprising England, France, and Germany, we venture to assert that the militarists would produce a Russian danger, and still have in reserve a Chinese peril, to urge against what would unquestionably be a most beneficent commercial undertaking.

In one aspect there has been a distinct gain with the passage of time. No one doubts now that either a tunnel or a bridge is practical. Indeed, when the Government interfered in 1882 with the operations then in progress, a seven-foot driftway had been driven for 2,300 yards under the sea. A French company also sunk a shaft and started a heading. Since then the success in driving tunnels under the North and East Rivers in New York shows that a Channel tunnel could be built with much less money than had been estimated—the contractors for the Pennsylvania tubes are known to have made enormous profits. Nor does the distance, thirty miles, present great difficulties. But so long as British soldiers assert that you cannot block the mouth of a tunnel or guard it against a treacherous overnight raid of 500,000 Germans, Frenchmen, or Russians, so long, apparently, will this great enterprise languish.

IMPROVING THE COUNTRY FAIR.

An "experiment in coöperative recreation" was the sub-title given to the fourth annual field day held at Amenia, New York, on Saturday. The time-honored name of fair has been abandoned and with it have gone the vulgar side-show, the shell-game fakir, the roaring "barker," and many another feature that has distinguished the old-fashioned fair of late. Even pink lemonade is reported to have been absent, and a dearth of peanuts is said to have caused wonderment whether the drought in Kansas had not affected other sections. Not a single professional "fat lady" was on the grounds, nor a living skeleton; and most careful search is declared to have produced no trace of a midget or of any bedizened short-skirted dancer "straight from the Casino on Broadway, New York." Altogether, it was a hygienically sterilized and novel entertainment which lured by the thousand the dwellers in the Harlem Valley from their usual Saturday occupations.

By this it must not be thought that all interest leaves the country fair when its old name and everything which suggests a touch of wickedness disappear. It is merely a wholesale substitution which has gone on—birch beer in sanitary bottles drunk through sterilized straws in place of denatured pink lemonade in dirty glasses, automobiles by the hundred for farmers' wagons, and safe and sane athletic sports in lieu of carefully "pulled" or prearranged trotting races. Trap-shooting, tug-of-war, broad and high jumping, sack, obstacle, and three-legged races—these are some of the attractions of the modern field day, together with folk dancing (on Saturday, "by girls and boys from Amenia, Wassaic, Sharon, and Pawling"). Between the dancing and the tug-of-war at Amenia were fifteen-minute speeches by a real United States Senator and a genuine suffragist leader in the big tent by the road, and these, like all the other attractions, were free. Money, so runs the report, was the least useful article on the grounds. Even the ten most beautiful girls in Dutchess County, in suffrage tableaux, were to be seen without any expense whatever. For those more studiously inclined there were agricultural demonstrations by farm experts and State employees, including alfalfa planting, and, lest it be thought that there was a lack of patriotism, the national game was not neglected. Philmont and Pine Plains fought for the Harlem Valley championship.

Altogether, this is a serious and important effort to put the spirit of play into rural life, which a city man, Prof. Joel E. Spingarn, has started in Amenia because he, like so many others, feels that the country must be made as attractive socially as the city if the young folks are to be kept on the farms. Their doctrine is that there is a "good deal of work in the country, but most of our boys and girls have forgotten how to play," and that all such recreation plans should be carried out by the natives themselves, and not by irresponsible showmen from the Bowery, with a train of card sharpers and gambling touts. The continuing success of the experiment is demonstrated by the plan to organize at Amenia to-day a permanent body to carry it on. Indeed, it will soon pass out of the experimental stage, after another year or two of trial, when it will probably no longer depend on the initiative of one public-spirited man. That something must be done to organize country workers along social lines has long been recognized; this as much as the needs of the cities was a compelling reason for the organization of the Playground Association of America in 1906. The country man has taken his pleasures not only sadly and seriously, but altogether too much by himself; his sports have been the solitary sports—hunting and fishing. From this in the country town the reaction has been to the bar-room, the lodge-room, the billiard-table, and, latterly, the moving-picture show. But open-air meeting-places, with opportunities for harmless, healthful, stimulating recreation—these the countryside has only begun to have.

ENGLISH AND BASEBALL.

One of the most puzzling problems of this puzzling era is the effect wrought upon our native speech by contact with the national game. Why is it that when it essays to tell what happened at the Polo Grounds or Ebbets Field between the hours of 3:30 and 6 P. M., the English language stands on its head and tries to convey its meaning by waving its hands and feet, instead of speaking like one sane man to another? Surely, here is material worthy the attention of the philologist, not to say the psychopath; and yet up to the present moment no one has undertaken a scientific investigation of the case. Its difficulties, indeed, are enough to daunt the boldest. The Supreme Court may muster up courage to attempt the unscrambling of Trust eggs, but who will unscramble the conglomerate that decorates the sporting pages of our greatest newspapers—pages which, in the West and South, actually have to be of a different color from the rest of the edition in order to stand the strain of the verbal whirlwind which daily strews them with linguistic wreckage?

A step towards the solution of this question has been taken by the Chicago Record-Herald. Almost any one would say that, whatever the ideal may be, to write an account of a baseball game in anything resembling ordinary English would be an impossible feat. You might as well ask Henry James to write a novel in the same elusive medium. But nothing is too stupendous for a Chicago sporting editor to tackle, and accordingly the Record-Herald actually prints the story of a game in a style which it describes as "less boisterous" than the customary manner. In order to make the account intelligible to followers of the game, it prints alongside of it a story written in "baseballese." It asks its readers to express themselves with regard to the comparative merits of the two styles. As might be expected, these readers display an irreconcilable difference of opinion. "When you quit slang," writes one, tersely, "I quit the paper." The cogency of this argument is manifest. "Slang by all means," votes another. "Slang and baseball go hand in hand." "One is nearer the park," comments a third, "when Schulte 'slams the pill' than when he merely 'hits the ball.'" The critic who writes, "Eliminate slang from baseball accounts and you will kill the joy of thousands of fans," seems to mean the same thing as his fellow who exclaims: "Can the highbrow stuff. It isn't baseball. Sounds like croquet or authors. Come across with the real dope."

But those on the other side are just as earnest and vigorous. "A little mustard on a sandwich gives it snap," remarks one philosopher, "but who wants a mustard sandwich?" Rather surprisingly, the owner of the Chicago "White Sox," that "old Roman," Charles A. Comiskey, comes out decidedly for English. What readers wish to know first, he thinks, is who won the game, and, secondly, how it was won or lost. The University of Chicago, however, with that ultra-modern spirit which one expects of great educational institutions nowadays, does not vote for English unadorned. One professor thinks it would be "pretty tame" to report baseball in "plain, ordinary English." Yet unintelligibility is not desirable, either. "The real genius is the man who can introduce all the enjoyable piquancy possible within limits which will enable the ordinary reader to know what he is talking about. We want the picturesque." Presumably, this is what is meant by other writers who say: "Baseball slang is more clever and twice as interesting as the plain English." "The slang part is just as good as the baseball." "Puts life into the reading of games, and that's about all we see of the games out here." How high an ideal one may have in this respect is revealed by the statement: "I prefer to read a baseball story that can only be expressed in slang."

The distinction that needs to be drawn is that between graphic description and hysterical slang. To be asked to choose between dulness, posing as "plain English," and intoxication, calling itself picturesqueness, is to be confronted with a false dilemma. Slangy distortions and inventions, diction gone mad, and metaphor that o'erleaps itself, are not essential to an account which shall reflect the tension it reports. Here is a passage or two from the Record-Herald's "less boisterous" story:

> By hitting three Cub pitchers to every corner of the field, Philadelphia yesterday defeated the Cubs, 16 to 3, at the West Side Park. . . .
> Going slightly more into detail, it was apparent at the start that Lavender was not at his best—no, not against a team which can garner fifteen hits for twenty-eight bases during nine sweltering innings. He seemed to be shaky, but Paskert connected with one, a ball which floated near the corner, for a single. Knabe sacrificed him to second, and Lobert was the next out, Bridwell to Saier. Here Becker stepped into the glare with a two-base smash over second, and Cravath followed with a single. Not wishing Lavender any bad luck, but at the same time being compassionate of Cravath resting on first, Luderus, next up, put the ball into the right-field bleachers for a screeching home-run drive. That was all, as Doolan flew out to Evers.

Is it accurate to characterize a narrative written in this fashion as "a swell little obituary notice"? The trouble is that in rhetorical dissipation, as in any other, it takes a superhuman will to hold one's self back from the utmost verge. Why baseball should be more addicted to this vice than golf, tennis, or even football, is part of the general mystery in the case. Perhaps the greater attention devoted to it has turned its head and upset its moral equilibrium. Certainly there is no reason why the language in which an account of it is written should so far outdo the feats of the players whom it glorifies.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Old and obscure periodicals are something of a Tom Tiddler's ground where amidst rubbish heaps there are occasional pieces of the gold and silver of literature to be picked up. The Sunbeam is an unknown weekly magazine. Its first number is dated for Saturday, February 3, 1838; its last issue was that for December 28, 1839. These 100 numbers make two volumes and with title-pages and indexes were published "complete in one volume £1.8.0." "Devoted to science, literature, and music," each number had an original piece of music—some of them by well-known composers. In the last volume of the Sunbeam there is an announcement that it would be continued in a new and improved series as the Sylph, but whether this ever came out I know not. Neither Sunbeam nor Sylph is in the British Museum Catalogue of Periodicals.

The unknown editor was a great admirer of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and this may have induced Mr. Thomas Curnick, of Bristol, to send him in 1838 a letter he had received from the poet in 1814. Mr. Curnick was a worshipper, though not, it may be feared, a priest, of the Muses, and not satisfied with the opinions, or lack of opin-lons, of "his Bœotian friends" about his verses, he sent to S. T. C. a copy of an "Ode on the Victories obtained by the allied armies under the command of Lord Wellington," and with it a letter in which "a young and ardent mind naturally enough, freely indulged its observations on the chilling and destructive apathy with which metrical compositions were generally regarded." To understand the reply of S. T. C., it is necessary to quote some verse from this production:

Then tune, sweet lyre! to Wellington thy string;
To Wellington thy warbling accents raise:
For say of whom more glorious canst thou sing;
What mightier hero praise:
Than he whose powerful hand
Supports the tott'ring domes of freedom's state?
Inwreathed with victory see him stand,
And hurl upon his foes inevitable fate!

On the auspicious hour that gave thee birth,
Britannic Mars! rejoicing nature smil'd;
Cherubic forms declar'd thy future worth,
And mark'd thee conq'ror in the dreadful field.
Bright honour wove a chaplet for thy brow;
Justice thy manly bosom sway'd;
While, like the moon, thy acts conspicuous grow,
Till to the full they rise in majesty array'd.

. . . . . .

Hark! the brazen trumpet swells;
See where the god in terror rolls his car;
Swift as a wintry flood its course impels.
The rattling wheels resound, and thunder through the war.
Mark his helm and pond'rous spear;
Mark how his falchion fires the dusky air;
His steeds with meteor-manes, and eyes that wildly glare!

'Tis past—the fiend of slaughter flies;
In murmurs low the clam'rous battle dies;
As distant billows from the shore recede:
And hear what strains harmonious rise;
Strains which alone from seraph harps proceed,
Expansive through the skies.
Peace, behold on downy wings descending;
Unnumber'd joys her heavenly form attending;
Her accents every grief assuage;
And calm the dauntless warrior's rage.

The poet's reply is one that does credit to his kindly feeling, and may now be given in full:

MR. T. CURNICK—DEAR SIR:

I have been much affected by your letter, and have perused, with considerable pleasure, the poems which accompanied it. But how can I serve you? Gold and silver have I none; but, on the contrary, I am myself sorely embarrassed. Mr. Southey and I married sisters; and I am on terms of intimacy with him. But it was not to Kirke White, but to his family, that Southey could make himself serviceable, by becoming his biographer and editor, after his premature death.

Many thoughts crowded on me during the perusal of your letter, which pressing engagements prevent me communicating at present; but within a short time I will endeavour to perform that most arduous duty of one sympathizing Christian to another, that of telling what appears to him to be the truth. O that I could convey to you, in all its liveliness, the anguish of regret which I have a thousand times felt (while obliged, for the bread of the day, to be aiming at excellencies which in the most favored natures require health, competence, tranquillity, and genial feelings), that I had not been taught to earn my subsistence mechanically, where, if my fingers were weary, my heart and brain at least were at rest!

From the time of Pope's translation of Homer, inclusive, so countless have been the poetic metamorphoses of almost all possible thoughts and connections of thought, that it is scarcely practicable for a man to write in the ornamented style on any subject without finding his poem, against his will and without his previous consciousness, a cento of lines that had preëxisted in other works; and this it is which makes poetry so very difficult, because so very easy, in the present day. I myself have for many years past given it up in despair.

There is much fire and spirit in your Ode on Lord Wellington; and the chief defect is a confusion of mythology. Cherubs have no connection with Mars; and the first stanza is obscure, because the reader does not know whether you mean Lord Wellington or an imaginary god of war. If the latter, the after introduction of the Almighty is irreverent; or (as the painter's phrase is), "out of keeping." If the former, the ponderous spear, etc., is not translatable into sense and fact. Poetry must be more than good sense, or it is not poetry; but it dare not be less, or discrepant. Good sense is not, indeed, the superstructure; but it is the rock, not only on which the edifice is raised, but likewise the rock-quarry from which all its stones have been by patient toil, dug out.

The whole of next week I am unfortunately preëngaged, day after day, and the whole of each day; but, after that, you will generally find me at No. 2, Queen Square, any time from seven in the evening to ten; and if you can point out any mode in which I can be really useful to you, be assured I shall be most ready to attempt it.

Will you forgive a man who has had repeated occasions for mourning that he had not himself pursued the profession of the law, (a profession which needs only to be considered in the light of a manly philosophy to present many charms to a thinking mind, and which, beyond all others, gives an insight into the real state of society, the hearts, morals, and passions of our fellow-creatures,) to ask you why a man of genius should despair of making genius effective and illustrious in the pursuit of the profession in which it has pleased Providence to place him? I do not know your age, but you inform me that you are an attorney's clerk. Even such was Garrow—such was Dunning.

Do I advise you to desert the Muses? No! I give no advice, which, I know, would be vain: but my experience does warrant me, "with a warning and dolorous blast," (as Milton says,) to exhort all men of genius to take care that they should rely on literature only for private pleasure and solace; or, at most, for the dessert to their dinner, not for the dinner itself.

I beg your acceptance of the enclosed ticket, which, should you have leisure or inclination, will admit yourself and a friend to my course of lectures.

With sincere good wishes, yours, dear sir,
S. T. COLERIDGE.

Bristol, 9 April, 1814.

Two volumes are known from the pen of Curnick. One is "Jehosaphat, with other poems," printed at Bristol in 1815, and the other is "De Eloquentia Sacra," a poem, to which is prefixed a translation of George Buchanan's "Hymnus matutinus ad Christum," issued at the same place in 1825. Years had perhaps tamed Mr. Curnick's Muse, for he writes, "As to the ode, the experience of the realities of life during the last quarter of a century has quite eradicated any morbid sensibility in my mind, either as to the censure or the approbation with which it may now be read."

When Coleridge wrote this letter, he was in Bristol on a lecturing expedition, which does not appear to have been very successful. His discourses on Milton were "indifferently attended." The poet was not in good physical condition. "An erysipelatous complaint," he writes to Cottle, "of an alarming nature, has rendered me barely able to attend and go through with my lectures, the receipts of which have almost paid the expenses of the room, advertisements, etc. Whether this be to my discredit or to that of the good citizens of Bristol, it is not for me to judge." His statement that "Milton had represented Satan as a Skeptical Socinism" gave offence to Estlin, and certainly came with bad grace from one who at an earlier period was a willing preacher of Unitarianism. To this visit, too, belongs the painful correspondence with Cottle, who had only then discovered the enormous extent to which Coleridge was using—or misusing—opium. To Cottle's faithful remonstrances and reproof S. T. C. sent the mournful reply: "You bid me rouse myself; go bid a man paralytic in both arms to rub them briskly together and that will cure him. 'Alas!' he would reply, 'that I cannot move my arms is my complaint and my misery.'" It was a wounded giant who amidst his troubles physical and mental wrote this kindly letter to Thomas Curnick.

THE LIBRARIES AND THE SCHOLAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some time ago I addressed the same query to the libraries of Boston, New York, and Washington, namely, what Spanish novels of chivalry printed before 1650 were in their possession? There is a list of such novels in the fortieth volume of the Biblioteca de Autores Españoles. The reply from New York was that they had not a single one, and from the other two cities that they could not answer my question. If I had to rely on American libraries, my recent article in the Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen would never have been written. One librarian went so far as to send me a list of picaresque novels, and on my remonstrance he replied that the novels of chivalry and the picaresque novels were so much alike that they could be easily mistaken one for the other.

In the recent book on Greek novels by Dr. S. L. Wolff there is no evidence that the author has seen any of the old editions of the Italian translation of Achilles Tatius. I suppose they were not accessible. Now, I have three copies of them in my possession, bought at fifty cents apiece.

The Italian play, "Il Sacrificio degli Intronati," is very often mentioned as a possible source of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night." Now, the late Dr. Furness had a copy of it, and I have three of them, but a person who should ask for it at an American library would probably get nothing but a stare.

There is nothing more mischievous than the American librarian's notion that a book has to be bought only when there is a demand for it. Some books have to be bought as soon as a chance presents itself, irrespective of the demand. I had only one chance of buying a certain book in my whole life; I bought it, and have been using it constantly.

There is another question which I should like to touch, namely, that of etiquette. When I write for information to a European library, I generally get a reply from the librarian himself or his assistant, and the reply is to the point. In this country one is likely to get a letter of an extraordinary flippancy, smacking of centuries of half-education and signed Miss Dashaway. Some time ago one of the best libraries was requested to send a complete edition of Straparola's novels. An abridged edition was duly received the next day. In fact, most of the librarians do not know whether the editions in the library are abridged or not, unless it is specified in letters of an inch size on the title. The fallacy of the American notion of cataloguing books from the titles alone will sooner or later become apparent.

MEMORIALS TO KING EDWARD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I ask for the hospitality of your columns to enable me to state that, by desire of her Majesty Queen Alexandra, I have undertaken to collect particulars, for publication in due course, of all memorials, of whatever description, at home, in the colonies, and abroad, to his late Majesty King Edward, as also of any events connected with the King during his life, of which there has been any record.

I shall be much obliged, therefore, to hear from those who may be connected with such memorials, or events, when I shall be glad to send particulars of the information required.

CATHOLICS AND LIBERTY OF OPINION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of August 7, "T. V." writing a letter on "Catholicism and the Roman Hierarchy," says I made an "amazing statement," when I said, in the Nation of July 24, that I, a Catholic, had not been forbidden to believe in our public-school system and to disbelieve in a union of church and state. He advises me to read certain paragraphs of the Syllabus of Errors in the Pope's Encyclical of December 8, 1864, where, he says, my opinions are proscribed. I have read them. They apply to educational and governmental conditions which are inimical to the Catholic religion. They are not fairly applicable to a school system in which Catholics have a voice equal with others, nor to a government over people of many sects which treats all alike.

If "T. V." will read, in the Catholic Encyclopædia, the article on "Schools" by the Rev. William Turner, professor of philosophy in the Catholic University at Washington, and that on "Church and State" by the Rev. Charles Macksey, professor of ethics in the Gregorian University at Rome, he will see that my statement was nothing amazing.

I am sorry that I cannot at this moment find a recent strong statement of Cardinal Gibbons, on church and state, printed in the Baltimore Sun, but the following from him of an earlier date will serve:

> I see no contradiction between loyalty to Christ and allegiance to our civil rulers. I see nothing in the Constitution that is opposed to the Gospel, and I see nothing in the Gospel that is at variance with the Constitution.

And this:

> I do not wish to see the day when the church will invoke or receive any government aid to build our churches, or to pay the salary of our clergy, for the government may then begin to dictate to us what doctrines we are to preach. G. H.

THE CHURCH AND THE POPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A correspondent of yours writes on the "passing of the papacy," as though that "would be an inestimable blessing for every Catholic community on earth."

Herein is a strange confusion of Catholic truth. Papacy removed, ipso facto the Catholic Church becomes reduced to zero. Christ is the divine head; the Church is Christ's body mystical; Holy Spirit its heart. But Christ on earth is represented absolutely till the end of time by the Pope, His delegated vice-regent; else, Catholic Church there is none, nor tenably can be. For living Catholics the Church organism to-day stands precisely on a par with the primitive organism of Pentecostal miracle, sign and seal; encyclicals of to-day have entirely the same force and authority for Catholics now as the Apostles' letters to the early Church. Your correspondent utterly mistakes the rudiments of the Catholic faith if he dreams that one true Catholic in all Christendom has an atom or shred of Catholic identity minus the "Papacy." "OF THE PEOPLE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a letter to the Boston Herald some two weeks since, Mr. C. H. Collester made the same point about Lincoln's phrase that Mr. Eckels makes in his communication to the Nation of August 8. Surely they are right. Lincoln's thought is: We are resolved that popular government—i. e., government not only for the people (as benevolent despotism might be), but also by the people (which representative government alone is), shall not perish. In the shallow eloquence of careless speakers, the three prepositions are emphasized; I have, however, heard one intelligent and accomplished speaker, Dr. Charles Fleischer, of Boston, quote it understandingly: ". . . government of the people—by the people and for the people." THE UPLIFT OF THE STAGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Green Meadows has become a centre of interest: the eyes of the world, we are assured, are upon us; we are mentioned in the press; our stock company is pictured in the ten-cent magazines—because we are engaged in that rather modern feat of elevating the public by means of the stage.

We take our theatrical joys with great solemnity. Going to the theatre is urged upon us as a duty, as the "Friday meeting" used to be in the days of my youth. The "first-nighter" is hailed as a philanthropist—and suffers like a martyr. No revivalist or earnest young minister ever searched the byways and hedges more eagerly to bring up attendance than we hunt for supporters of our local theatre. The laborer is pursued to his lair; the working girl to her club of a Sunday afternoon; and—not the joy—but the duty of theatre-going is pressed upon them. The clergy appear in the local press, declaring in huge headlines: "Not Our Stock Company but Green Meadows Is on Trial"; "If we fail our actors, the condemnation of the world will fall on us." We are run to earth in our offices by eager and voluble young men; besought to go down into our reluctant Yankee pockets and purchase tickets which we cannot use; to "buy up the gallery," and throw it open to that public we are so anxious to uplift.

And the lever of educational and spiritual uplift? the moral boot-strap by which we are lifting ourselves to higher levels?

That really is one of the most interesting phases of the situation. Sometimes the "uplifter" is a Broadway success of some seasons back; again a barnyard and kitchen drama. We elevated the most with "Forty Minutes from Broadway" and "Are You a Mason?" but we have had marked effects—in attendance—with "Madame X," "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford," "Paid in Full," "Going Some," "The Gamblers," "Mrs. Temple's Telegram," "The Deep Purple," and "The Two Orphans."

And yet, in spite of these ennobling offerings, the curious fact remains that we are apparently merely elevating the elevated, after all. The laboring man and the factory girl continue to haunt the "movies," the vaudeville, and even that inferior—and cheaper—company that plays "Romeo" with "a punch that gets over the footlights." There is a rumor that one foreigner has had a ten-cent seat in the upper gallery since the season opened, and I have heard that "a really quite shabbily dressed woman was seen at a matinée," but in general we are elevating the "old families," the society folk, and the prosperous manufacturers in the intervals of their descents upon New York, and we are—oh, thoroughly in earnest about it.

It will continue to be worth while to watch Green Meadows. L. D. THOMSON.

EVOLUTIONARY PHILOSOPHY.

Development and Purpose: An Essay Towards a Philosophy of Evolution. By L. T. Hobhouse. New York: The Macmillan Co. $4 net.

With this volume Professor Hobhouse presents the concluding and unifying part of one of the most considerable and impressive pieces of British philosophical construction which our generation has seen. It is the work of a quarter-century of exceptionally patient, circumspect, and fair-minded reflection. The principal conclusions of the author's three earlier philosophical books now appear partly as "transcended standpoints," but chiefly as included elements; and of the main general tendencies of reflection during the same period the book is in a high degree representative—though scarcely characteristic. For to be broadly representative has not been characteristic of most of the more celebrated recent philosophers; they have rather been given to exploiting to the utmost single and one-sided, if brilliant, aperçus. Mr. Hobhouse is nothing if not judicious and sober-minded—which is not to say that he is dull; and, though scarcely one contemporary philosopher is mentioned by name, the book gives constant evidence of a very honest and impartial pondering of nearly all the characteristic speculative ideas of our time.

The author's enterprise, like Bergson's in his best-known book, is that of taking up the task prematurely essayed by Spencer—the interpretation of evolution. In treating this as the essential task of philosophy in general, Mr. Hobhouse writes himself down as one of the school of "temporalists"—to use a convenient term now coming into use. To the entire series of British and American post-Kantian idealists the temporal order and the sequences and causes of the events in it were the province of science, but not at all of metaphysics. They took this order, with whatever it happened to contain, and "reinterpreted" it in its "eternal aspect." The concrete content of the world made little difference to such philosophers; one set of empirical facts was no more—or no less—refractory to inclusion within a time-transcending Absolute or "spiritual principle" than another set. But Mr. Hobhouse—and here he is representative of the prevailing movement among contemporary philosophers—finds such a philosophy neither legitimate nor important. "I could," he writes, "never accept the view that the whole work of science was of secondary importance, that it could go on constructing its world as it chose, but that whatever its results, a metaphysical analysis would always be able to reinterpret the entire scientific scheme on its own lines." To his philosophy, therefore, the facts of the temporal order are the essential data of philosophy. Were they other than what science apparently shows them to be, the resultant philosophy would be essentially different. And the service which philosophy in the end is to render is to enable us to understand what sort of temporal process is going on here, how we stand related to it, and what our expectations of it may be. On the other hand, philosophy is not merely an abridgment or compend of the results of the special sciences. It uses those results, but it applies both to them and to the presuppositions of the sciences the method of logical analysis. It is by using both instruments that it may gain a generalized acquaintance with the factors, the larger sequences, and the rational meaning of the cosmic process.

Of this general problem, the essential question, for Mr. Hobhouse, is that concerning the rôle of mind in evolution. Is the mode of action which we call conscious and, in its higher stages, purposive and rational, irreducible to mechanistic categories? Is it an actual causal factor, both in the physical behavior of the individual and in the determination of the course of organic development? Is it a factor which becomes so increasingly dominant as evolution continues that it may be regarded as the principal key to the interpretation of the whole process? And are there reasons for affirming the existence, over and above particular human and animal intelligences, of a Central Mind, gradually coming to a fuller realization of itself and progressively fulfilling through the cosmic history purposes themselves progressively expansive? The questions are well chosen; for they constitute, assuredly, the issues which to a temporalist philosophy must appear of greatest human significance. And to all four of them Mr. Hobhouse returns affirmative answers. He is—to use, for brevity's sake, the conventional labels for the classification of philosophers—in essentials a psychophysical interactionist; he is a "psycho-vitalist," conceiving it to be "the simplest hypothesis that all true organic actions are guided by some psychic element" (p. 328); and his doctrine culminates in a sort of evolutionary theism. His God is, of course, frankly "a God in the making"; "we must regard the Central Mind itself as undergoing development," and "the purpose operating in evolution" as "itself not fully defined in the beginning." The total world-picture which results is a sort of dualism:

> The Mind that we are led to contemplate must neither be confused with the whole of things nor with an Omnipotent Creator of things. It is not the whole, for mechanism — the antithesis of purpose — runs through the structure of the whole, and, in dependence on mechanism, discord and evil (p. 367). . . . Our account will yield us a picture of Mind neither as the Lord of All, nor as the casual by-product of the clash of forces, but as the impulse towards organic harmony working under limiting conditions which it gradually subdues; and in such an impulse on a still vaster scale we shall find . . . the most reasonable interpretation of the vital process of the cosmic order (p. 17).

This residual dualism of mechanism and mind has some resemblance to that struggle between the élan vital and an inert and refractory matter which lends a sort of dramatic interest to Bergson's "Creative Evolution." But one of the two antagonists here is quite unlike its Bergsonian counterpart. The antithesis to mechanism in Mr. Hobhouse's cosmos is not an irrational vital impulse with which we best become acquainted by divesting ourselves of the categories of "the intellect"; it is, on the contrary, a tendency towards rationality, making for "correlation" and "harmony" through ever wider circles of existence.

These are conclusions which most of us, no doubt, would gladly see demonstrated. For all of them Mr. Hobhouse offers extended and careful, and sometimes effective, argument. To have given an irrefragable philosophic proof of them all would have been a very great achievement. But it seems doubtful whether the rigorous logician will find Mr. Hobhouse's reasoning unimpeachable at all the critical points. The matter of greatest difficulty is, of course, the extension of the conclusions reached concerning the place of mind in past terrestrial evolution, so as to give them a cosmic bearing and to derive from them a "melioristic" anticipation of the future of the universe and of man. The history of a single planet or solar system, during the brief span of a few hundreds of millions of years, can scarcely yield a cogent inductive inference respecting the disposition of so large a thing as a universe, or the tendency running through all time. On the other hand, the widest generalization which natural science has yet reached concerning, not the recurrent individual phenomena, but the prevailing direction, of the processes of the physical world—the so-called law of the degradation of energy—does not afford a favorable basis for a cosmic meliorism. Mr. Hobhouse recognizes these facts, and accordingly rests his larger affirmations not upon an analysis of empirical evidences, but upon an original and ingenious dialectical argument, constituting his concluding two chapters. Unfortunately, this argument is the most obscure and logically the weakest part of the book. The author, however, since he is a genuine evolutionist also in his theory of knowledge, makes no pretension to having reached "demonstrative certainty." He professes only to have shown that "on a complete and impartial review of a vast mass of evidence," his conclusions are "probably true"; and that accordingly we have definite and preponderant reasons for answering in an affirmative spirit all "the fundamental questions"—the questions:

> Whether the life of man is full of hopeful purpose or void of meaning, whether he can recognize in the constitution of things something that meets his hopes and answers his aspirations, whether he can make for himself a religion without self-deceit, whether he can finally improve the condition of his race by effort, or is doomed always to fall back from every forward step, whether he can trust to his reason or must admit the ultimate futility of thought, whether the spirit of human love is justified of her children, or blood and iron must continue to rule the world.

CURRENT FICTION.

Works of Gilbert Parker. Imperial Edition. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. In 18 volumes. $2 each, by subscription.

For a novelist, at fifty, to attain to a full and "definitive" edition of his works, is sufficient proof, at the very least, that his market value possesses a certain stability. If any one cares for further proof in the present instance, let him apply at a public library for any dozen novels by this writer, and see how many of them are "in." It is safe as well as decent for Sir Gilbert Parker to waive the use of his title on his title-pages. An author's advance in popular esteem is marked by the dropping of prefixes, not by the taking of them. It is an edition of "Parker" which the publishers are now adding to their similar editions of Kipling and Stevenson and Meredith and Ibsen.

I.

Gilbert Parker was born in Canada in 1862, and his most popular stories have the Canadian setting. But he has chosen to be a subject of the British Empire rather than a Canadian; a fact suggested by the title of "Imperial Edition" given to the present collection of his works. From Trinity College, Toronto, he went to Australia, and at twenty was associate editor of a newspaper in Sydney. Seven years later he was in London, seeking his literary fortune. He had brought with him some twenty tales of Canadian life, a few of which had been published in Australia. He meant to make a book of them, and showed them to Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent. After reading them, Forbes said: "You have the best collection of titles I have ever known"; and offered a letter to a publisher. But the author got the force of the unspoken criticism, took the stories back to his lodgings, read them carefully, and burned them, one by one. The next day he happened to pass a second-hand shop in Covent Garden: "In the window there was the uniform of an officer of the time of Wellington, and beside it—the leather coat and fur cap of a trapper of the Hudson's Bay Company! At that window I commenced to build again upon the ashes of last night's fire. Pretty Pierre, the French half-breed, or rather the original of him as I knew him when a child, looked out of the window at me. So I went home, and, sitting in front of the fire which had received my manuscript the night before, with a pad upon my knee, I began to write the 'Patrol of the Cypress Hills,' which opens 'Pierre and His People.'" These stories found immediate favor with editors (especially with the late W. E. Henley) and a large public. Thereafter it was plain sailing for the young adventurer. Things "came his way" and have not ceased to come.

II.

In reading the special introductions prepared by the author for this edition, we are chiefly impressed with the evidences of his satisfaction in his own work. It is seldom that an artist, literary or other, is able to look at what he has done with such unalloyed pleasure as this. Some measure of discontent, divine or human, is the lot of most workmen as they survey their work. However keen the zest of labor may have been, the product, surveyed in cold after-mood, seems painfully defective, if not paltry altogether. The best to be got from the experience is a rueful lesson or two, and an impulse to try again. Sir Gilbert has had no such uncomfortable experience in acting as his own editor. He looks upon the world he has created and finds it good. Each of his books has, he perceives, its own place in the scheme of things. Work which critics have slighted as crude or inferior, he regards with generous enthusiasm, with reverence, even, as marking some characteristic of an early mood, or some phase in his development. To explain this attitude we have his firm and confessed belief in popularity as the test of merit. From such a test he emerges triumphant, with the highest possible marks. Hence the well-nigh Boswellian ardor with which he dwells upon the details of his upward course. Hence, instead of suppressing his first long story, "Mrs. Falchion," a juvenile and absurd performance, he reprints it with a full and kindly commentary. He admits that it is faulty in construction, superficial as to incident, and crude of plot, but imagines that it is "in the main a study of character."

That he is notably a student of character, that his persons are living, breathing beings, rather than effective types, is a conviction of his. He cannot let it alone, is always returning to it, "rubbing it in," in the course of these introductions. Even in the Pierre tales, he recalls that characterization was to him the main thing. "The truth is, that while the episode, which is the first essential of the short story, was always in the forefront of my imagination, the character or characters in the episode meant infinitely more to me. To my mind the episode was always the consequence of character. That almost seems a paradox; but apart from the phenomena of nature, as possible incidents in a book, the episodes which make what are called 'human situations' are, in most instances, the sequence of character and incidental to the law of character set in motion. As I realize it now, subconsciously my mind and imagination were controlled by this point of view in the days of the writing of 'Pierre and His People.'"

To speak of being "controlled by a point of view" is characteristic of this writer. Accuracy of phrase is nothing to him. His effects are the effects of a rapid eloquence. He prides himself quite as much on the painless delivery of his work as upon its slow gestation. He esteems "When Valmond Came to Pontiac" partly because it was written at a heat. He exults in recalling the details of the feat:

> The manuscript of the book was complete within four weeks. It possessed me. I wrote night and day. There were times when I went to bed and, unable to sleep, I would get up at two o'clock or three o'clock in the morning and write till breakfast time. A couple of hours' walk after breakfast, and I would write again until nearly two o'clock. Then luncheon; afterwards a couple of hours in the open air, and I would again write till eight o'clock in the evening. The world was shut out. I moved in a dream.

III.

The theory of the possession, or obsession, of the author by his work, is a favorite; it is often recurred to in these introductions. The reader will find it most fully stated in the preface to "The Seats of the Mighty":

> . . . I have strong views upon this business of compulsion in the mind of the writer. Unless a thing has seized a man, has obsessed him, and he feels that it excludes all other temptations to his talent or his genius, his book will not convince. Before all else he must himself be overpowered by the insistence of his subject, then intoxicated with his idea, and, being still possessed, become master of his material while remaining the slave of his subject. I believe that every book which has taken hold of the public has represented a kind of self-hypnotism on the part of the writer. I am further convinced that the book which absorbs the author, which possesses him as he writes it, has the effect of isolating him into an atmosphere which is not sleep, and which is not absolute wakefulness, but a place between the two, where the working world is indistinct and the mind is swept along a flood submerging the self-conscious but not drowning into unconsciousness.

Atmosphere and individuality are words of which this writer makes much in connection with his work. "The atmosphere of a story or novel is what temperament is to a man. Atmosphere cannot be created; it is not a matter of skill; it is a matter of personality, of the power of visualization, of feeling for the thing which the mind sees. It has often been said that my books possess atmosphere." And his success in achieving atmosphere for his fiction he perceives to be an effect of personality. Therefore, in introducing his South Sea stories, he finds that, "whatever their degree of merit, they possess freshness and individuality of outlook':

> Others could no doubt have written them better, but none could have written them with quite the same turn or touch or individuality; and, after all, what we want in the art of fiction is not a story alone, not an incident of life or soul simply as an incident, but the incident as seen with the eye—and that eye as truthful and direct as possible—of one individual personality. George Meredith and Robert Louis Stevenson might each have chosen the same subject and the same story, and each have produced a masterpiece, and yet the world of difference between the way it was presented by each was the world of difference between the eyes that saw. So I am content to let these stories speak little or much, but still to speak for me.

IV.

In a general way it is fair to say that Gilbert Parker has done for Canada something like what Bret Harte did for early California and Kipling for the India of the eighties. But so far as atmosphere is concerned, he is more nearly akin to the American than to his fellow-colonial. His atmosphere is local color, heightened and illumined with romance.

Like Kipling, however, he has refused to be content with a single atmosphere. He has travelled all over the world and lived all over the Empire, everywhere finding materials, not so much for immediate copy, as for future reference. A certain remoteness in time and place seems to have been necessary to the free exercise of his fancy. The stories of the South Seas were most of them written in England. "When Valmond Came to Pontiac" was composed partly in Virginia and partly in New York city; "The Translation of a Savage," at Hampstead Heath, "The Trespasser" (a sort of companion piece), in Brittany. The author of "Donovan Pasha" and "The Weavers," first visited Egypt in 1889, but there were to be three more visits, and many years were to pass before he finally undertook the interpretation of what he had seen. Only the Jersey stories seem to have been written on the spot.

"The Battle of the Strong" was undertaken in a mood of defiance. The large public won by "Pierre and His People" had been held by other stories of the Far North: "It looked as though I should be writing of the Far North all my life. Editors had begun to take that view. . . . I was determined that I should not be cabined, cribbed, and confined in one field; that I should not, as some other men have done, wind in upon myself until each succeeding book would be but a variation of some previous book and I should end by imitating myself, become the sacrifice to the god of the pin-hole." Therefore he betook himself, "with his teeth set," to Jersey, determined to prove, to himself at least, that he could write of something besides Canada. It was, he says, the beginning of his wider fame. He saw before him fields for future conquering—the Channel Islands, Egypt, South Africa, and India. "In all these fields, save India," he says, looking back, "I have given my Pegasus its bridle-rein, and, so far, I have no reason to feel that my convictions were false." He particularly prides himself on the accuracy of his local color. He has "not yet met a Jerseyman who denies to it ["The Battle of the Strong"] the atmosphere of the place." "Donovan Pasha," before publication, "passed through the hands of an Englishman who had done over twenty years' service in the British army in Egypt and in official positions in the Egyptian administration, and I do not think that he made six corrections in the whole three hundred pages."

V.

The characteristic quality of his work he takes to be a peculiar blend of romanticism and realism first seen in "Mrs. Falchion," first strongly developed in "The Right of Way." The story of Charley Steele marked, he says, "the beginning of a new epoch in my literary life. I had got into subtler methods, reached more intimate understandings, had come to a place where analysis of character had shaken itself free—but certainly not quite free—from a natural yet rather dangerous eloquence." Certainly not quite free, either then or later. The fact made quite clear by these introductions is that their author misunderstands his function. The great and continued popularity of his work stands for something, but does not prove that it is the work of a serious artist. Gilbert Parker belongs to the same order as the late Marion Crawford. He is a natural story-teller, a born entertainer, with a gusto for his job. He loves to have things happen, to play upon such nerves and sensibilities as the reader of romance puts at the disposal of romancers. He does not go very deep into human life and character. He has atmosphere and picturesqueness, and a good stage presence of his own. His latest fiction does not differ in essence from his earliest. Crudities of manner have been outgrown, in large part, but the matter remains crude, or, it would be fairer to say, elemental. There is less eloquence in "The Weavers" and "The Judgment House" than in the Pretty Pierre stories; but they are equally based upon that conventionalized treatment of incident and character for which the word "melodrama" is a convenient tag.

The semi-centenary of 1863, the critical year of the Civil War, revives interest in our memories of that time, and this is shown abundantly in the publishers' lists.

With these volumes comes a noteworthy book from Germany in "The Human Slaughter House" of Wilhelm Lamszus, which reflects the apprehension felt in Europe of an imminent catastrophe. Lamszus is by profession a teacher, a man humane, accomplished, of strong imagination, and good power of description, and his work is of set purpose in the highest degree shocking. The title is repulsive, the binding is of the color of blood, and set off with a human skull, while the contents are an unshrinking portrayal of the worst horrors. The author well knows the improvements, so-called, of military art, and paints relentlessly in minute detail such a battle as is "sure to come." No intelligent reader will feel that the forecast is exaggerated. We have mastered rapidly in our day the forces of earth, air, and sea, and when these are applied, as in future warfare they will be, to devastation and homicide, how can the result be measured? Here is a presentment of the very naked truth. What good result can be looked for from such a book? The author himself has no hope of averting or even mitigating the horrors he depicts. The war is "sure to come." We rank ourselves definitely among pacificists, but we question the wisdom of our brother peacemen who see in such books a means for making our bad case better. After all, the dreadful features of this warfare of the future cannot be worse than those of the warfare of the past. The process will be quicker, but it cannot go further. Heretofore smiling lands have been made deserts and whole races exterminated. Better perhaps that it should be done in a day than that the agony should be protracted. Nor do the imaginary horrors of Lamszus surpass the recitals, based on fact, of Tolstoy, relating to the Russian Campaign of 1812, or the Erckmann-Chatrian descriptions of the Napoleonic downfall, or the narratives of the Thirty Years' War. Heretofore such accounts have not availed to hold men back from battle, nor will the anticipation of Lamszus hold them back now. From the beginning of the world mankind has stood face to face with the grim visage of war. Its lineaments are graven upon the consciousness of mankind as with a point of steel, and such nightmares as "The Human Slaughter House" are not necessary to deepen this impression. That war has been a necessity Lamszus admits. He quotes admiringly folk-songs of Holland at the time when the Dutch were driving back the Spaniards. His references to Genghis-Khan imply that in his idea Aryan Europe did well in driving back Tartars and Huns. To his German soul it seems a blessing that the Napoleonic yoke was broken even though it must be by force of arms. As to our own Civil War, we hope he believes the North did well to withstand the misguided hosts that would have given over our continent to particularism, to that granulation of nations which brings paralysis to all good things.

The humane have long wished that some other arbitrament than that of the sword might be found for our differences. The past did not find, nor has the present yet found it, though we may hope that the hearts of men slowly grow towards gentleness and reason. Civilization is still threatened from the outside by savagery, and pervaded within by greed, superstition, ignorance, class and racial prejudice, and anarchic brutality. These evil powers are militant, and in the last resort can be met only with weapons. Hoping and working for better things, we must make the best of what is, and if there are alleviations for our sad lot, it is right to bring them to bear.

The knightly soldier has always been for men and women a beloved image, the warrior

Whom neither shape of danger can dismay
Nor thought of sinful happiness betray.

Such figures charm and inspire us, standing out though they do in the midst of ghastly environments which are the conditions of their appearance; and such an one in our time of trial was Gen. George E. Pickett, champion though he was of a cause which, had he lived, he would probably have believed to have been fortunately lost. Though sent to West Point through influence of Abraham Lincoln, he was from first to last an ardent soldier of the South, in sincere loyalty recognizing as sovereign not the nation, but Virginia, the State of his birth. That his devotedness was honestly misdirected hardly abates the attractiveness of his manhood.

He had the light traits of a troubadour, carrying his guitar at his belt as well as his sword, a singer of ditties, sensitive to bird songs and flowers, a slender, elegant figure in the dance, with locks curling towards his shoulders, soulful eyes, and passionate sighings towards his lady-love. With all this he was the most virile of combatants, the conspicuous hero in a hundred fierce encounters, according to McClellan the best leader of infantry developed on either side during the Civil War. No figure of the time is revealed to us more clearly. His wife sets him forth in three books, largely a reprinting of what has heretofore appeared. Among these books, "Pickett and his Men," though the largest, has the least value. This is a formal history of the events in which her husband played a part, reasonably correct, and magnanimous in tone, marred, however, by efflorescent rhetoric and sometimes silent when a full utterance was needed. As to the famous charge, for instance, on the third day at Gettysburg, the most memorable event with which her husband's name is linked, Mrs. Pickett abandons her practice of revealing everything and suppresses what her husband wrote about the conception of the attack and the conduct of those who were appointed to sustain it. What Pickett really thought is withheld from a desire to avoid animosities and heart-burnings. That charge, however, was probably the most critical incident of the war, and the full opinion of its leader as to the wisdom of his commander and the acts of his associates is important to military history.

The "Bugles of Gettysburg" is in form a novel, a slight work, though it has vivid pictures of the contested fields and the homes behind them. In particular the negro and his relations with his masters has good illustration.

Much the most interesting of the series is "The Heart of a Soldier, as Revealed in the Intimate Letters." The wife consents "with reluctance" to the publication of these letters, and it seems indeed hardly delicate to give to the world communications so intimate; we, however, are the gainers. As love-letters they are charming, and always kind and chivalrous, not vainglorious in the time of triumph, nor cast down in defeat, just alike to enemies and friends. He was a soldier among the knightliest, and a lover to make glad the life of any woman. War is dreadful. Lamszus does not exaggerate its terrors. Here was a man whose career from first to last was warfare. There are traits in his story which illuminate and in some measure offset the gloom. Some of Mrs. Pickett's stories are very pleasant to read. Of Lincoln, who had helped Pickett to enter West Point, she relates:

It was in Richmond (April, 1865), the day after the fire. The servants had all run away. With my baby on my arm, I answered a knock at the door, and looked up at a tall, gaunt, sad-faced man, in ill-fitting clothes, who with the accent of the North asked, "Is this George Pickett's place?"

"Yes, sir, but he's not here." "I know that, marm," he replied, " but I just wanted to see the place. I'm Abraham Lincoln." "The President!" I gasped. The stranger shook his head and said, "No, marm. No, marm. Just Abraham Lincoln, George's old friend." "I am George Pickett's wife, and this is his baby," was all I could say. My baby reached out his hands to him. He took him in his arms with an expression of rapt, almost divine tenderness and love, which lighted up the sad face. My baby opened his mouth wide and insisted on giving his father's friend a dewy, infantile kiss. Shaking his finger at him playfully, Mr. Lincoln gave the little one back to me, and said, "Tell your father, the rascal! that I forgive him for the sake of that kiss and those bright eyes." He turned and went down the steps, and passed out of my sight forever.

Grant, too, had been Pickett's friend. "On the occasion of my son's birth bonfires were lighted all along Pickett's line. Grant saw them and sent scouts to learn the cause. When they reported, he said to Gen. Ingalls: 'Haven't we some kindling on this side of the line?' Bonfires were soon flaming from the Federal line. A few days later there was taken through the lines a baby's silver service engraved, 'To George E. Pickett, jr., from his father's friends, U. S. Grant, Rufus Ingalls, George Suckley.' "

As a soldier Pickett was most widely known for the charge at Gettysburg, though his supreme achievement, no doubt, was at Five Forks, a losing battle, fought against desperate odds, but with matchless skill and valor. In these books he stands extraordinarily revealed even in his inmost life, a man high-minded, strong, and lovable. The heart of this soldier was sweet and wholesome, and he evoked from his environment, whether friendly or hostile, a response in kind:

Such brave fidelity in death! Such strength and loving will!
These are the holy balsam drops that woful wars distil.

England and the Orleans Monarchy. By Major John Hall. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $4 net.

Major Hall, author of "The Bourbon Restoration," is thoroughly at home in nineteenth-century diplomatic history, and for the present work he has made extensive researches in the archives of London and Paris. The result is an orderly and detailed narrative of the negotiations—primarily between England and France, but necessarily involving much attention to Russian and Austrian relations also—concerning the establishment of Belgium, the Spanish and the Eastern questions, and the revolutionary movement in Switzerland in 1847 and 1848. The work contains the most satisfactory account of these subjects in English; incidentally it throws some new light on certain aspects of the Belgian question, and it presents a new interpretation—not altogether convincing—of Palmerston's policy in respect to the formation of the Quadruple Treaty of 1840.

In respect to the Belgian question, it is clear that Talleyrand and Louis Philippe were not always in strict accord. Talleyrand, convinced since 1815 of the desirability of a close alliance with England, felt that the July Revolution made the alliance essential; that neither the prospect of gaining additional territory in Belgium, nor the supposed necessity of conceding something to the propagandist spirit, newly aroused in France by the overthrow of the Bourbons, should be allowed to prejudice the attempt to obtain the support of England. Louis Philippe, on the other hand, while he never seriously contemplated accepting the Belgian crown for his son, hoped to find some way out which would at once satisfy the discontented radicals at home and retain the friendship of the English Government—"Some scheme was on foot whereby France was to acquire a part of Belgium, and, in return, England was to have the right of garrisoning Antwerp, which was to be declared a free port." And the same opposition between Talleyrand and the home Government appears in respect to the withdrawal of the troops from Belgium.

The negotiations leading up to the Quadruple Treaty of 1840 are examined in great detail, and the story is skilfully told. French historians generally maintain that in this affair Palmerston was actuated by the deliberate purpose of isolating France. Some able English historians, such as Spencer Walpole, have taken much the same ground; and have, in addition, siding with the "Whig friends" of Palmerston in the Cabinet and at Holland House, condemned him for neglecting the "greater good," namely, the French alliance, for the temporary advantage of winning a point in Egypt. Major Hall defends Palmerston from both charges. Palmerston, he says, already saw that the Egyptian question was of vital importance for the future interests of England in India: this, and not the French alliance, was the greater good. In any case, he thinks, Palmerston was not responsible for the exclusion of France from the treaty. He sincerely desired to bring France in; the mistaken and foolish policy of Thiers—a policy based upon his belief that it would prove wholly impracticable to attempt to dislodge Mehemmet from Syria, and that the Powers would never act without France—was really responsible for the isolation of France.

That Palmerston's primary motive was to isolate France is certainly not true. Major Hall makes it clear that he would have been content if France had joined with the Powers. Yet it does not appear that he was ready to make any important concession in order to achieve that result. The decisive event in the whole affair was Russia's unlooked-for abandonment of the policy involved in the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi. Once certain of Russian support, Palmerston certainly cared little what France might do; his correspondence with Thiers amounts substantially to this: "These are our terms; take them or leave them, it is all one to me." With something of the conciliatory spirit of Aberdeen, more friendly relations between the two countries might have been preserved, although it is not at all certain that France, even in that case, would have been induced to adopt the policy of the Quadruple Treaty.

Whether the French Alliance was in truth the greater good, for which England might well have sacrificed much, involves the whole question of English and French relations in the nineteenth century. During the century and a quarter which elapsed between the accession of William III and the overthrow of Napoleon, England and France were always rivals, and during approximately half that time were actually at war with each other. During the century since 1815, on the contrary, no war has disturbed the peace between them; in spite of serious opposition of interests in Egypt and elsewhere, often bringing them to the verge of hostilities, they have always avoided a rupture; they fought together in the Crimea, and at present are united in an entente cordiale. It must have been some persistent influence that turned the ancient enmity of France and England into an armed truce, and the armed truce into a quasi-alliance.

The motives which have directed the diplomacy of France are clear enough. It was fitting, indeed, that Talleyrand should advocate the English alliance; for the effect of his policy at the Congress of Vienna was to make Prussia the guardian of the Rhine, and it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the sequel of his success in 1815 was the disaster of 1870. At all events, after 1815 the thing which the French were most interested in, apart from the maintenance of the Revolution at home, was the desire to recover lost prestige abroad, to wipe out the humiliation of the second Restoration and the second Treaty of Paris—a desire which, after 1870, took the form of la Revanche, the determination to recover Alsace and Lorraine. Generally speaking, France has always felt that the English alliance was essential to the success of this policy, and she has conceded much in order to maintain friendly relations with England.

But until recently, England has seemed not greatly to need the support of France, or indeed the support of any one. Upon English sentiment, a striking effect of the overthrow of Napoleon was the tremendous accentuation of the spirit of insular self-sufficiency. And the crass conceit and vulgar provincialism which so irritated Byron and helped to make him the prophet of revolutionary Europe, which inspired Niebuhr, a great admirer of English institutions, to say that England was dying of the cancer of egoism, profoundly affected English diplomacy for half a century. The spirit of the time was perfectly expressed in Canning's jingoistic phrase—"Every nation for itself, and God for all." Now, Palmerston, as Major Hall remarks, was a true Canningite. He was neither Whig nor Tory, but pure opportunist. With striking ability and unrivalled resourcefulness he pushed the immediate interests of England, regardless whether he thereby served liberalism or reaction, careless of any principle of permanent balance or settled alliance. England, he thought, could guard its own interests; let France guard hers.

However successful such a policy might be in the hands of a Palmerston, it could only lead, in the end, to a splendid isolation. Even in 1871 there was some point in the characteristically exaggerated statement of Ruskin that England was "in much bodily fear; that is to say, afraid of the Russians; afraid of the Prussians; afraid of the Americans; afraid of the Hindus; afraid of the Chinese; afraid of the Japanese; afraid of the New Zealanders; and afraid of the Caffres: and very justly so, being conscious that our only real desire respecting any of these nations has been to get as much out of them as we could." In recent years the wisdom of the opportunist policy of Palmerston has seemed less and less apparent; and England, watching with apprehension the growth of the military and naval power of Germany, and feeling the pinch of her industrial competition, has at last recognized that the permanent good will of France may have its value.

The result is the entente cordiale—an entente which might have been much more cordial than it is on the part of France, if English statesmen had been less self-satisfied, during the period from 1830 to 1875. It is certainly possible to maintain, with much show of reason, that in 1840 the "greater good" was after all the French alliance. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries England did much to prevent France from gaining Alsace and Lorraine; if she had done more to enable France to keep them in 1870, it might not now be so uncertain whether, in case of a war with Germany, the entente cordiale would prove to have been worth while.

Daniel Gookin, 1612-1687: His Life and Letters and Some Account of His Ancestry. By Frederic William Gookin. Chicago: Privately printed.

To most students of American history Daniel Gookin is known, we imagine, only as the devoted and indefatigable superintendent of the Praying Indians in Massachusetts, and as the author of two invaluable works on the early history of the Indians in New England. The present volume, the fruit of more than sixty years of painstaking research, first by John Wingate Thornton, and later by the author, brings together for the first time all the known facts of Gookin's life, and enables us to see the notable part which he played in the colonial history of the seventeenth century.

Gookin was of Irish descent. In 1641, at the age of twenty-nine, he came to America and settled in Virginia, where he had already obtained a grant of land. The next year he joined with other Puritans in a letter to the Massachusetts elders, known as the "Nansemond petition," praying for a minister; but the hostility of Gov. Berkeley, who procured from the Assembly the passage of an act of conformity, drove out two of the three ministers who were sent. Perhaps because of this incident Gookin, in 1643, removed to Maryland, and thence in 1644 to Boston, where he was cordially received, and at once made a church member and a freeman. In 1648 he settled at Cambridge. Public honors came rapidly. He was made captain of militia, an office which he retained for nearly forty years; was repeatedly elected a member of the General Court; and in 1651 was Speaker.

In 1654, being in England on private business, he was prevailed upon by Cromwell to take charge of an enterprise for the transplantation of New England settlers to Jamaica. The ill-considered project failed, however. He was back in Boston in 1656, in England again in 1658, and in 1660 returned to Boston on the ship which brought Whalley and Goffe, the fugitive regicides. Meantime, he was actively engaged in the coastwise trade, and later carried on a controversy with Rhode Island over a land grant. The negotiations with Gorges for the purchase of Maine were begun by him, and he drew up the final report on the matter for the General Court, in 1678. In the long struggle with the Crown over the Massachusetts charter he was a leader. In 1673 he became one of the proprietors of the town of Worcester, but continued to reside at Cambridge until his death, in 1687.

Gookin was first appointed Superintendent of Praying Indians in 1656, and held the office continuously from 1661 to 1684. With Eliot he maintained a lifelong friendship, repeatedly travelling with him on his visits to the Indian settlements in Massachusetts and Connecticut. He was the first to learn of the impending outbreak of King Philip's war, but only by the greatest exertions was he able to save the Christian Indians from extermination at the hands of the excited colonists. For his noble conduct during the war he received much popular denunciation, and in 1676 failed of election to the General Court; but the Court stood by him and bestowed upon him enhanced military honors, and in 1677 he regained his seat. Save for this episode, public opinion throughout his life held him to be, as Samuel Sewall declared on the day of Gookin's death, "a right good man."

The author's work has been well done. The chapters on Gookin's ancestry are excellent examples of genealogical study, and the text is enriched by numerous documents hitherto unpublished. Mechanically, the volume is a handsome piece of book-making.

Notes

A collected edition of Leonard Merrick's novels is to be issued in London, with introductions contributed by various novelists. We trust some New York publisher will import the edition for this country.

The Klondike country will be the subject of Howard V. Sutherland's "Out of the North," announced by Desmond FitzGerald. "My Voyage in the U. S. Frigate Congress, 1845-1846," by Elizabeth D. Van Denburgh, will be published by the same house in September.

The Thomas Y. Crowell Company will offer in the autumn "The New Man," by Jane Stone; "The Quest of the Best," on the training of boys, by William De Witt Hyde; and a fifth edition of "The Journal of a Recluse."

New books announced by Sampson, Low, Marston & Company are "My Somali Book," by A. H. E. Mosse; "Where He Dwelt, or Mind Pictures of Palestine," by Alfred T. Schofield; "The Great Mystery Solved (Edwin Drood)," by Gillan Vase, and "The Honourable Mr. Tawnish," by Jeffery Farnol, to be illustrated in color by C. E. Brock.

Paul Elder & Company will shortly publish a new manual by Virginia M. Meyer on "How to Become a Good Card Player," also a set of six manuals on popular card games by Mrs. Meyers, the size to correspond to that of a pack of cards. A volume of illustrations and decorations in color, by Elsinore R. Crowell, entitled "Behind the Garden Wall," will also be on the fall list of children's books.

The Macmillan Company announces for publication in November "Theodore Roosevelt: An Autobiography." Other announcements include Feodor Dostoievsky's "The Idiot: A Novel in Four Parts"; "Peeps at Many Lands," by Frank Elias; "Mechanics and Heat," by J. Duncan; a new edition of Wilfrid Wilson Gibson's "Daily Bread"; a fifth edition of Medley's "Student's Manual of English Constitutional History"; "Corn Crops," by E. G. Montgomery, and Vol. V of The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift.

In an article entitled "The Ascent of Mont Blanc," in the National Geographic Magazine for August, Mr. W. W. Hyde, of the University of Pennsylvania, describes not only his own experiences, but those of many other mountaineers, including the peasant Jacques Balmat, who in 1786 was the first to reach the summit. The 69 illustrations are of the Mont Blanc region and many of the most notable Alpine peaks, as well as of Swiss villages and peasant women in their quaint and attractive costumes. A brief account of the Italian lakes, with thirteen charming pictures, is given by Mr. Arthur E. Mayer.

Columbia University has issued a fifteenth edition of its "Catalogue of Officers and Graduates," the first edition having appeared as early as 1774. Particular care has been given in the present publication to the locality index, in order that it may serve as a directory for non-resident alumni. Other classifications make this a convenient work of reference.

Wordsworth's "Poems, in Two Volumes" has been reproduced at the Oxford University Press from the edition of 1807. Except for the addition of line numbers and a few typographical corrections, duly noted, this is a reprint, verbatim, literatim, and page for page. The two volumes are bound together in one in the admirable green-and-gold series.

It is pleasant to see that the "Collected Poems," by Austin Dobson, have reached a ninth edition (Dutton). How unusual and exquisite the note of his verse begins already to sound, and what a wholesome treasure these pages contain.

Jean Ingelow is remembered more for her novels, especially for the beautiful story of "Off the Skelligs," than for her verse, but there will be not a few readers prepared to welcome the volume of her "Poems" just issued by Henry Frowde.

A number of magazine articles and reviews have been gathered by Edwin Björkman and published by Mitchell Kennerley in a volume, with the title "Voices of To-morrow." The voices are such as come from Strindberg, Björnson, Francis Grierson, Maeterlinck, Bergson, Gissing, Joseph Conrad, Robert Herrick, and Mrs. Wharton. It may not be easy at first to understand in what way the disillusioned utterances of a Gissing may be harmonized with the hot-house mysticism of a Maeterlinck, and so with the others, and as a matter of fact, these names are more associated by a community of revolt than by any unanimity of purpose. Mr. Björkman's own faith is perhaps best indicated by quoting some of his words on Bergson:

> It is nothing less than a new religious formulation that seems to shape itself before our rapt vision when Bergson says that God, as defined in the light of the life-urge theory, "has nothing of the already made," but is "unceasing life, action, freedom." . . . A divine principle, lying ahead and not behind us; an immortality not miraculously conferred, but logically attained: these appear to be some of the possibilities contained in Bergson's audacious conclusions.

Mrs. Piozzi died in 1821, yet the six folio volumes of Thraliana in which she carried out Johnson's advice "to get a little book, and write in it all the anecdotes I might hear, all the observations I might make, all the verses never likely to be published, and, in fine, everything which struck me," remain in MS, but for such passages as were given in the biographical works of Hayward and Seeley. Now Charles Hughes, in "Mrs. Piozzi's Thraliana" (Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co.), parcels out some further samples from what is evidently an extraordinary storehouse of anecdotes. The reason given by the present owner of Thraliana, a Mr. Salusbury, who is a direct descendant of the Piozzis, for the non-publication of the manuscript as a whole is that "it contains a great deal of matter that is of too private and delicate a character to be submitted to strangers." And, indeed, from the extracts now given one may see that the writer was at least unrestrained in her statements.

She once wrote that it was strange for a woman to possess such a volume, to "put down every occurrence of her life, every emotion of her heart, and call it Thraliana, for sooth; but then I mean to destroy it." Nine years later she had changed her resolve, and wondered "if my executors will burn the Thraliana." Mr. Hughes remarks that the six precious folios, as entrusted to him by their owner, put him entirely under the spell of Mrs. Piozzi's easy, irresponsible charm.

A remarkable table gives Mrs. Piozzi's estimate of the great personages she met, scoring them all on the scale of twenty, under nine such headings as religion, scholarship, manners, wit, and good humor. Dr. Johnson was credited with twenty in religion, morality, and general knowledge, and with nineteen in scholarship, but in person and voice, manners and good humor, he got only a flat zero. The only person, indeed, who had any good humor was Boswell, with nineteen points, and Evelina Burney's father, with eighteen. The best record in person and voice and manners was, of course, Garrick's, with eighteen and seventeen points, respectively, although Mrs. Thrale was dutiful enough to rate her husband a close second. Burke excelled in general knowledge and religion, but had neither wit nor humor; in person and voice his mark was twelve, or about the average. Garrick's wit was allotted the best, and next to Dr. Johnson, Dr. Beattie's religion and morality. Baretti and Seward were evidently sad scamps, for they had no religion whatever, and very little morality. Sir Joshua Reynolds is left out of account, because Mrs. Piozzi was never able to make up her mind as to his real character.

Among the interesting bits of scandal in the book one is inimitably told, in her own words, of a statesman for whom she had little liking:

'Tis now time to turn over a new leaf for the great orator, Mr. Edmund Burke, who, after I had ran all over Wales in 1774, was the first man I had ever seen drunk or heard talk obscenely, when I lived with him and his Lady at Beaconsfield, among dirt, cobwebs, pictures, and statues that would not have disgraced the city of Paris itself, where misery and magnificence reign in all their splendor and in perfect amity. (Note: Irish Roman Catholics are always like the foreigners somehow, dirty and dressy with all their clothes hanging as if upon peg.) That Mrs. Burke drinks as well as her husband, and that their blackamoor carries tea about with a cut finger wrapped in rags, must help to apologize for the severity with which I have treated so distinguished a character.

Perhaps in view of the tolerated vagaries of title-pages, it would be unreasonable to complain because oue's curiosity as to what a moving-picture of democracy would be like remains unsatisfied after one has read Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee's book, "Crowds: A Moving-Picture of Democracy" (Doubleday, Page). Perhaps, too, one ought not to complain at the conception of democracy shadowed forth in it, in view of the fact that "democracy" has come to be one of those cant terms applied to almost any feature or system of human relations which the user of the term approves and wants us to approve. We may therefore merely note as an interesting fact that although one division of the work is headed "Letting the Crowd Be Beautiful," democracy as Mr. Lee conceives it seems to be almost wholly concerned with the efficient production of goods, the efficient and equitable distribution of the same, and the rendering to one another by the members of society, in a spirit of mutual helpfulness, of efficient economic service.

"Crowds" is, in fact, not an easy book to describe. Broadly speaking, its theme may be said to be modern industrial and commercial life, especially as seen in England and the United States; and its central idea, or at least the one most frequently insisted on, in one way or another, is that most of the trouble in this world has its root in inefficiency, and that this, in turn, is due to the tired-mindedness and short sight of a very large proportion of those who are attempting to do the world's work. The book ultimately develops into a glorification of ex-President Roosevelt. Indeed, on page 478, and following, Mr. Roosevelt is formally presented to us as the real theme of it, in language that is sometimes almost dithyrambic, and not always in good taste. The Progressive party is nowhere mentioned, but some of its characteristic doctrines find expression, as, for example, on page 487, where it is insisted that the right sort of men shall be allowed to have a monopoly in their business when they say they need it for greater efficiency; but the wrong sort are to be told that they may not have such monopoly, and are to be told why. "'Telling them why," says Mr. Lee, with delightful naïveté "will be governing them." But how, the doubter asks, shall the Government distinguish between the two kinds of men? "The Government," says the author, "will deal with each man according to the facts, the scientific facts that he has proved about himself." We have been hearing a good deal of late about the science of human conduct. Here is a novel but sufficiently important task waiting for that science when Mr. Lee and those who think with him get their way in the handling of society.

There is a good deal that suggests Carlyle in "Crowds," and notably those chapters in book five which pour out contempt upon the House of Commons, and by implication upon all legislative assemblies. Perfectly Carlylean is the comparison made between Oxford Street, which hums, in the author's picturesque phraseology, and the House of Commons, which hems. It would be doing less than justice to Mr. Lee, however, to suggest that his book is primarily an imitative one. There are passages of first-hand inspiration in it, and reading that is both wholesome and stimulating; and this one may say even though most of the ideas in it, as is the way with the ideas of those who in the modern world assume the robes of the prophet, are little likely to afford very definite guidance in the work of social renovation and invigoration.

"Letters of Major-General Hart-Synnot" (London: Arnold), edited by B. M. Hart-Synnot, will be of slight interest to most readers. The letters, which were prepared for his wife, constitute a kind of journal kept by the general during his several campaigns in Africa between 1872 and 1902. He writes for the most part about the material objects seen on his journeys, and the details with which, as a military official, he was immediately occupied. Of the physical characteristics of the countries he visited we learn a good deal; of the natives and their customs much less; of matters of general interest, virtually nothing. On one occasion only does he break through his habitual reserve in respect to the political issues involved. He devotes a page to the causes of the Boer war of 1881, which he explains with charming naïveté; Boer independence "means the right of carrying on slavery," whereas "England will not tolerate slavery; this is the Boer's great grievance." In the outcome of that struggle he was keenly disappointed, and he permits himself the following criticism of the policy of the Government: "When it comes to taking two or three blows and then being told to cry 'make friends' instead of fight it out, I see conduct not only unfit for men, but what would be condemned with kicks and jeers in the playground of every school in Britain." We have been told of battles won on the fields of Eton and Harrow, but it is perhaps just as well that political issues are not always brought to the test of schoolboy ethics.

A new edition of the journal of that observant but somewhat censorious traveller, Jasper Danckaerts, formerly known as Dankers, who as a Labadist missionary journeyed through the colonies in America from New York to the Chesapeake and thence to Albany and Boston, has been issued as the latest volume in the series of Original Narratives of Early American History (Scribner). Even if nothing more had been done than to reprint the Murphy text of 1867, a very real benefit would have been conferred upon students and readers of colonial history in this country. The Murphy edition has always been inaccessible, printed as it was in the memoirs of a little-known historical society where few were likely to see it and fewer still to read it, while the brief extracts in Hart's "Contempories," though fairly well selected, gave no adequate idea of the value and interest of the whole narrative. Dr. Jameson has done much more than reprint the Murphy version; he has corrected the text, translated from the original Dutch manuscript found by Mr. Murphy in an old bookshop in Amsterdam in 1864; discovered the real name of Dankers to have been Danckaerts, through an autograph note in a copy of the Old Testament in the Indian language given by John Eliot to Danckaerts in 1680 and, wonderful to relate, still in existence in the library of the Zeeland Academy of Sciences at Middleburg in the Netherlands; identified half a hundred names of persons and places which are almost unintelligible in the uncouth Dutch forms adopted by the writer; added largely to the knowledge possessed of the careers of Danckaerts and his companion Sluyter by facts obtained from Dutch sources; and furnished many valuable annotations that explain genealogical and topographical difficulties met with in the text. The Rev. B. B. James, who had already qualified himself for the task by the publication of a paper on the Labadist colony in Maryland, has contributed a general introduction setting forth the main facts regarding Labadism and the Labadists and the history, as far as known, of the settlement on Bohemia Manor. One of Danckaerts's pen-and-ink sketches, of which a number have been preserved, is reproduced in facsimile as a frontispiece to the volume, and as showing New York in 1679 is of great interest, being (as Dr. Jameson says), "topographically accurate, and drawn with no slight degree of skill." To illustrate the journal, two maps or portions of maps have been photographically presented, one the northeast corner of the celebrated map of Maryland which Augustine Herrman made for Lord Baltimore, and the other of New York and New England, a Visscher map of 1655-56, altered to suit the date 1671 and published in Ogilby's "America." Altogether, the result is a definitive edition of a unique historical document, prepared with scrupulous care and rendered easily accessible in a series designed for popular use.

Of the numerous books about Gettysburg which the recent anniversary of the battle has called out, Jesse Bowman Young's "Battle of Gettyshurg" (Harpers) is, for the lay reader, the most readable and generally satisfactory. The author, himself a Union officer, knows the ground intimately; he has read and weighed the voluminous literature of the campaign, including a number of works published within a few months; and he writes clearly and interestingly. His judgments of men and movements are, on the whole, such as have come to be accepted by more critical authorities; while on controverted points he fortifies his own conclusions by an adequate presentation of the evidence. Extended appendices give the rosters of the two armies, together with the record of West Point graduates who served on the two sides. The illustrations reproduce a number of contemporary prints.

Volume XXI of the "Journals of the Continental Congress," edited by Gaillard Hunt (Government Printing Office), completes the record for 1781. Although the Articles of Confederation had gone into effect only in March, the Governmental machinery was already working badly. The responses of the States to requisitions for money were slow and inadequate, the attendance of members fell off, and twice, in August and November, the States had to be urged to keep their representation full. The exigencies of the war in the South made it necessary, in July, for Congress to advance money to the delegates from North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, pending remittances from those States, and to permit Maryland and Virginia, in August, to import salt. An elaborate report on the defects of the Articles was submitted August 22. In spite of these embarrassments, however, Congress stuck manfully to its task. Consular representatives of France were officially recognized, although the ratification of a consular convention was delayed. The exchange of Burgoyne and his officers was at last agreed to. American captives confined in prison ships at New York were ordered to be supplied with clothing and provisions, at the same time that retaliation for the barbarous treatment of prisoners of war by the British was seriously urged by members. The controversy between New Hampshire and New York over Vermont was submitted to Congress, and a committee appointed to consider it. The reorganization of the Treasury, in September, was followed in December by the incorporation of the Bank of North America. The principal military event of the period was, of course, the surrender of Cornwallis, the news of which reached Congress on October 24, five days after the event, and only a few days after the report of Greene's victory at Eutaw Springs. For both of these successes Congress voted warm and unfeigned thanks. Beginning November 5 there is a slight formal change in the "Journals," the credentials of members and the committee appointments being omitted. The volume has the usual appendices, including a careful bibliography, and an index for the year.

Josephus Nelson Larned, writer and librarian, died Friday in Buffalo in his seventy-seventh year. From 1859 to 1872 he served upon the editorial staff of the Buffalo Express. He was Superintendent of Education from 1872 to 1873, and superintendent of the Buffalo Library from 1877 to 1897. From 1893 to 1894 he was president of the American Library Association. He was the author of "Talks about Labor." "History for Ready Reference," "Talk about Books," "History of England for Schools," "A Multitude of Councillors," "Primer of Right and Wrong," "History of the United States for Secondary Schools," "Seventy Centuries—A Survey," "Books, Culture, and Character." He edited the Literature of American History in 1902.

Alumnæ of Radcliffe College will be pained to hear of the death of Miss Mary Coes. She was born in Worcester in 1861, and had been connected with Radcliffe ever since her enrolment as a student in 1883. She was assistant secretary from 1890 to 1894, and secretary from 1894 to 1910, when she was appointed dean.

Wellesley Perry Coddington, since 1891 professor of philosophy at Syracuse University, died last week at Hamburg, Germany. He was born at Ossining, N. Y., in 1840, and graduated from Wesleyan University in 1860.

Prof. Henri Marion, for thirty years professor of modern languages in the United States Naval Academy, died last Thursday at Culver, Ind. Professor Marion was designated by the Government as the official interpreter of the party that brought the body of John Paul Jones from France to this country in 1906, and later he wrote a book on the subject, "Last Cruise and Final Resting Place of John Paul Jones." He was the author of several textbooks of French and Spanish.

August Ferdinand Bebel, the German Socialist, died in Zurich, Switzerland, on August 13. He was born in Cologne in 1840, and, though rich at the time of his death, he had had a severe struggle with poverty as a child and young man. In 1867 he was elected to the North German Parliament, and four years later to the new German Reichstag. In 1872 he was accused, with his friend Liebknecht, of an attempt at high treason, and was condemned to two years' imprisonment, and to nine months for insult to the German Emperor. He was reëlected, however, to the Reichstag, and maintained his place there. Among his numerous writings are the following: "Christentum und Sozialismus," "Charles Fourier," "Die Frau und der Sozialismus," and "Die Sozialdemokratie und das allgemeine Wahlrecht." A more extended notice of Herr Bebel's career will be found in the Nation of July 10, in a review of "My Life," his last work.

Science

Bird-Lore for July-August opens with the account of an island, called the Old Man, on the far eastern coast of Maine, which is the home of many sea-birds, including the Eider Duck. It is about twelve acres in extent, and is covered with dense grass and bushes in which there are so many nests that it is difficult to walk without treading on them. Many interesting experiences with birds in different parts of the country are recorded, some of them by young observers; and there is a list of 244 different species of birds seen in eastern Massachusetts from January 1 to December 31, 1912. Of these, 27 were seen on the first day of the year. Among the other contents is the Biological Survey Circular, "Proposed Regulations for the Protection of Migratory Birds," which is characterized as "doubtless the most important document in relation to bird-protection which has ever appeared in this country—possibly in any country." There is also a map showing the two zones into which the United States is divided for this purpose.

Prof. T. G. Bonney, the venerable geologist, long time in the faculty of University College, London, has brought his well-known volume, "Volcanoes: Their Structure and Significance," abreast of much recent investigation, in a third edition issued by Putnams. The work is a very readable and well-prepared discussion of the subject. There are, nevertheless, two suggestions which the author might consider with profit. Professor Bonney writes in the belief that the earth's crust is saturated with ground-water down to the limit of cavities, a belief which materially influences his conclusions regarding the causes of volcanic action. On the other hand, increasing experience in deep mines and boreholes leads to the conclusion that free ground-water rarely extends below one to two thousand feet from the surface—a conclusion which has been brought out in several significant papers in America. Professor Bonney is also impressed with the value of the investigations recently published by M. Brun, of Geneva. M. Brun has become convinced of the absence of water in volcanic emissions. Professor Bonney could not know, at the time he wrote his revised book, that the work of Messrs. Day and Shepherd, of the Carnegie Geophysical Institution, performed at Kilauea, Hawaii, and only announced last December, has shown so much water in these emissions as to raise very serious questions regarding the accuracy of M. Brun's determinations. Both these matters will need consideration in a future edition of this otherwiso excellent manual.

In science, as elsewhere, the fashions change, and the natural sciences are usually the leaders of fashion. No change of fashion is more interesting than the transition from the static category of "matter," which prevailed from Newton to Darwin, when even the human mind was an aggregation of atomic mental "states," to the dynamic category of "energy," the fashion of recent years, during which nothing has been real but action. In "The Dynamic Foundation of Knowledge" (Dutton), Alexander Philip undertakes to show in some detail how the conceptions of science have their origin and meaning in the "dynamic" implications of action. Apparently he is not aware that his thesis has already been broadly elaborated under the name of pragmatism; his reading appears to have been more in science than in philosophy. His book is none the less worth while, if somewhat amateurish, and if, in the end, like Ostwald and others, he leaves us wondering what special spiritual significance is implied in the substitution of energy for matter and how far "dynamic" is not mainly a blessed word.

Charles F. Mitchell's "Building Construction" (Van Nostrand) is issued in two volumes, an "Elementary Course" and an "Advanced Course." The author is an Englishman of standing in his profession, and naturally writes primarily for the English public. It follows therefore that many of the technical terms used, and methods of construction described, are unfamiliar to architects and builders in this country. Nevertheless the "elementary course" is well fitted to acquaint the student with the general constructional elements which he is called upon to present in small scale working drawings. The "advanced course" is less than an engineering treatise, and more than a draughtsman's manual; the author having kept in view the requirements of those engaged in designing and executing building work, endeavoring to describe the essential principles of good construction, and to illustrate them by typical examples selected from actual practice.

Of interest to naturalists and breeders, though scarcely to the general reader, is R. Lydekker's "The Sheep and Its Cousins" (Dutton). The volume is written to follow "The Horse and Its Relatives" and "The Ox and Its Kindred," by the same author; it covers a field which until now has been vacant, reviewing all breeds of sheep, both wild and domesticated. Discussion of the origin of domesticated sheep is almost purely theoretical, and there are considerable differences of opinion; but the author inclines to believe that the sheep of Europe result from a cross between a domesticated strain of the wild sheep of Corsica and Sardinia, the mouflon, with one of the strains of the Asiatic urial. The latter were first brought into Europe by the immigration of the forebears of the Swiss lake-dwellers. The great antiquity of domestic sheep is shown by the wide variety of types illustrated in the book. Their differences are astonishing, and the publisher has wisely given most of his pictures to the little-known forms. The most interesting parts of the book deal with the merinos, the British breeds, the Bokhara fat-tailed sheep (producers of Astrachan fur), and the wild sheep so difficult to kill, chiefly the argali of Asia and our own bighorn. Mr. Lydekker does not, however, look upon the latter with the eye of a sportsman, and lacks the vivid power of Mr. Hornaday or Mr. Thompson Seton. Of modern attempts at breeding he says little, and seems unaware of the present attempt to introduce the Bokhara sheep into America. The book is dry; but its facts, although not always at first hand, are copious and authentic.

C. Leslie Reynolds, superintendent of the National Botanical Gardens, died last week in Washington. Mr. Reynolds had been connected with the Botanical Gardens for about forty years, and was known for his work in developing the American Beauty rose. He was fifty-five years old, and a native of Montgomery County, Md.

THE PLAY MARKET.

Several thousand plays have been submitted in competition for the $10,000 prize offered by Mr. Winthrop Ames. Thousands of plays were submitted to the management of the defunct New Theatre, of which Mr. Ames was the head, yet of this number just one play was thought worthy of acceptance, and that play was by a dramatist of established reputation. Mr. Ames may have better luck this time. In the years that have elapsed since the beginning of the New Theatre experiment, there has undoubtedly been some progress towards bringing the theatre into closer touch with the realities of life, even if reality has often taken on the aspect of morbid sensationalism. This in turn has probably drawn to the business of playwriting men with ideas, a sense of literary values, and some knowledge of the background of dramatic history. The custom of publishing plays in book form has also grown. On every hand there are indications that this fascinating game has attracted people other than the truck drivers, section hands, and village dressmakers, whose efforts, according to the chronic complaint of the theatrical managers, clog their office pigeonholes and drive them to distraction.

This does not mean that the efflorescence of dramatic art in this country, which is so steadily and so patiently predicted, will be brought about by the college professors. Something more than ideas and literary style is necessary for success in this eminently difficult art of writing for the popular audiences of the theatre. But if the college professors and allied "highbrows" cannot be expected to supply the managers with perfect plays, it is reasonable to assume that they can furnish the managers with ideas. And how often have we been assured that a good idea is all the managers are looking for! We see no reason why this statement should not be sincere. The managers have at their command the services of trained playwrights who can bring the necessary professional skill to the task of licking a good dramatic idea into shape. This is constantly done in the case of the dramatization of successful novels, where the finished play is really the work of a hired dramatist, and retains merely the theme of the novel, if that. If the same efforts were to be applied to developing the possibilities suggested in plays submitted by amateurs deficient in the technical knowledge of the stage, our elaborate competitions might easily yield something more than the usual barren results.

The economics of the musical "show" would seem to be a case in point. Here is a production obviously involving a very heavy money investment, even if we discount the staggering sums put forth by the press agent's imagination. It is safe to say that it costs five times as much to produce the average musical comedy as it does to stage the average "legitimate" play. The percentage of successful productions is not perceptibly higher for musical comedy than for "straight" drama. The returns from a successful drama are plainly much greater than from a successful musical piece. It is a very rare "show" that reaches the dazzling prosperity of three, four, or more road companies, such as has been attained by a very considerable number of non-musical plays. Why, then, should there be any manager willing to produce a musical comedy when he can stage five non-musical plays on the same investment? The usual reply is that the plays are simply not to be had, whereas a musical comedy can always be manufactured. Yet it is the contention of the practical men of the theatre that the manufacturing process is of essential importance in legitimate drama, too; we cannot get on without that technique in which the amateur is so sadly lacking. Why not supply the technique? The rejoinder to this would be that manufacture in musical comedy is everything, since that is an art-form which dispenses with ideas, whereas artisanship alone will not suffice on the dramatic stage; an idea is essential there. The implication, therefore, would be that not only is there a dreadful dearth of good plays in the market, but that there is a dearth of good ideas capable of being worked up into plays.

This does not sound convincing. It is difficult to imagine that out of the thousands of manuscripts submitted to the managers of the New Theatre there were not a dozen which by intelligent and patient labor might have been developed into plays worth while. As a matter of fact, Mr. John Corbin, in a magazine article, once declared that there were such manuscripts submitted, and he proceeded to show wherein these plays, in spite of inherent merit, fell short of the required standard. But why were not pains taken to bring to fruit the promise thus recognized? In what better way could the New Theatre have justified its existence? We speak of the New Theatre; because of the commercial manager it is undoubtedly true that sometimes when he stands ready to purchase an idea from a young writer for exploitation by a trained playwright, the author will refuse to sell. And rightly. In the hands of the professional it is only too common that the original idea perishes under the weight of mediocre stage carpentry. That is not the kind of collaboration we have in mind. We have used the word "idea," but mean thereby something more than the bare suggestion for a play. If the author could feel that his "idea" in a broad sense, the spirit of his play, its purpose, and its grace, would not suffer execution at the hands of his collaborator, he would show less fear of the trained artisan of the theatre.

Music

The Century Opera Company, of New York, has made an arrangement with the managers of the Boston and the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Companies for the exchange of singers. About forty principals are included in the Century Opera Company. To keep all of them busy during weeks when they do not happen to be in the cast, the management has decided to organize a concert bureau. The opera season at the Century opens on September 15, with "Aïda," which will be sung every day during that week in English, and on the Monday of the following week in Italian. All the other operas will have their first performance on Tuesday night; they will be sung in English daily, including Saturday, and in their original language on the following Monday.

Novelties by Debussy and Charpentier are included in the list of the works to be performed next season in New York by the MacDowell chorus of the Schola Cantorum. Kurt Schindler, who has made these concerts so interesting for the last three years, has also chosen for performance next winter choral works by Borodine and Moussorgsky, anthems by Verdi, excerpts from operas by Gluck, Purcell, and Rousseau, new compositions by Percy Grainger, and folk-songs of different nations. Among the soloists will be Julia Culp and Emilio de Gogorza.

The Edward MacDowell Memorial Association announces a music festival at Peterborough, N. H., on August 21-24. It will be under the direction of Eusebius Godfrey Hood, of Nashua, who will conduct the Boston Festival Orchestra and the Peterborough MacDowell chorus. A feature of the festival will be a programme of American music conducted by the composers. This programme includes a cantata, "The Poet and the Dryad," by Cyril Graham; two movements from the "Aladdin" suite by Edgar Stillman Kelley, some songs by Cadman, a "Poem" for baritone and orchestra, by Mabel W. Daniels, and the Negro Rhapsody of Henry F. Gilbert.

Alfred Bruneau, whose "L'Attaque du Moulin" was produced at the Century Theatre a few years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company, is the composer of one of the operatic novelties to be produced in Paris next season. Its title is "Les Trois Journées." The principal tenor rôle in it will be created by Rousselière, who will also appear in another novelty, "Céleste," by Emile Trépard.

The reception accorded his new opera, "Julien," in Paris appears to have spurred Charpentier to fresh industry. He is said to have nearly completed his "Orpheus," which is to be produced next season at the Opéra-Comique.

Since Frederick the Great, no Prussian ruler has shown such an interest in music as the present Kaiser. Arthur M. Abell sums up some of his achievements in the Music Courier. One of his most important was his setting a number of experts to work to gather the best German folk-songs since the days of the Minnesingers. The result was a volume of six hundred of these songs, harmonized so that they could be sung by the male choruses which abound in Germany. Another of his achievements was the reform in singing as taught to the children in common schools. For the opera in Berlin, Cassel, and Wiesbaden the Emperor has spent many millions of marks; no other man in the world gives as much as he does for the support of music. It is owing to the Kaiser's support, also, that it has been possible to publish the fifty volumes of "Denkmäler Deutscher Tonkunst," from the years 1400 to 1750, most of the expense being paid out of the monarch's purse.

Americans abroad will have an opportunity this summer of hearing "Parsifal" in Switzerland. Six performances of it will be given at Zurich; the first on August 31, the last on September 11. At Bayreuth there are no performances this year, nor will "Parsifal" be heard in Munich.

A German musical paper has been printing a series of articles on the many different editions of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord." When Bach was living, the only way he could get even one edition of some of his greatest works was to print them with his own hands. It cannot be said that even now Bach receives the attention due him as the greatest musical thinker the world has ever known. His works, so far as they were preserved, are now all printed in the great Breitkopf & Härtel edition; but most of them are very seldom heard anywhere. Ruskin once said that posterity would not read his books because he had written too many. Bach also composed too much, but his collected works are mines with many veins of pure gold. From London comes the announcement that some of the lesser-known works of Bach will be performed, at popular prices, under Dr. R. R. Terry with the coöperation of the Society of Women Musicians. Familiar works will be avoided. It is proposed to give cantatas, chamber-music, concertos, and other orchestral works, preference being given to those least known in England.

French operas make up the bulk of the offerings of the Brussels Opera House for next season. The list includes Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," "Fauré's "Pénélope," Charpentier's "Julien," D'Indy's "Istar" and "L'Etranger," Saint-Saëns's "Timbre d'Argent," and an opera named "Cachaprès," by Casadessus.

WATTS AND HIS ART.—I.

Towards the art of Watts it is difficult for me to maintain anything like critical detachment. My mind goes back too vividly to that winter of the New York exhibition of 1884, when, as a lad, I first caught the truth that great painting may arouse and calm one as great poetry does or noble music. After nearly thirty years I still recall the fragile form of Life heartened to the next hesitant step upward by the strong hand of Love, and Love himself with wings broken against a door into which Death must pass. I retain, too, a general sense of grave, shrewd, and magnanimous faces set between the larger canvases. The Matthew Arnold is still clear to me, and the massive head of that great Christian warrior, Lawrence of India. Eight years later it was my privilege to confirm these admirations by a visit to the studio in Melbury Road. Even since, the question of Watts's symbolism, its legitimacy and its limits, has been occasionally present to me. It is, naturally, the central critical issue, and the answers are confusingly various. Among English artists and men of letters it is common enough to hear Watts spoken of as an admirable landscapist and portrait painter, unhappily warped by a fad for allegory. Others laud the elevation and copiousness of his invention while regretting the inadequacy of his technique. Some count him the greatest technician of the century, while more or less averse from his transcendental themes.

Such wide differences of intelligent opinion show how exceptional was the man's genius. He recked little of our artistic standards; he escapes our categories; he seems irreducibly the individualist. Yet an individualist with a baffling difference, for there never was a soul more socially minded than Watts. Nations were his beneficiaries—France, Canada, Australia, the United States, above all his own England, which now by gift or bequest possesses the bulk of his work. To do public decoration for the actual cost was almost habitual with him. He put away wealth in the desire to serve his times and posterity. His very looks and habits suggested oddly a reincarnation of the older artists he adored. His resemblance to the aged Titian was striking, and he followed Titian's way of painting slowly upon many canvases, gradually perfecting them through years. The forms of the mountain chains, made up of prone titans, in the design for Chaos, he took from the stains on a crumbling plaster wall. It was one of Leonardo da Vinci's devices for stimulating invention. Watts's habit of painting from small modelled figures had earlier been Tintoretto's. Thus in all respects he seems an anachronism in London of the nineteenth century, and his own requirement that a painter must be of his times seems ironic. Yet in the child-like seriousness and persistency of the man was no taint of irony. He was, I believe, not merely one of the greatest artists of his time, but in all essentials one of the most representative. If he differs from most successful painters of his day, it is precisely because they represent next to nothing—individual caprice, trick of trade, flutter of the market—whereas he represents almost alone among painters the deeper currents of life and thought that mark the Victorian age. In gratitude for the first great impression of art I ever received, let me now endeavor to analyze his genius.

I.

My task is the easier that Watts's purpose was single and fully expressed not merely in his pictures, but also in his letters, recorded talk, and published writings. The difficulty, indeed, is the excess of material. Shortly after his death a neighbor, Mrs. Barrington, published a bulky and formless Life. Now, Mrs. Watts exceeds the standard measure of two volumes by adding an entire volume of her late husband's literary works.* The tone of her biography is excellent; she preserves many sayings that one would be sorry to miss; she gives the general sense of that purposeful yet carefully sheltered life, of the coming and going of grave men and fair women, of an atmosphere of cheerful reverence and love. And yet the picture is sadly obscured by the details. Nor can Watts himself be said to be interesting through so many pages. Could the Prophet Isaiah himself bear expansion to three-volume scale? In the considerable task of sifting much ill-assorted material, I shall be helped by Robert de la Sizéranne, who has admirably analyzed the art, and by G. K. Chesterton, whose little biography leaves nothing to add on the topic of Watts as a representative Victorian.

What is remarkable about Watts is his absolutely dedicated life. Had he deliberately intended to make himself a great painter, he would have held no other course. Of poor parents and barely educated in his youth, he was grounded at least in his Bible, his Homer, and his Scott, and he soon undertook the hard task of teaching himself French, Italian, and Greek, and the easier task of teaching himself how to draw and paint. His earliest drawing, probably of his seventh year, is a Sisyphus—a universal type. Before he was sixteen he was taking commissions for chalk and pencil portraits, and was self-supporting. At eighteen, in 1835, he was admitted to the Antique School of the Academy. The keeper, William Hilton, admired his work and besought him to abstain from imaginative composition during his schooling—advice which young Watts calmly disregarded. In his twentieth year, 1837, he exhibited two portraits at the Academy, and one masterly composition, the Wounded Heron. The portrait of his father, done two years earlier, is more thinly painted, but has the wistful candor of a Gilbert Stuart. It suggests the gentle spirit of the humble musician baffled by the world, sympathetic guardian of a motherless boy of genius. For a few years young Watts, hampered by the prostrating headaches which pursued him through life, worked chiefly as a portrait painter, gradually emerging from the world of Dickens to that, by anticipation, of Mrs. Humphry Ward. And then came the success that made him a great artist. In a laudable but abortive effort to encourage mural painting, looking to the new Parliament House, the Government, in 1842, instituted a competition of cartoons on subjects in English history or literature. One hundred and forty designs were submitted, and young Watts, with Cope and Edward Armitage, received one of the three first awards of three hundred pounds sterling. Caractacus led in Triumph through the Streets of Rome was the subject, and from the existing fragments it is clear that Watts had already saturated himself with the grandeur of the Parthenon marbles and of Titian.

With his cartoon money he went to Italy. At Florence he became a casual guest of Lord Holland, Minister to the Tuscan Grandduchy. The beauty and gentleness of the young man appealed to those fine amateurs Lord and Lady Holland, and he remained their guest for the four Italian years. This meant a spacious life, now in the Palazzo Feroni, now at the Medici villa of Careggi, now at Naples; it meant, too, the very best society the world afforded. Watts became the friend of the brilliant Duff-Gordons; Ristori sat to him, and Verdi and Princess Mathilde Buonaparte. There was space and leisure for great canvases. Italian history and legend supplied the themes—Buondelmonti, Paolo and Francesca, Fata Morgana, Boccaccio's story-tellers. In the Casa Feroni and at Careggi he made his first attempts at fresco. Rome supplied the great sensation of the Sistine Chapel. With the Parthenon marbles it was henceforth ever present to him as the test of the elevation of his own work. Michelangelo's influence is plain in the historical painting, completed in 1846 for a new Government competition, and later bought by the nation, Alfred Inciting the Saxons to Resist the Danes by Sea; but in the main the leading influence in the early as in the later painting is that of the Venetians. The same year Watts begged the Greek merchant Constantine Ionides to commission him "to paint a picture to send to Greece. Some patriotic subject, something that shall carry a moral lesson." The publicist is making itself felt in the detached artist. In a letter he describes his Alfred as "dedicated to patriotism and posterity." In every way the idyllic guest-friendship with the Hollands was fruitful. Young Watts, like Delacroix, had definitely rooted his art in that of the High Renaissance. Moreover, it seemed as if he were to realize the precepts of Sir Joshua and the ambitions of the unhappy Haydon in founding an historical school of painting. For such work the monumental gravity of the Caractacus cartoon and the fire of the Alfred show that he had every qualification, and his increasing devotion to symbolism bears a little the look of thwarted development—a question that must later occupy us.

Meanwhile it is interesting to note how circumstance plays into the hands of a steadfast purpose. For three years after he left the Hollands in Florence, until 1850, Watts, in invalid fashion, fought it out alone in London. Then Mr. and Mrs. Thoby Prinsep took him in at Little Holland House, near his old patrons, and Signor, as they called him, was resident elder brother to that charming family for more than thirty years, inheriting, when the Prinseps moved out, their excellent housekeeper. And when Little Holland House was replaced by its namesake in Melbury Road, the master, in his old age, was cherished first by an adopted daughter, then by the young wife who is now his biographer. His homes at London and at the Surrey studio, Limnerslease, became places of pilgrimage for wise, good, and merry people. The very hack work of portraiture seldom brought to him a person he did not value, and led to him many of the fairest women and ablest men of his time. And this necessary toil was much lessened through the faith of a constant patron, Mr. Charles H. Rickards, of Manchester, whose collection became the nucleus of those exhibitions that in the eighties brought the master tardy fame. Thus he painted much on his own terms, as a postscript to Gladstone concerning a sitting will suggest. It reads: "Not a word to be spoken from the beginning to the end. In every way he was spared for his work. To have married in middle life so alien a genius as that of the brilliant girl, Ellen Terry, would have fatally disoriented many a transcendentalist; but the mismated stars were well out of the coil after a twelvemonth, and he planning a new venture in colossal statuary. In 1867, at fifty, he was made an Academician. Twice he declined a baronetcy at Gladstone's hands. And when he died, at the age of eighty-seven, in 1904, he was generally regarded as England's foremost artist. The colossal equestrian group, Physical Energy, which had been the chief concern of his later years, was cast by the state for London, and a replica set up as a memorial to Cecil Rhodes on the Matoppo Hills.

From his seclusion Watts maintained a singularly magnanimous public spirit. Besides the great series of portraits and poetical pieces which he reserved for the nation, he gave away scores of his best pictures to public galleries, offered to fresco Euston Station for the costs, volunteered as a rifleman, established a private memorial to the obscurely heroic, wrote on the Imperial destinies of England, instructed the villagers near Limnerslease in arts and crafts, gave his tithe to Ruskin's ill-fated St. George's Guild—in general, showed himself the most socially-minded of men, yet keeping these activities strictly in line with his career as an artist. Day by day throughout his life he rose at daybreak, grudging the necessary hours of sleep. Almost alone among modern painters he studied with utmost care color and vehicles with regard to their permanency. Every great composition was repeatedly amended and frequently put through several versions. So the long and stainless life was rounded out in gentle persistency, in kindliness, in high endeavor, and in a strange imperturbability.

Mr. John D. Crace, the author of "The Art of Colour Decoration" (Scribner), who is a leading English decorative artist, gives us in this book, as is indicated in the subtitle, an explanation of the purposes to be kept in view by the decorative painter and the means of attaining them. He treats in several short chapters of the distribution of values, the scheme of color, the explanation of surface and contour, the treatment by great masters, the decorative picture and imitations, closing with a short reference to modern work and certain hints on practice. Throughout the book we find valid reasoning, sound criticism, and valuable suggestions. The text is fully illustrated with photographic reproductions and with twenty plates, most of which are beautifully executed in color from sketches made by the artist-author in the course of his studies of the work of the great masters of decorative painting.

The author is a strong and convincing advocate of the emphasis of structural values and of the principle that the decoration of a building should always conduce to, and should never lessen, the beauty of the architectural form of which it must in the end become an essential part. In this he will appeal to architects, who all too often find the decorative painter ignorant of architecture and recklessly careless of its significant features, aiming only to place on the wall surfaces clever copies of their sketches, which may be meritorious as seen in their studios, but thorough failures as reproduced and enlarged in their final execution. It may perhaps be said that our author is almost too strongly impressed with the importance of this emphasis of structural value, forgetting that, important though it be, it is but one of many elements which go to give nobility to a work of decorative art. This appears in his somewhat hesitant appreciation of the great mosaic decorations left to us by the masters of the Middle Ages. Such points of weakness are, however, rare, and the book is to be commended to all decorative artists and to all architects whose practice entails the coöperation of the decorative painter.

From Vromant & Cie., of Brussels, we have received two examples of their new series "Reproduction des Manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Royale de Belgique." More exactly, these are excellent collotype facsimiles of famous miniatures, very conveniently arranged on separate sheets, in neat board portfolios with ties. Editorial prefaces are supplied by Father Van den Gheyn, honorary librarian of the Royal Library. The format is small quarto. The two issues before us are "L'Ystoire de Helayne," a romance copied and pictured in 1448 for Philip the Good. It contains twenty-six miniatures, and costs ten francs. The second manuscript, Jean Mielot's amplification of Christine de Pisan's "Epitre d'Othéa Déesse de la Prudence, a Hector, Chief des Troyens," is of slightly later workmanship and also destined for the Good Duke. The illustrations cover virtually the entire field of classic mythology and hero legend as known to the fourteenth century. The pictures are rude but spirited, and of incomparable naïveté. There are no less than a hundred plates, and the price of the portfolio is only twenty francs. These excellent and inexpensive facsimiles of entire pictorial series may be strongly recommended to students and bibliophiles.

THE RISE IN STOCKS, AND ITS MEANING.

As usual, a great variety of specific causes may be enumerated to explain the upward sweep of prices on the Stock Exchange, which began fully a month ago, which did not come to a halt until last week Wednesday, and which, during the interval, carried up prices 10 to 16 per cent., from the low level of last June, in many of the active shares. On such occasions any observer is at liberty to select his own special explanation. It may have been the final solution of the Southern Pacific imbroglio; the signing, by the quarrelsome Balkan States, of the peace of Bucharest; the offer of $50,000,000 Government deposits to interior banks, by the Treasury Department; the building up of the London and Paris bank reserves, through receipt of $20,000,000 gold from South America.

In a more general way (for explanations are provided to suit all tastes), it may be merely the progressive release, under growing financial confidence, of the "mid-year interest money." It may simply mean that people who looked for "a panic in the autumn, worse than the other one," have become convinced that there will be no panic. Coming down to Wall Street's exclusively anthropomorphic point of view, the rise in prices may have embodied the retreat of the "bear crowd" from an "oversold market," or the skilful efforts of the Union Pacific managers to "make a market" for their $88,000,000 Southern Pacific offering. Any one of these theories is plausible, or all of them together. No tradition is better established, on the Stock Exchange, than the tradition that, when a market has been moving aggressively in either direction, there seems no end to the specific reasons for that movement.

It sometimes simplifies matters, however, to accept the stock market in its historic rôle of index to a coming fundamental change, for better or worse, in the general situation. That such a change has been at least in sight—certainly as long as the recent aggressive rise in stocks has lasted—every observant person should be aware.

What the condition of things would have been in our own and other money markets if "the Balkans" were still cutting one another's throats, and the Treasury still sitting on its surplus, and the Southern Pacific shares in the hands of a court receiver to dispose of, may be interesting matters of conjecture. The probability is that, even so, financial communities would have discovered in the autumn that they had over-prepared for the coming stringency.

Berlin found it so, at the "mid-year settlements" of July, when none of these cheerful special influences was yet in operation. In reality, the two main facts of the year, with a bearing on the financial future, have been the preservation of absolute harmony among the European neutral Powers, and the embargo placed by the world's great bankers on the prodigiously reckless underwriting of any and all new security issues. Granting those two achievements, a turn from the gloom and doubt of the past six months was entirely assured.

How far and how continuously the recovery will proceed, in the money market, on the stock market, or in general trade, is naturally a different question.

The pause and reaction on the Stock Exchange, after the rise in prices had culminated, last week, on the news of the Union Pacific's successful underwriting of its stock sale, reflected a feeling of reserve in which all Wall Street shared. For one thing, it was to be remembered that, even under ordinary circumstances, the last half of August is not a usual period for aggressively rising markets.

The normal autumn requirements of the money market are immediately ahead. The very trade revival, which the recent Stock Exchange movement is assumed to have foreshadowed, must be provided for, and the recourse of other years—the drawing on London's capital for Wall Street's purposes—would this year, for obvious reasons, be a doubtful reliance. Lombard Street will finance our "crop movement," as usual; but it would be singular if the London market were to countenance extensive loans to New York on American Stock Exchange collateral.

We shall also have to straighten out the as yet unsettled problem, just what effect the damage to the corn crop is to have on the general business outlook. That phase of the situation is peculiar, in that certain large sections of the country have to face a ruined harvest, whereas the rest of the corn belt promises to come through the season fairly well. The prevalent estimate of yield, since rain fell last week in other sections than the unlucky Southwest, has been for a crop of 2,500,000,000 bushels. That would be 625,000,000 bushels under last year's harvest, and nearly as much below this year's early June forecasts. But it would not materially differ from the corn harvests of such recent years as 1911, 1909, 1907, and 1904, when the crop was regarded as a serious disappointment, but not as a disaster.

Furthermore, this year will apparently produce, as none of those four years did, a quite unprecedented wheat yield. In 1904, in fact, the trade recovery got under way in the later autumn, in the face not only of a corn crop smaller than last week's estimates for the present season, but of the smallest wheat crop in nearly half-a-dozen years. This is but one aspect of the general problem of next autumn. Against the possibilities of renewed political unsettlement at home, and of slowness in the European recovery, there may also properly be set the facts that the country's money markets are already relaxing their tension, and that stocks of goods in merchants' hands are exceptionally small. When the tariff schedules are finally determined, and the money situation clears, those supplies must inevitably be replenished.

The Old-Fashioned Woman

Primitive Fancies About the Sex

By ELSIE CLEWS PARSONS

12mo. $1.50 net. By mail, $1.65

The author presents an arresting survey of the quaint notions entertained by primitive as well as more advanced peoples regarding sex customs, privileges, limitations, inhibitions, and differentiations with the view of showing to what a large extent these notions still affect, through their modified survival, our own attitude toward women and their place in social, industrial, and political relations.

Hall Caine's

First Novel in Four Years and His Greatest

The Woman Thou Gavest Me

Being the Story of Mary O'Neill

Hall Caine has possibly the largest audience of any living English author. He writes for the whole of humanity, and in the startling revelations of Mary O'Neill has conceived a wonderful romance that will strike to the core of every heart. It is the story, told in autobiographical form, of a beautiful, pure, and exquisite woman who goes through some of the most terrible tests which the responsibilities of marriage bring into life. An eminent English divine said, "This thrilling story of what a woman's life may be in the world to-day will stir the conscience of the whole country to the depths." Hall Caine has presented here the most thought-arousing analysis of marriage and divorce in relation to church, state, and society that has ever been written. No thinking man and woman can afford to miss it, but above everything else it is a wonderful human romance that will appeal to people in every walk of life.

Men Around the Kaiser

By Frederick William Wile

With numerous portraits.

Small 8vo. Cloth. $1.75 net

"Such a book as this is of real value to all who are interested in German affairs, and derives a certain authority from the position held by Mr. Wile at Berlin. For the last seven years he has been the German correspondent of the 'New York Times' (also the 'Chicago Tribune' and the 'Philadelphia Ledger'), and his collection of character studies gives an admirable idea of the variety of the life of the great Empire, the source of its strength, and the different ideals which inspire it."—New York Times.

"There have been many books about Mexico and her revolution, but none that is quite so ample, vivid, and inclusive as this one. The author, Mr. Henry Baerlein, was special correspondent of the London 'Times,' and already a writer of distinction. He seems to have been not only well versed in the history and affairs of Mexico, but to have that enviable capacity so useful to the special correspondent of entering into intimate relationships with the greater and the lesser actors of the drama unfolded before our eyes."—San Francisco Argonaut.

The Week

If the late William James were alive, he could find in the utterances of certain Republican newspapers the best possible example of the will to believe. The Ohio State Journal, for instance, sees the now shattered party resuming its former sway "under brighter and happier auspices than for many years past." By the disappearance of the Progressives? Not at all. Of course, this thorn in the Republican flesh "will never make a party. It is simply a protest against the old leadership which will disappear when the Republican party comes back, rejuvenated, refreshed, and born again." The great event now in process is the destruction of the Democratic party. President Wilson is the only force that keeps it together. That is, it may have survived the Civil War and the free-silver blunder, but it cannot be expected to live through so distressing an occurrence as its enemy's almost mortal illness. But logic is logic. The President's party "is maintaining the boss system, while the Republican party is making a strong fight against it," and in a few brief moons the Opposition will be centred in the Republican party, "with Aldrich, Cannon, Penrose, Gallinger, et al., promoted to the rank of voters." This would leave us with only one party, which ought to get all the offices back; but who would be so cruel as to prick so rosy a bubble?

The blighting effect of the merit system, dimly foreseen by the politicians, is now plainly apparent. It has become necessary to coax men to apply for positions. The Civil Service Commission frankly confesses its inability to get the right sort of appointees for certain places. One of these is described as a "real prize," being the post of professor of pharmacology in the Public Health Service. It pays $4,500 a year. Yet no one asks for it—no one, that is, whom the Commission is willing to accept. Would such a condition have been conceivable a decade or two ago? Why, there was not a Congressman in those halcyon days who would not have been overcome with humiliation if he had been unable to put his finger upon a dozen able and willing professors of pharmacology in every township in his district. No village would have been too poor to furnish a few applicants for any forty-five-hundred-dollar job that the Government could list. But all this talent has vanished at the wave of the Commission's wand. "Broad training," this body demands, and "extensive practical experience in various branches of pharmacology, physiology, physiological and pharmaceutical chemistry, and chemotherapy." Is it any wonder that the job is driven to seek the man?

In the San Francisco Journal of Commerce, Robert Dollar, himself an owner of merchant steamers, has thrown considerable light on the failure of even a single shipowner to register under the American flag foreign ships owned exclusively by Americans engaged in the foreign trade of the United States. It had confidently been expected that this provision of the recent Panama Canal Act would bring a number of fine steamships under the American flag. Mr. Dollar contrasts the cost of maintaining a British and American steamer:

> British Stmr. M. S. Dollar: Cost to operate per day, $100.81; deadweight capacity, 6600; lumber carrying capacity, 3,200,000 feet.
> American Stmr. Grace Dollar: Cost to operate per day, $123.15; deadweight capacity, 2300; lumber carrying capacity, 1,100,000 feet.

Some of the disadvantages of the American steamer are as follows: The American measurement of cargo steamers is 30 per cent. larger than foreign measurement, and this governs the sums to be paid out for tonnage tax, dry-docking, pilotage, etc. Foreign steamers do not usually carry quartermasters, while the American must carry four. In the engine-room the American steamer carries an extra engineer "and three water tenders, men who do nothing but draw the pay they do not earn. No foreign cargo ships carry them. . . . Then, by the new law just enforced, one extra mate is added; and still another wrinkle, if your crew exceeds fifty you must put up a wireless plant on the vessel and carry two wireless operators."

According to Mr. Dollar, the cost of these extra hands on an American steamer amounts in one year to $8,220, or 4 per cent. on an investment of $200,000—a heavy handicap at the very outset for the American owner. Mr. Dollar also complains of the severe test to which American boilers are annually subjected when the Government inspector applies a hydrostatic pressure of one and a half times the working pressure. This, he thinks, has much to do with our frequent boiler explosions. American inspectors are, moreover, less considerate than foreigners in taking up a ship's time and interfering with her loading and unloading. One of our new regulations requires that at the expiration of the year for which the ship has been passed by the Government, she must be reinspected at the first American port at which she calls, instead of being permitted to return to her home port and thus save money for her owners and the Government. Finally, it is gratifying to note that Mr. Dollar asks only that in the foreign trade American owners be allowed to operate under the same conditions as their competitors. He would have Congress stop passing bills whose sole purpose seems to him to be "to restrict and restrain the operation of American-owned vessels."

The pamphlet Mr. Sulzer is sending out in order to convince people that the real animus of his impeachment is resentment against him for uncovering Tammany frauds through his special investigator, John A. Hennessy, is indubitably impressive as to the Tammany rascality, particularly as it is able to cite as proof the indictment of Bart Dunn, a Tammany Hall member of the State Committee, and of William H. Whegand, one of the Democratic bosses of Rockland County. Mr. Hennessy charges that a contractors' ring has since 1908 crowded out honest builders of roads and specifically affirms that the State's inspectors and engineers were, to the extent of two-thirds of their number, "O. K.'d by Thomas F. Smith for Tammany, by John F. McCooey, by Fitzpatrick, of Buffalo, and by Kelley, of Syracuse. Some of them were barbers, some of them were liquor-dealers. Some of them had no known vocation. The remainder were appointed by members of the State Committee in their respective districts. . . . Some of these fellows rarely saw the roads, but cheerfully signed estimates every month upon which bills were paid." That is precisely the Tammany method of doing things; it is the Hall's idea of doing the people's business. But as proof that Sulzer should not have been impeached, it is ridiculous.

A notable reform in the Appellate practice in New York has at last been accomplished. The Court of Appeals, in Barnett against Malloy, has approved the bills passed last year at the instance of the Bar Association's Law Reform Committee. This brings New York abreast of what has been the English practice since 1875, and abolishes an abuse that crept into the law in 1830. In 1912 the Code of Civil Procedure was amended so as to give the Appellate Division power, in reviewing a judgment, to render a judgment of affirmance or reversal and final judgment on the rights of the parties, or to modify the judgment below, instead of requiring the granting of a new trial. And this has been sustained by the Court of Appeals in the case above mentioned. It applies only to equity cases and cases where the court below could have directed a verdict. The Constitution of New York guarantees a right to a jury trial in other cases, and this prevents the reform from being extended to them. The Law Reform Committee of the Bar Association deserves credit for its work in bringing about reforms in our procedure. Since 1909 substantially fifty recommendations made by this Committee for the simplification of our procedure and the expedition of trials have been enacted into law.

It is so seldom possible to say a hearty good word for the work of a State Legislature that the record of Georgia's deserves notice. It assembled June 25 and adjourned August 14, being limited by law to fifty days. Although it began in the usual way of Legislatures, uncertainly and with little promise of effectiveness, it closed with a week of solid accomplishment. It found the State treasury, in Gov. Slaton's words, sick and steadily on the decline. This condition it met by a tax-equalization bill, supplemented by an inheritance tax and other tax provisions. Among laws dealing with social betterment, none is of greater interest than the "Mothers' Rights" bill, which does away with a gross discrimination by placing a mother upon an equality with the father in cases involving the custody of minor children. In the background of all this work stands the Governor, concerning whom the Macon Telegraph remarks:

> Those who feared that Gov. Slaton would fail to measure up in the respect of getting things done are now convinced that the present Executive, who, by temperament, is opposed to the spectacular, and is somewhat non-combative, does "do things," and does them with the least possible friction.

There are probably several thousand schools in the United States that boast somewhere the motto on the Horace Mann building in this city—mens sana in corpore sano; and there are certainly 20,000,000 school children to whom it should apply. Every newspaper brings home the importance of school hygiene. England is digesting the estimate that 200,000 of her school children are tubercular—that being, after all, but 2 per cent. of the whole; that 80 per cent. have bad teeth, and nearly half as many defective throats or noses; and that an appalling number are in some definite way deformed, or have faulty eyesight or hearing. In America there is a large proportion suffering even from the American disease of neurasthenia. But neglect or ignorance of the machinery that alone can effect an improvement—including not merely good buildings and good educational programmes, but socially efficient teachers, medical inspection, doctors, nurses, and public-spirited school authorities—is more or less deep-rooted. Its persistence, as well as the recent great inroads upon it, is emphasized by the International Congress on School Hygiene, at Buffalo. In English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian, teachers, investigators, physicians, and sanitarians will read papers to the bewildering number of 300.

Given: what exhibit a boy would choose to visit first at a great exposition, and the name of a book that "sounds good" to him. Required: the occupation or profession he should enter. This is the problem that puzzled the Boston Vocation Bureau just two days. The exhibit which appealed to the boy—he was eighteen—was housed in Machinery Hall, St. Louis. The book was familiar to him only by title, "A Trip to the Moon." Out of these confessions the Bureau drew two inferences: a love of machinery and a roving disposition. Its problem then became: what occupation combines these two elements? Aeroplaning is still new and perilous. Automobile and motorcycle racing is hardly to be recommended as a steady pursuit. The Bureau asked the boy how he should like to be a locomotive engineer. He should like it immensely. And so, after a period of probation as fireman, he is now said to be one of the most expert and trustworthy engineers on one of our great railway systems. Clearly, not all of the brains in Boston goes into business; the Vocation Bureau has its share.

Those who object to the lavish pageantry that is coming to mark historical anniversaries in this country, as abroad, may find gratification in last Saturday's simple observance of the 150th anniversary of St. Albans, Vt. A place founded in 1763 between Lake Champlain and the Green Mountains might be expected to mark the occasion with reminders of Sir William Johnson, or Ethan Allen, or the heroic days of Lundy's Lane. It might even have gone back to the founder of its English counterpart, whose martyrdom occurred in 303. But in the grand parade there was not even the counterfeit presentment of a red aborigine. Instead, enthusiasm waxed warm over a line of three medley bands, fifty commercial floats, forty automobiles, "a few cows, lambs, poultry, and a bear." History appeared only on a "float of plants one hundred years old," sandwiched between one of a harness-maker and another of a clothier. Even the City Hall's exhibit of "antiques" consisted largely of articles lately brought from India. The basis and aims of the celebration should be noted by Western towns increasingly jealous of their few scraps of history. According to the St. Albans Messenger, it showed that the place was not dead to "the spirit of united effort and enterprise that marks the boom towns of the West," and that material industries "still enlisted red blood among the St. Albanians."

The best that can be said about Francis Burton Harrison's appointment as Governor-General of the Philippines is that he is a consistent anti-Imperialist and thoroughly in sympathy with the Democratic policy of independence at an early date. He has never, so far as we are aware, held any executive position in which his administrative capacity might be tested. He faces one of the most remarkable opportunities to serve the United States which have come to any one in recent years. The very magnitude of the problem of evacuation seemed, however, to call for a man of first-class ability, whose name and experience would certify his competency to the country as a whole. This we cannot feel to be the case with Mr. Harrison. He is young, ambitious, possessed of great wealth and of considerable talent, and he will, doubtless, devote himself to the task whole-heartedly. But it remains surprising that Mr. Wilson should have chosen for this place one of the rich young men who have so long lent respectability to Tammany Hall.

To Mr. Harrison the report of Dean C. Worcester on slavery in the Philippines will be a warning of difficulties. Its most serious part, as in the reports of 1910 and 1912, constitutes not so much an indictment of a government as of a social condition. The statement that peonage, which Mr. Worcester clearly distinguishes from slavery, "prevails in every municipality in the islands," is qualified only by the admission of a difficulty of defining the word. As for slavery itself, it is hard to stamp out, because laws dealing with it will interfere with the lesser, more general evil. Those who profit by the operation of the old debtor system are naturally reluctant to end it. The tenor of the report shows that, had Mr. Worcester wished, he might have emphasized improvement in conditions, rather than their still grave aspect. As the islanders have gained in self-government, so the primitive agriculture that fostered the old labor abuses has slowly improved.

No one will, we presume, waste much, if any, sympathy upon Maury I. Diggs, who has just been convicted of the charge of being a "white slaver," in the sensational trial at San Francisco. There will be great rejoicing that the whole country has thus received a valuable object-lesson as to the effectiveness of the Federal white-slave statute. This should have a widely deterrent effect. Yet when all is said and done, it is a curious fact that by crossing the State line Diggs committed a crime, when the same actions within the State of California would not have rendered him liable in any way save on the charge of adultery. This fact and the apparent absence of conclusive proof that the object in taking the girls to Reno was to use them for white-slave "traffic" makes the verdict somewhat surprising. To Mr. Wilson's skill in straightening out the imbroglio in the Attorney-General's office is now added the verdict which decent Californians hoped for. This leaves Congressman Kahn and his kind, who sought to make it appear that the Federal Government was actually concerned in shielding a moral degenerate, looking particularly silly.

Canada, with Thaw, begins a decade of great prosperity. We say a decade, because Canadian legal procedure thus far has shown itself so startlingly like our own that we are safe in supposing it will be ten years before the question of Mr. Thaw's deportation is decided. Already the legal profession and the allied profession of criminal psychiatry are booming. In Canadian private-detective circles an exceptional harvest is confidently predicted. The suggestion that Mr. Thaw become a Canadian landholder in order to frustrate deportation has mobilized an army of real-estate agents who have been idle since the slackening of the boom in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Because of Mr. Thaw's announced intention to enter upon a campaign of publicity, the leading Canadian newspapers have placed orders for additional sextuple presses. One can only touch upon the fertilizing influence of the Thaw money in the minor industries—the moving-picture industry, the jail-delivery industry, the automobile industry, the florist industry, which would never be what it is if assassins and degenerates were not to have their cells brightened with a daily bunch of sweet peas. How Mr. Lloyd George must be wishing himself to be Canadian Chancellor of the Exchequer with power to clap a super-tax on all incomes derived from Thaw!

Sir Wilfrid Laurier's recent speech at St. Hyacinthe has not set the Canadian political pot to boiling furiously. Our cousins across the border are not going to cross bridges before they come to them. The long obstruction of the naval plans was covertly welcome to many. And in the face of the Japanese war-scare, and the example of Australia, the independent Toronto Sun still finds in a newspaper poll many communities not enthusiastic for "putting the profit on a $35,000,000 contract into British shipowners' pockets, or building a home navy for which they see no excuse." There is none of the scenting of a fray from afar, as over the reciprocity issue. And that last question, Sir Wilfrid himself pointed out, relates now to the future only. The eyes of the Canadians are fixed on our Senate. As the Liberal leader put it: "At the last Canadian election, many said, 'The Americans need both our markets and our products. The new Democratic tariff will let our products in, whatever our course.' That prediction has not yet come true. If it does, well and good; if not, the Liberals will open the fight again for broader markets and reciprocity." It is evident, even in Canada, that the new tariff will pass, and that its effect there must be tested by time.

Even though Hungarian affairs of honor are quite as consistently harmless as French, Count Tisza's third duel for the year suggests that there is still force in Mark Twain's recommendation that Austria-Hungary should provide herself with a Minister of Etiquette. At the same time, the exploits of the son of Andrassy's old political comrade testify to a certain parliamentary and social advance in the dual monarchy. When the American humorist visited Vienna in 1897, it was the matter-of-course tone in the epithets interchanged by Majority and Opposition members that seemed remarkable. If they had been schoolboys or sailors, their language would have been more in keeping, but the nonchalance with which they accepted insults and slander was absolutely incomprehensible. As gentlemen, they showed a callousness unknown to the pugnacious proletariat—so Mark Twain thought. If there were any danger in such duels of losing a statesmanlike figure—as a certain Western republic once did—public sentiment might end them.

THE BANKERS' CONFERENCE AND THE BANKING BILL.

The action of the Bankers' Conference at Chicago, in adopting, towards the pending banking legislation, an attitude of friendly coöperation and criticism rather than one of sweeping and hostile opposition, we esteem a happy augury. We so regard it, from a point of view which recognizes the force of many of the objections raised in the report of the conference against certain proposals of the measure as it stands. At the outset, a possibility seemed to exist that the bankers' gathering might adopt the uncompromisingly hostile policy expressed in the comment of one delegate that the bill is "unworkable, impractical, and fundamentally bad, and cannot be remedied by amendment."

Adoption of a resolution along such lines might or might not have been economically warranted; that, as was shown by the discussion in the conference itself, is a matter on which opinions differ widely. But that it would have been a grave political blunder, and that it would have gone far towards depriving the bankers' recommendations of any practical efficacy, no one can doubt who has observed the actual situation at Washington. The assembled bankers recognized this plainly. The remark of Mr. Wade, that "if we cannot agree among ourselves in regard to the kind of currency law that is needed, what can we expect of Congress?" was evidence of the wiser spirit which in the end prevailed.

Neither the Administration nor the Congressional committees could reasonably refuse at least to give consideration to criticisms temperately presented by experienced bankers, and accompanied by valid reasons against any existing provision. To ignore such counsel, merely because it came from bankers, would be as sensible as to ignore the criticisms of trained engineers on a tentative plan for an isthmian canal. The engineers' objections might be well or ill founded, but if their authors were responsible men, they could not be overlooked. The banks and their officers have much individually at stake in the result of the currency legislation; the business community of the United States has a good deal more. But it is also not at all impossible that the political prestige and success of the Wilson Administration and the present majority in Congress might have to stand or fall by the practical success or failure of their experiment in banking reform.

The changes recommended in the pending bill are numerous. Some of them affect the general framework of the plan as it now stands; some affect its technical provisions. Of the first class, the objection that twelve regional banks would be too many is the most important. The conference gives its general judgment in favor of a single central bank; but proposes as an alternative that not more than five shall be created. This second suggestion has behind it the high practical judgment of Mr. Paul Warburg, who has stated his opinion that too great a number of such banks would result, first, in weakening the efficiency of all of them outside the district containing the country's largest money centre; secondly, and as a consequence, in forcing such regional institutions into dependence on New York; thirdly, in creating great pressure on the national board, to favor, in its general policies, one section at the unjustifiable expense of another.

The remedy, Mr. Warburg thinks, is the establishment of banking groups "so large that the divergent influences of the various component parts would in themselves eliminate any provincial color." He places the minimum of such regional banks at six. Without passing judgment on all aspects of the matter, we believe that this criticism demands the broadest and most careful consideration.

The bankers further propose that the national board of seven, instead of consisting, as the present bill provides, of two Cabinet officers, the Controller of the Currency, and four Presidential appointees (one at least an experienced banker), shall be made up of three Presidential appointees, three directors chosen by the member banks, with the Secretary of the Treasury as the seventh. This proposal must be judged in the light of the actual situation; we doubt its political practicability. We have said from the first, in considering the Administration plan, that the real crux of controversy in this national supervisory board (which the system of regional banks makes essential) is the nature and limitation of its powers, rather than its manner of selection.

What the bankers' conference had to say regarding the note issue system touched an important point. Their report recommends that the notes should be made the obligation, not of the Government, but of the regional central banks through which the member banks obtain them. It further advises that such notes should be redeemed in gold; not, as the pending bill provides, in "gold or lawful money," and it proposes that a progressive tax shall be imposed on notes when the gold reserve held against them shall have fallen below a stated minimum.

Each of these proposed amendments is absolutely sound in principle; each deals with a provision in the pending bill which is a very grave defect. The pending measure refers to these note issues—secured by bank collateral, and protected by a reserve in the vaults of the regional central banks—as "obligations of the United States" and "advances" to banks by the Government; describes the tax imposed on them as the "rate of interest" paid by banks to Government, and makes that rate discretionary with the national board.

These clauses we have from the first referred to as vicious—not because they really create a Government paper money, for they do nothing of the kind; but because the use of such language and inference distinctly encourages false economic notions in the people's mind. Mr. Bryan's enthusiasm, in his letter of Friday last to Chairman Glass, over what he describes as the "Government issue of the notes," will only emphasize this fact. Whether political exigencies will or will not necessitate the retaining in the bill of these empty forms with unsound suggestions, it is impossible now to say.

FIXED THINGS IN A MIXED SITUATION.

We scarcely needed Hearst telegraphing his orders to New York virtually to repudiate the Fusion ticket, in order to make the municipal campaign in this city appear extraordinarily confused. If the mere preliminaries bring so much uncertainty and acrimony, what shall we have when the lines are finally drawn and the battle is joined? If they do these things in the green tree, what will they do in the dry? Already we have three, and possibly four, candidates for the Mayoralty, not counting the Socialists and the Prohibitionists. And the hand of each of them is against every other. It is not steam they are accumulating while they wait, but vitriol. When Mayor Gaynor gets fairly going, a vial of bitterness will be broken over somebody's head every day. What will be the effect of his candidacy, or of Hearst's irruption, or of Tammany's proposal to endorse Whitman, politicians are eagerly debating. But, despite their oracular airs, they evidently have no more wit than an ordinary Christian in forecasting the outcome. We have had three-corner fights for the Mayoralty, but here is one not only of many corners, but of nooks and lurking-places whence men will sally to do we know not what. The situation is terribly mixed.

Its underlying principles, however, are not in a state of flux. The city knows that some things are fixed. These can really be seen all the more clearly on account of the existing confusion in outward appearances. And any man at this time in want of a moral and political guide, cannot do better than to turn away, for the moment, from the things that fluctuate to the things which stand firm; from what is guesswork to what the experience of New York has demonstrated to be securely known.

As a first item of this established knowledge may be written down the fact that no man can serve the two masters, Tammany and the city. If he attempts to do so, he is certain to be charged with betraying one or the other. And Tammany demands undivided allegiance. Any official, no matter how high, who does not give it will be ruthlessly thrown overboard. The remorseless pitching into the water of Mayor Gaynor is the most signal proof of this that Tammany has ever given. He did not openly attack Murphy. He tried to get on with him—even to please him. It is evident that he would have been glad to take a renomination from Murphy. But he would not permit the Boss to set his foot on the neck of the Mayor. He would not throw all the offices to Tammany. And that was enough for Murphy. Nothing of the good work the Mayor has done was allowed to count; his distinct personality and original and picturesque way of expressing himself weighed not so much as a grain of dust. He had put the city before Tammany, and that meant a death sentence. All or nothing, is Tammany's motto; and it was never writ so large as upon the cool and contemptuous abandonment of Mayor Gaynor.

With this example glaring in the eyes of all voters, with what face can the Murphy nominee now step forward to talk about plans for the city's welfare? Mr. McCall is confessedly a man of ability. But has he anything like the independent vigor and initiative of Mayor Gaynor? The latter was taken by Tammany four years ago because Tammany was sick, and, for the nonce, a saint would be. He was outside the organization. But Judge McCall has long been in it. On his own showing, he now takes the nomination for Mayor, against his own inclination, and on Murphy's orders. But will he not also take them after the election? The whole argument for choosing him lay in the expectation that he would. In the Tammany speeches lauding him on Saturday, the one triumphant note was that, in Mr. McCall, Tammany would have "a true and tried Democrat." What was meant by that, everybody knows. It meant an end of the nonsense about non-partisan city government. It meant that Murphy hoped to have a man in the City Hall who would appoint to office as he was bid. Mayor Gaynor would not do that, and we see what happened to him. How can Mr. McCall hope to escape the plain inference that he has been selected to do what Gaynor refused to do—to be servile to Murphy and a distributer of out-of-doors relief to Tammany?

By whatever door the voters of New York go in, they always come out, in the city campaigns, at the same place, and find themselves face to face with an organization of political freebooters seeking to seize New York. And this organization is now commanded by a man whom it is a mystery why anybody obeys. For C. F. Murphy is without ability either to write or speak; Bourke Cockran has explained how he used to do the Boss's political writing for him; somebody else does it now. Murphy is, moreover, that anomaly, that libel on his race, as we might almost call it, a dull Irishman. He is not an originator of force; he is only the chance medium through which political forces work. What they are, and where they reside, can be only dimly guessed. But the universal belief is that somebody controls Murphy, finances his organization, and stealthily uses his mask of Tammany leadership for mercenary ends. And it is this power behind Murphy which makes nominations, and orders judges and Congressmen to accept them, and they do it. That is another of the fixed truths in the mixed situation. A secret political control, some fellow in the cellarage, is reaching out for the capture of New York. And the problem for its citizens is to-day merely what it has been before, how best to beat off the attack.

GOOD ROADS WHILE YOU WAIT.

It is an inspiring spectacle that the khaki-clad Governors of Missouri and Kansas have furnished to the nation. Poor old New York does not know who her Governor is. Massachusetts is uncertain whether her chief is a Republican or a Democrat. Washington and Mexico City are trying to come to an agreement regarding the Chief Executive of that unfortunate country. But no such troubles disturb the happy valley of the lower Missouri. There you have a man who is every inch a Governor. Whenever he sees that anything is needed, he issues a proclamation, puts on the pair of overalls which he brought with him when he came to the Executive Mansion, and the thing is done before nightfall. It all reads like the story of Warren Hastings and his realization of his boyish dream of some day buying back his ancestral Daylesford. Gov. Major, too, had his dreams. As a boy he travelled over nothing but bad roads. "I made up my mind then, he says, "if I ever got a chance, I would do all I could for better highways." The years came and went, with varying fortunes for the growing boy, but always he was attended by the vision splendid. Last November the Republicans were divided into two camps; the Democrats captured the State once more, and the man with the ambition to pull Missouri out of the mud became her chief.

And what a glorious pulling it has been! The figures read like a census bulletin and a treasury report combined. Thousands of men wielding picks and shovels, other thousands steering road-grading machines, still other hurrying from place to place with the moving-picture cameras, thousands of women killing, preparing, and frying tens of thousands of chickens, butchered to make a Gubernatorial holiday, hundreds of thousands of days' work done between sunrise Wednesday and sunset Thursday, millions of dollars' worth of improvement made in the same fruitful period—altogether, it is doubtful whether ever before in the world's history human energy accomplished quite so much in so brief a time. Nor was there mere pretence of doing what their energetic Governor had set them to do. By nine o'clock, we learn, a certain mile of road near the town of Independence, called Silver's Lane, had been put in condition, and the squad of eager volunteers assigned to it were clamoring for more roads to conquer.

In all this the traditional attitude of Missouri is reversed. Instead of waiting to be shown, she does the showing. For Gov. Major has a vision of every State pouring out its whole happy population two days in every year to do something for its roads. He sees "the entire republic working upon the highways of the nation during the same two days." Surely no such elevating picture has been drawn for mankind since it was proposed that everybody should shout at a given signal, and hear the hugest noise ever made. We think no objection could be offered to New York's emulation of Missouri. The sight of Govs. Sulzer and Glynn working side by side upon the roads that Tammany has builded wisely, but not too well, would go far to reconcile the citizens of a distressed commonwealth to their fate. But, however it may be with his proposal for a national road-working fiesta, Gov. Major is doubtless correct in his metaphor-defying contention that a good-roads spirit has been kindled which will bring rich fruitage throughout many years.

Jealous critics of the Missouri Executive will hint that this is the only real gain from the tremendous exertion of these two memorable days. To make or remake a road, they will say, and then go away and leave it to the tender mercies of traffic and the elements, is the most uneconomical method of doing it. Some States still allow their citizens to "work out" their road tax, but what kind of roads do they have? On the other hand, there is the want of enthusiasm with which Gov. Major's project was greeted in St. Louis County, owing to the fact that "the county is well supplied with rock roads, maintained by a heavy tax." "A heavy tax"—there's the rub. What is the good of having self-government if you have taxes along with it? It is so much better to suffer losses that are not so evident, such losses as the Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association found in a farming area of 750 square miles tributary to that city. Bad roads were estimated to have cost these farmers more than $600,000 in a single year, this sum being the aggregate of losses caused by slow travel, extra trips, inability to reach the best markets, and so on. Scientific road-making takes account of continual repairing. But away with such unwelcome considerations. This is the age of direct government. One day in the year we all turn out to celebrate our independence. One day we vote. One day our more advanced communities spend in pulling up the weeds that have been permitted to grow, and clearing off the rubbish that has been permitted to gather, during the preceding twelvemonth. And shall we not take two days to make passable the roads that our neglect has ruined in the other 363?

CHANGES IN THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

Is the legal profession passing? Mr. George W. Bristol, of the local Bar, is sure of it in an article which he has just reprinted from the Yale Law Journal. Needless to say, the state of affairs he interprets is not due to a new birth of humanity and the coming of an era of good will and charity among men. The litigious spirit has not been exorcised. What worries him is that the business of lawyers is slipping out of their grasp into the hands of corporations. That the practice of the law has become commercialized is no new plaint; but the drift, according to Mr. Bristol, has gone far beyond commercializing individual lawyers. "The great bulk of litigation," he declares, "while it may be actually done by a lawyer or a man who has been admitted to the Bar and is entitled to call himself a lawyer, is conducted by corporations which have neither soul nor conscience, and owe allegiance to no code of ethics or morals, and which have no other cause for existence than the accumulation of wealth for directors and stockholders."

Mr. Bristol is abounding in specifications. The real-estate lawyer, he finds, is a thing of the past. A man who buys a house goes to a title company, which does the work and insures the title, and, either itself or through a mortgage company, places a mortgage on the property. Mr. Bristol believes that approximately ten millions of dollars are paid annually to insurance and mortgage companies, of which but a small part goes to the clerks known as lawyers, who do the legal work for the corporations. No code of ethics governs their soliciting business, and one title company in New York has gone so far as to advertise that it will draw wills without cost if it is made executor of the estates. A lawyer who offered money in order to obtain business could be disbarred in this State, and would be guilty of a misdemeanor; no such penalty deters a company from seeking business in any way it can. This license may sometimes be useful when it comes, for instance, to obtaining business in connection with condemnation proceedings. One of these companies was reported in 1910 as having as an asset the sum of $736,316.97, "representing the estimated value of condemnation-proceeding contracts." Another item in this report reads: "Condemnation proceedings, drawing papers, examining titles, recording fees, and surveys . . . $183,902.45." And yet there is a statute in New York forbidding corporations to practice law.

The defence of negligence cases is still another branch of the lawyer's practice captured by corporations under the guise of liability insurance in a company which is pledged to defend litigation and to pay an adverse judgment up to a given amount. As the company cannot be an attorney of record, it usually appears in court through some member of the bar employed by it at an annual salary. This liability insurance contract, Mr. Bristol insists, "is a contract primarily to practice law, to defend litigation, and the insurance feature of it is simply an incident to the litigation." Mr. Bristol cites an adjuster of one of these companies as saying, when rebuked for unethical and unprofessional conduct in going to a client directly, against the wishes of the client's attorney: "To —— with ethics. We are not lawyers; we are a corporation practicing law for the money there is in it, and we are going to settle the cheapest way." Again, there is the organization of corporations; this, too, has now been taken over by companies with branch offices in those States which are blessed with easy incorporation laws. These corporations not only aid in organizing companies, but for a fee of $25 furnish a "resident director and the year's rent of an office of a size, grandeur, and furniture display to comply with the law." Needless to say, Mr. Bristol is very clear in his mind that litigation by these companies is absolutely illegal, and he cites opinions to prove it. It is obviously a matter which calls for the most serious thought, and one likely to be touched upon at the annual meeting of the American Bar Association next week.

It is, however, only fair to ask whether there are not some redeeming features about the tendencies and practices against which Mr. Bristol exclaims. Thus, it would be interesting to know if the layman has not actually profited by the rise of the company which deals with title insurance. The corporation with its large assets, which is able to insure the title and meet the damages if it makes an error, is better for the client than a lawyer who is responsible only for negligence in searching titles. Moreover, only a few lawyers would be able to respond in damages if negligence were proved against them. The layman may question, too, whether the percentage of error is not greatly reduced when the work is done by a corporation whose employees do nothing else, and are therefore unusually qualified. The use of trust companies, whether with or without an insurance attachment, as executors and trustees, is probably a great advantage over the old practice of having a private individual as trustee or executor, provided that those companies are held by the courts to a rigid accountability for the proper management of the funds placed in their hands. This the courts in this State are doing.

And is the profession not actually bettered by having negligence cases taken out of the hands of the individual? We remember to have read of "ambulance chasers" long before the rise of the liability corporation, and they are yet to be found. The injured person is still the easy victim of shyster lawyers; on the other side, defence by corporations has ended many an abuse from which the employer formerly suffered. There are still plenty of wrongs and frauds in negligence litigation, but a strong case could be made out to prove that these are fewer than before the corporation arose. Finally, it should seem as if the taking of commercial business from the lawyer might check to some extent his own commercialization, and leave him free to enter the many other fields of litigation into which no corporation has yet entered. That we are witnessing a readjustment of the legal profession in many ways, and that its standards have suffered during the process of readjustment, is perfectly evident. But few lawyers, we think, could be found to agree with Mr. Bristol that the profession is disappearing; indeed, the need of the old-fashioned solicitor who was guide, philosopher, and friend is as great today as it ever was, even though that type of lawyer is now so scarce.

A DIAGNOSIS OF WAR.

The investigation which has been proposed by the International Peace Endowment into the cause and circumstances of the war between the Balkan Allies is an excellent bit of enterprise. Events in the Balkans during the ten months that have elapsed since Montenegro gave the signal for battle have impressed themselves powerfully on the world's imagination. All war is dramatic, but we must go far back in history before we find an instance involving such broad issues, such complexity of motives, such fierce passions, such extraordinary vicissitudes of situation, such a succession of dramatic climaxes. International peace is a subject that leaves a great many people cold, but in the present instance the investigators need not fear that their report will remain unread. What the ordinary man will desire to know above all other things is just how a war which had its causes deep in history and which was regarded generally as the manifestation of the higher forces of civilization, should have ended in a shocking relapse towards barbarism. The war against Turkey was described, with pardonable rhetoric, as a conflict between the Cross and the Crescent. But the crusade degenerated into a saturnalia of evil passions. What have the teachings of Cross or Crescent to do with the Walpurgis night of hatreds, treachery, and bestial slaughter that settled down upon the unhappy Balkans? We repeat, the peace investigators will find their public ready. If ever there was an opportunity to win the world's serious attention to the nature and implications of war, one is now presented.

Of the topics for inquiry announced by President Butler—the responsibility for the outbreak of war between the allies, the truth about the outrages committed upon non-combatants, and the economic waste caused by the war—the one to which public attention is most sharply directed is not, in our minds, the most important. The Bulgarian people may feel it necessary, for the sake of the national honor and the national future, to disprove what they describe as the calumnies of the Greek and Servian press. We know in advance where the responsibility for massacre rests; not with Bulgaria, or Servia, or Greece, or Turkey. It is War that is responsible. But recognizing this, we believe that there is comparatively little to gain by laying stress on the atrocities of battlefield or massacre, just as there is little to gain by insisting on the enormous destruction of wealth through war. The horrors of war have always been a favorite subject with the novelists. The ruinous economic effects of war are continually emphasized. But to both arguments the reply is always forthcoming that men will not hesitate to give their wealth or their lives for a cause they believe in. No; the point of attack lies in the direction of ascertaining who or what is responsible for war. Is it fought for a worthy cause, or is it fought because certain leaders or certain interests desire war? It makes all the difference in the world whether the mangled bodies on the hillsides in Thrace and Macedonia are the price paid for the liberation of the Balkans from Turkish misrule, or whether those dead bodies and shattered limbs are incidents in the ambitions of a king or a commander-in-chief, and a testimonial to the skill of travelling salesmen from the gun factories at Essen and Creusot.

That is the essential difference between the Bulgarian dead who lay at Lule Burgas and Tchatalja, and the Bulgarians who fell by the tens of thousands in the ten days' fighting against the Servians at Bregelnitza in Macedonia. At Lule Burgas a nation was realizing its destinies. But even the apologists of Bulgaria admit that it was Gen. Savoff's unwise and unauthorized action that precipitated open war in Macedonia. The will of the Bulgarian nation was for war with Turkey, but the nation was not consulted before it was plunged into the disastrous conflict with Servia. Upon this point the advocate of peace can lay stress; not the heavy cost of war in lives and money, but the fact that this fearful price is frequently paid without the clear consent of those who pay it, without their even knowing why it is paid. The conduct of war is an enterprise in which the fate of nations and the lives of unnumbered thousands are placed in the hands of a few men. An error of judgment on the part of a leader in the field is paid for in terms of brigades and divisions annihilated; that is inevitable. But precisely because war must be carried on under such tremendous risks and at such fearful cost, it becomes an enterprise upon which a nation may enter only after it has weighed risks and cost against the object to be attained.

From their Balkan investigations the delegates of the International Peace Endowment may easily derive material for a text-book against war. But the chapters dealing with war's horrors will be secondary in interest and effect to the chapters dealing with the machinery for making wars, with the influence of court cabals and Ministerial cliques and Stock Exchange groups, with the nefarious intrigues of the gun and armor-makers. The jingo and the financial incendiary can be frustrated by showing, not that war is terrible, but that war is often wanton. What passes for national interest or the national honor is too often the will of individuals and groups to whom the lives and fortunes of the masses are but pawns in a highly profitable or highly exciting game.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Since the love of adventure exists so universally in the heart of man, it is not strange that the "Travels" of Capt. Jonathan Carver sprang into immediate popularity upon its first appearance in 1778. His account of campaigns in the French and Indian War and of his travels among the Indians of the lake and upper Mississippi region was not only widely read by the next generation, but became the popular manual of information on its subject. It was issued again and again in English and was translated into most of the languages of Europe. Its popularity was justified by its excellence, which has been praised by a well-known historian of American literature in the following words:

> Besides its worth for instruction, is its worth for delight; we have no other "Indian book" more captivating than this. Here is the charm of a sincere, powerful, and generous personality—the charm of significant facts, of noble ideas, of humane sentiments, all uttered in English well-ordered and pure.

From the book of this New England traveller, Schiller drew the language and thought for his "Nadowessiers Totenlied," and many of the passages on the Indians in Chateaubriand's "Voyage en Amérique" were derived from the same source. After Carver's travels had ceased to be the fountain for popular information, it became the historical source book for historians of the older school, who were ready to accept their printed material without questioning carefully the reliability of the author.

Occasionally Western travellers and writers of a later date ventured to criticise the accounts of Carver, and even to charge that he could not have been in the countries he claimed to have visited; or, if he had, that his ignorance was such as to have made the composition of the volume impossible. These sporadic attacks gained no general recognition, however, until a well-equipped and acute historian of the modern school turned on the work all the light of historical criticism.

One of the most fascinating studies for the critical historian is the attempt to prove his suspicion that the purported author of a document or book could not possibly have written it; and many most valuable and interesting services to the science of history have been performed by students who have been successful in establishing their opinion by means of the canons of internal and external criticism. The late Prof. Edward G. Bourne, of Yale University, published, in 1906, in the January number of the American Historical Review a study of this character on "The Travels of Jonathan Carver." The well-deserved reputation for accuracy of the critic added such weight to his reasoning that his final judgment was almost universally accepted. From the time of the appearance of Professor Bourne's essay there was a general agreement among the historical fraternity that Carver was an impostor with no right to the title of captain, that he was too ignorant to have written the book that bears his name, and that, although the first part, containing an account of his travels, was derived from his information, the second and more important part, which describes the Indians, was a mere compilation from French sources by some hack writer. Professor Bourne summed up his final judgment in these words:

> It is clear from the evidence here presented that the "Travels" of Jonathan Carver can no longer be ranked as an authentic record of the observations of the supposed author. . . . In any case, Carver's "Travels" must now take its place beside Benzoni's "History of the New World" and "The Book of Sir John Mandeville."

This judgment, so sweeping and caustic, appeared to be amply justified by the evidence produced; and the clever essay has frequently been cited as an excellent example of critical analysis; but it is no less an excellent example of the fallacy committed by historians, when they ignore that first and most important law of historical criticism, namely, "Thou shalt gather every scrap of information, lest thou thyself fall into the hands of the hostile critic." Scholars in the State of Wisconsin, where the name of Jonathan Carver had long been held in reverence as that of the first English explorer of the State, were not satisfied with this final judgment; and, after several years of quiet investigation, Mr. John T. Lee has just published in the Proceedings of the Wisconsin Historical Society an essay entitled "Captain Jonathan Carver; Additional Data," which is a real justification of the doughty captain.

First of all, Mr. Lee takes up the questions: Was Carver a captain of the provincial troops during the French and Indian War? Was he at the siege and capitulation of Fort William Henry in 1757, which event he describes so graphically? A little search among the archives of Massachusetts and elsewhere has given abundant evidence of Carver's service and rank. In fact, one is overwhelmed with the evidence and wonders how any charge that the captain was an impostor was ever seriously entertained. It is only necessary to cite here a passage from the certificate of Gen. Gage, written in 1768: "These are to certify, that Mr. Jonathan Carver served as Captain in the Provincials during the late war, with Reputation, and has ever bore the Character of a very Good Man."

The charge of ignorance and lack of education is also easily disproved. The fact that Carver was an officer cannot, of course, be taken as proof of his education, as there were officers among the provincials with little or no schooling. In the case of Carver, however, there is abundant evidence of his education. Before the appearance of his volume, he had acquired an enviable reputation as a map maker, as is shown by the following facts: the best contemporary map of the Province of Quebec bears his name; the De Costa map of Boston (1775) was largely his work; Carver was called upon to "improve" the "Map of the British Empire in North America" published in the "American Atlas." In this connection the statement of the present keeper of manuscripts in the British Museum should be quoted. After examining the Carver documents under his custody, he writes: Carver "must have been a man of very considerable education; his style and writing are as good (say) as Captain Cook's."

Mr. Lee has printed with his essay the petitions by Carver to the British Government for reimbursement of his expenses, and one report of the Board of Trade. These contain earlier information concerning his claims to have made important discoveries in the West than that in his book. In the report of the Board of Trade of July 10, 1769, it is asserted that Carver "undertook and performed a journey of great extent thro' the interior and unfrequented parts of the Continent of North America, travelling to the westward of Michillimackinac as far as the Heads of the Great River Mississippi, directing his Course from thence westward almost to the South Sea, and in his turn exploring the whole Circuit of the Great Lake Superior." Of course, this is an exaggeration of Carver's westward journeyings, but it is interesting to note, on account of the repeated denials by students and explorers, that the Board received from Carver's maps, journal, and conversation a distinct impression of a journey westward of the Mississippi.

Carver was chosen for this exploratory expedition by Major Robert Rogers, commandant of Mackinac at the time. The major had been appointed to his post by political influence in spite of the opposition of Gen. Gage and Sir William Johnson, and immediately inaugurated far-reaching plans, the purpose of which cannot be very certainly ascertained. For his acts he was charged with treason and upon trial at Montreal was acquitted.

Although Rogers's plans are very obscure, his purpose in sending out Carver is more understandable. Before leaving England, he had asserted his intentions of exploring the West, and it seems evident that he hoped not only to find a route to the Pacific Ocean, but also to extend the fur trade. A third purpose may have been the search for mines, and this may have been the reason for Carver's exploration of Lake Superior. It is reported that Charles Townshend sent an agent for this purpose to Lake Superior at about the same time that Carver was there, and possibly Carver and the agent were the same. At any rate, shortly after the return of Rogers and Carver to London, there was formed a Lake Superior Mining Company, composed of influential men, who obtained the King's consent to carry on their operations in that region. Although the connection between Carver and the company is not established, yet the circumstantial evidence is such as to make it extremely probable.

From Mr. Lee's study of Carver and from my own investigation of the same subject, it seems to me certain that Professor Bourne's contentions are unproven, except as regards plagiarism in that part of the volume devoted to the description of the Indians, a fact known long before Professor Bourne wrote. Instead of rejecting the volume as of no more worth than that of Sir John Mandeville, the history of his campaigns and travels may be used by historians in the same way as they would use a similar work by any intelligent and relatively cultivated man, for such Carver evidently was.

C. W. ALVORD.

Correspondence

TRAVELLING IN GREECE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of July 24, Mr. Joseph Pennell disputes the correctness of some remarks of Professor D'Ooge's about the management of antiquities in Greece, accuses the American School at Athens of having allowed the storage museum at Cerinth to be put in an unsuitable place, and, in general, gives such a mistaken idea of what a traveller in Greece may expect as his portion, that a word of protest seems in order.

I assume that Mr. Pennell must be comparatively unfamiliar with conditions in Greece. He certainly writes as one who has little conception of the problems which have confronted the Greeks during the last fifty years of their development. The difficulties he had with money matters are very likely due to the war, for a little more than a year ago gold could be had by the traveller at fair rates. I am, however, informed by one who has just come from Greece that he found no difficulty, even now, in procuring such gold as he needed, at reasonable figures. As to Greek money being refused anywhere in Greece, that will be news to many an experienced traveller in the country. Of course any country, when engaged in a war which strains its resources to the utmost, will levy stamp taxes and other taxes to the extent of its ability. Under such circumstances, it is common-sense to pay the tax cheerfully or stay at home.

As to Mr. Pennell's experience in being overcharged, an experience which he says is typical, one can only say that such incidents are not confined to Greece. The foreigner generally pays more than the native everywhere, and our own country and Great Britain are no exceptions to the rule. Perhaps in Italy one has the fact illustrated as completely and openly as anywhere else. For that excursion to Epidaurus, which so tried Mr. Pennell, I paid for my carriage last year about twenty-five francs, nothing to the man who got it for me (one need not be too guileless), a reasonable fee to the driver and to the very courteous guardian at the Theatre. If this year, with the existing shortage of men and horses, forty francs was paid for a carriage, the high charge was scarcely extortionate; and the drive is nearly forty miles, there and back. Perhaps I may offset Mr. Pennell's experience with one of my own. A year ago I spent a night with a party of friends in a small mountain village near Sparta. We were lodged in a peasant's house who, by the way, had two married daughters living in Sioux City. I had made up my mind about what I ought to pay, and misunderstanding the man's figures when I was settling the account, I took from my purse the sum I had determined upon. I soon found my mistake, and discovered that he was asking me less than I was about to pay, and he saw my money, too. The bill was then paid in accordance with his figures. Greece is, of course, still to some extent in the stage of commercial development when few prices are really fixed. Bargaining is the rule, and if a person occasionally pays a pretty good price, he may still not be cheated in a true sense.

Another grievance of Mr. Pennell's is the "artless vulgarity" displayed in fixing the position of the storage museum at Old Corinth. And forsooth the American School is as responsible as any one else! Here again Mr. Pennell speaks without knowledge. The American School is in no way responsible. Such buildings are put where the Greek authorities think best, and their decision is affected by all sorts of considerations, among which the village conditions of land-holding may enter in. In Year Book No. 7 of the Carnegie Institution an excellent panoramic view of the excavations may be found. The museum is the low building at the right. It is certainly not a beautiful structure, but to contend that it utterly hides the "historic view" of the temple is, to say the least, a gross exaggeration.

Mr. Pennell's prophecy that some day, when it pays, the Greeks will charge an entrance fee to the museums and monuments may perhaps be correct, and few would blame them if they did. They tried it in Athens a couple of years ago, and soon gave it up, because, I believe, the fee checked their own people in visiting such places, and it was felt that there was an educational loss. I have often wondered that the Greeks did not make travellers buy a general ticket to all antiquities, as is done in Egypt; but they have a rather fine, if perhaps almost Quixotic, pride in making such things free to all, and it is not always easy to make separate regulations for natives and foreigners. Moreover, the people have not yet lost the charming and traditional φιλοξενία, which to the foreigner who stays any time in Greece is a source of constant delight. Contrast the attitude of the Italians, who are not willing that foreigners should conduct excavations on Italian soil. As a whole, in spite of occasional faults, such as may enter into any human undertaking, the record of the management of Greek antiquarian work has been large-minded and efficient.

MR. BOK ON COLLEGE ENGLISH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Edward Bok contributes to the Outlook of August 16 an article ("Is the College Making Good?") which deserves the consideration of teachers in college. Some points about his indictment of the ignorance of students, however, are manifestly unfair.

In the first place, one may fairly accuse Mr. Bok of a breach of courtesy in thus publishing, in so unfriendly a way, the grammatical errors of those who in good faith sought to answer his questionnaire.

In the second place, there is no breach of courtesy in the fact that some students failed to answer Mr. Bok's questionnaire. I suppose that Mr. Bok's acquaintance with the seniors in the colleges selected for examination came only from an inspection of catalogues. This does not accredit him, nor place his inquiry in the category of "business letters." His idea that the mere enclosure of a stamp demands an answer is absurd. The enclosure of a hundred stamps would not require an answer, unless some other interest than mere curiosity or gain prompted the writer's request.

In the third place, one may doubt, and I as an instructor, in one of the institutions criticised by Mr. Bok, take the liberty of so doubting, whether Mr. Bok is at all a fit person to discuss good grammar or style. Let me cite some phrases of his own article:

"If, added to these testimonies, we should secure the opinions . . . we would get a fair line on the college and its work."

Now, quite apart from the journalese of "get a fair line on," it is obvious that Mr. Bok cannot distinguish between "would" and "should." Again:

"Of course one salient fact that must be borne in mind is" . . .

Bearing in mind a salient fact must be as hard as carrying a kicking pig! Again:

"A recognition of even the most minor practical rules" . . .

How much more minor, Mr. Bok, is one practical rule than another? Again:

"A stamped, addressed envelope was enclosed in each letter so as to simplify its answer."

What Mr. Bok means is "to ensure a reply." The answer is not simplified by an envelope. Purists would object, too, to the ambiguity of "its." Again:

"The basic defect that underlies all these various kinds of slips." . . .

Here is the pleonasm that is the bane of all such glibness as Mr. Bok's. Again:

"Each prospective graduate" . . .

There is no such thing as a "prospective" graduate.

Fourthly, Mr. Bok's indictment of college men's vagueness is exploded by one little sentence of his own:

"There is a wearying recurrence of . . . the self-evident 'increases your knowledge.'"

I had thought that the increase of knowledge was the one use of college; that, in fact, there was no other. It appears, then, that the students who took the pains—with what thanks we have seen—to answer Mr. Bok wearied him by giving him—the correct answer.

Finally, the defects which appear in the letters used by Mr. Bok for exploitation of ignorance do not prove the poor training in college, unless the inquiry of Mr. Bok plainly stated that the answers would be regarded as tests in spelling and grammar. They prove, on the contrary, that parents have not taught their children to desire good use. A boy who does not habitually spell correctly is a disgrace, not to his college, but to his mother and his father. From five years of experience I know that nine out of ten "bad spellers" can spell right when they must, but lapse into error from the mere habit of years of parental neglect. Let the blame be set upon the right shoulders. The college has the boy for training in composition only an hour a week for thirty weeks. What was the mother doing when the boy was from eight to twelve years old, the period at which spelling should be taught?

QUERY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In reading "The French Revolution: A Political History, 1789-1804," by A. Aulard, translated by Bernard Miall (Scribners, 1910), I am at a loss to understand the following paragraph:

> The most important fact of all in the history of republican ideas is that twenty years before the French Revolution all enlightened Frenchmen had read, either in the original (for a knowledge of the English language was then very general in France) or in one of the numerous French translations, the text of the Constitution of the United States. (Volume I, p. 113.)

The Constitution of the United States was not, of course, in existence before 1787, so that, in view of M. Aulard's words "twenty years before the French Revolution," it is impossible that he should be referring to this document.

To what does he refer?

THE WAR OF 1870.

The Franco-Prussian War and its Hidden Causes. By Emile Ollivier. Translated from the French, with an Introduction and Notes by George Burnham Ives. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $2.50 net.

For some years after Louis Napoleon established the Second Empire there was no opposition in the Legislative Body; but in 1857 five men of liberal views were returned. Of these five—les Cinq, as they were known—one was an able and eloquent lawyer, M. Emile Ollivier, who became, after 1866, the leader of those moderates who counselled the Emperor to grant a Parliamentary régime as the most effective bulwark against the rising tide of Socialistic and Radical Republican agitation. The new régime was proclaimed in 1869, and in December of that year M. Ollivier was entrusted with the formation of a "homogeneous Cabinet," which, not in fact very homogeneous after all, took office on January 2, 1870. The policy of the new Ministry was to strengthen the empire by making reasonable concessions at home and resolutely pursuing peace abroad. Nevertheless, on July 19 war was declared against Prussia, and in less than two months the Liberal Ministry had fallen, Napoleon was a prisoner, and the empire at an end.

Those extremists, Imperialists of the Right and Republicans of the Left, who had done what they could to drive France into war, wished not to bear the responsibility for so overwhelming a disaster. They therefore laid the blame on the Ministry, and particularly on the chief Minister, M. Ollivier. Meantime, M. Ollivier, living in retirement since his fall, August 8, 1870, has given much careful study to the history of the Second Empire, and particularly to the closing years, which marked at once the culmination of his political career and the tragedy of his life. The results of his study began to appear about twenty years ago in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in a series of articles which, with some revision, have been printed in book form under the title of "L'Empire libéral." The first volume came out in 1894, and the sixteenth is probably now in press, if not already published. The work is, in the best sense, an apologia pro vita sua—an apology in the original sense of a valiant justification, and a justification, moreover, in the present case, based upon very full knowledge and inspired by a resolute desire to extenuate nothing and to set down naught in malice.

The gist of M. Ollivier's defence is contained in the book now done into English by Mr. Ives. The text is made up of extracts, chosen by M. Ollivier himself, from the larger work, "L'Empire libéral," to which the translator has added, in the form of notes, many quotations from Gorce, Sorel, De Gramont, and other secondary authorities, and an occasional extract from "L'Empire libéral," which M. Ollivier did not think necessary to include. As the title indicates, the book deals with the events, particularly with the diplomatic negotiations, that led up to the Franco-Prussian War. It is a fascinating story, highly dramatic in itself, and well told; that it is told by one of the chief actors, whose bias is obvious, and whose interest in the theme remains fresh and vital after forty years, makes the present narrative none the less important and all the more interesting.

Wishing to drive France into war, Bismarck induced the Spanish Government to offer the crown of Spain to Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, who signified his willingness to accept the crown in case the offer should be confirmed by a majority of the Cortes. France could not submit to any such arrangement, and M. Ollivier exhausted the resources of diplomacy in the effort to avoid war by procuring either a withdrawal of the offer or an abandonment of the candidacy. Representations at Madrid and at London were fruitless, while the Prussian Government professed to regard the question as a private affair of the Hohenzollern family with which it had nothing to do. King William himself, when approached in his private character by Benedetti at Ems, replied that he could not interfere: he had sanctioned Leopold's conduct when he accepted the offer; he would likewise sanction his conduct if he should determine to withdraw. Meantime, Prince Anthony, father of Leopold, influenced by the representations of the Rumanian agent, Strat, on July 11 commanded Leopold to withdraw, which the latter did under protest. The withdrawal so obtained was confirmed by the King.

The affair seemed now at an end. France had achieved a great diplomatic victory—"the finest," said Guizot, "which has been won in my lifetime." Bismarck was in despair and thought of resigning. M. Ollivier was overjoyed. At three o'clock on July 12 the Ministers agreed with Napoleon that nothing should be decided until the next day. Yet at seven o'clock in the evening Gramont sent off the famous dispatch embodying the demand for "future guaranties"—a dispatch instructing Benedetti to request the King not only to confirm the withdrawal of Leopold, but to give "assurance that he will not again sanction that candidacy." Benedetti presented this request, which the King refused. Even so, the matter might have ended, for on the following day the Cabinet decided not to press the demand for guaranties.

But the unfortunate Benedetti had not seen fit to remain content with the reply which the King sent him: he insisted once, and a second time, upon a personal interview, if only "to hear his Majesty repeat what he had said to him." This passed the bounds of royal patience, and King William sent to Bismarck the famous telegram in which he left it to the Chancellor to determine "whether Count Benedetti's latest demand, and the refusal with which it was met, should be communicated at once to our Ministers, to foreign nations, and to the press." Bismarck, who had already resigned himself to failure, seized the opportunity which fate thus provided, and published the telegram in a modified form—a form which made it appear that the Prussian King had insulted the French Ambassador by refusing to receive him. The edited telegram, published throughout the world on the morning of July 14, had precisely the effect intended: July 19 the French Government declared war against Prussia.

M. Ollivier's main thesis is that the Ministry did all that was humanly possible to avoid war. That M. Ollivier sincerely desired peace, no one doubts; that his Ministry achieved a great diplomatic victory by procuring the withdrawal of the candidacy, is conceded. But why, then, many historians ask, did the Government imperil this splendid victory by making the foolish demand for future guaranties? And why did M. Ollivier, forgetting the main issue and falling at last into Bismarck's trap, declare war because the King had refused to receive Benedetti? Having secured the essential interests of France, the Ministry should not, it is said, have plunged the country into war merely to avenge a diplomatic indiscretion.

With respect to the demand for guaranties, the defence of M. Ollivier is adequate. The famous dispatch was sent off by Gramont, on the Emperor's sole authority and without the knowledge of M. Ollivier or the other Ministers, at seven o'clock, after what Gramont calls a "conscientious discussion" at St. Cloud. "Who took part in that discussion?" M. Ollivier asks. "I know only those who were not invited—they were: the Minister of War, . . . the Keeper of the Seals, . . . the Minister of the Interior, . . . the Minister of Finance; in a word, no member of the Cabinet save the Minister of Foreign Affairs." As Gorce believed, it was the Empress who dominated the conference and won over the vacillating Emperor; and M. Ollivier did not learn until "after eleven o'clock at night, and by mere chance, that a momentous decision had been reached and put into execution." Moreover, on the following day the Cabinet did what it could to rectify the blunder.

But if M. Ollivier did nothing to bring on the war, he accepted it when it came; and he accepted it, it is said, "with a light heart." This phrase, which occurs in the speech before the Chamber in favor of the declaration of war, has been quoted a thousand times, and is quoted even to this day in reputable histories as evidence that the Minister was neither very strongly attached to peace nor aware of the heavy responsibility of war. Taken in its context, this scriptural paraphrase, as Gorce long ago pointed out, bears no such meaning. For M. Ollivier immediately added: "I mean, with a heart that is not made heavy by remorse, because the war that we shall wage we are forced into, because we have done all that was humanly and honorably possible to avoid it."

Nevertheless, with light heart or heavy, M. Ollivier did accept the war. Should he not have endeavored, even after the publication of the Ems telegram, to maintain peace? No, M. Ollivier says; the act of Bismarck was a studied insult not to be passed over with honor by any nation; to have accepted it would have meant a loss of prestige from which France could never have recovered. The point is debatable, but one is inclined to think that if M. Ollivier could have kept the patriotic Paris sentiment in check, France might have recovered from the victory of peace as splendidly as she did from the humiliation of war. However, it is admitted that M. Ollivier could not have combated the war sentiment successfully. His only alternative to declaring war was to resign; and had he resigned the result would have been the same in every respect: the war would have occurred; France would have been defeated; and M. Ollivier himself, instead of being denounced for assuming responsibility, would have been denounced for not assuming it.

Responsibility for the war, from which the Ministry is thus cleared, is put upon Bismarck: no Bismarck, no war. From the point of view of human motive, Bismarck is clearly the responsible agent. He alone, among the persons holding positions of authority, desired the war; he alone deliberately set himself, by fair means or foul, to bring it about. But regarding the war as the result of a connected series of events, the thing that strikes one, the very thing that was so maddening to Bismarck himself, is that the Chancellor had to sit quietly by, waiting for others to act, and wondering what they would do. And, after all, on M. Ollivier's own showing, there would have been no telegram to edit if Benedetti had not been indiscreet. In this sense the acts of Bismarck are no more important, as causes of the war, than those of the Emperor, or of Benedetti, and the question of responsibility disappears.

Most readers will readily agree that Bismarck was responsible. Whether he was justified, as a German statesman, in deliberately embroiling the two countries for the sake of advancing the interests of the Fatherland, is a quite different question. In his final judgment of Bismarck from this point of view, M. Ollivier is more generous than one might expect him to be. The French Ambassador, Talleyrand, was on one occasion seeking a polite phrase in which to express his disapproval of Bismarck's conduct. "Don't put yourself out," said the Chancellor. "Nobody but my King thinks that I acted honorably." M. Ollivier's comments are just. "Æsthetically, I like him thus. As soon as he reveals his true self, and boasts of his audacious knaveries which raised his Germany, until now divided and impotent, to the first rank among nations, then he is as great as Satan—a mighty statesman, of sinister but impressive grandeur. He will not thereby have opened for himself the gates of any paradise; he will have won forever one of the most exalted places in the German Pantheon of terrestrial apotheoses."

CURRENT FICTION.

The Jumping-Off Place. By Ethel Shackelford. New York: George H. Doran Co.

The notion of the Eastern girl, reduced to a mess of nerves by a life of fashion, and destined to be healed by contact with the wild West, is not new. The usual method is to plunge her into the hard life of frontier or ranch, to make her use her wits and her hands. Nothing so crude is here meditated. The Camp to which the lady is sent by her physician is a camp only in name, a community in which golf and bridge and motoring have at least as large a part as hard work. Picturesque relics of a sterner age survive, but the hardships involved in residence are only such as inhere in remoteness from Fifth Avenue. Our Eleanor drops, with a maid, into a luxurious bungalow. A telephone puts the neighborhood at her service; and there ensues a mild, not to say silly, comedy of coquetry, engaging, in some degree, all the eligible males of the Camp. She qualifies as frontier heroine by learning to shoot, and performing the two favorite feats of the frontier markswoman: defending herself from a too ardent admirer, and saving the life of the man she loves. When we say that the man is really her husband from whom, though they adore each other, a honeymoon misunderstanding has separated her, we give the reader a sufficient inkling as to the course of events. The dialogue involved is of the "bright" or piquant type which the undergraduate disposes of as "fresh."

Pity the Poor Blind. By H. H. Bashford. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

The Ffolliots of Redmarley. By L. Allen Harker. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

It must be said for Mr. Bashford that he betrays his unimportance rather later than most. His is a masterly manner and a fundamental lack of taste. He begins what promises to be a good bit of light comedy by dispatching from a London centre of high-church influence to a Dorsetshire parish, a pompous young cleric with an inflated sense of his own sanctity. To Sabbath congregations he is known as a fine pulpit presence and an ornament to the church, but to Mr. Bashford and the reader as a selfishly ambitious son who keeps an unpresentable but doting mother well in the background. The first landing of this hypersensitive stranger in a plain-spoken neighborhood throws him—by mistake—into the household of a loose-living country squire, where a bird of his feather is welcomed as one of nature's curiosities, and his sonorous Latin grace before meat is taken as an oracular tip on the day's racing. But here Mr. Bashford drops the rôle of genial entertainer and takes to sermonizing. Not to bate Malvolio in a cassock, but to reform him, is his high purpose. The chief instrument employed in this project is the squire's daughter, a maiden richly endowed with all the bovine graces—good nature, physical strength, and a leisurely mind. In her presence our cleric instantly recognizes his own nothingness. Though somewhat deficient on the spiritual side, she is to him a convincing revelation of the beauty of naturalness, while he, in spite of his lack of honest sincerity, wears in her serene uncritical eyes all the beauty of holiness. With mutual assistance they both at last "find God."

The aspiring son of the middle class who, in presence of the gentry, succumbs to a benumbing sense of his own inferiority, is getting to be one of the standardized subjects of British mirth. Whereas Mr. Bashford shrouded his situation in dim religious light, and cured his hero's bad manners by dragging him through the depths of religious experience, Mrs. Harker gives it a mildly political cast. Her hero is a shopkeeper's son (Mr. Bashford, was sprung from a piano-tuner), and climbs into the social fold as a Liberal candidate. The rhetorical finish of his speech (like Mr. Gladstone, he addresses ladies as if they were public meetings), and the confusion into which he falls at sight of the squire's adorable wife and daughter, constantly betray his base origin. So indelibly marked is he with the habit of counter service, that, having purchased a necktie, he absentmindedly sorts the disarranged "stock" into the proper boxes while waiting for his change. But being at heart a blameless youth, a few lessons in simplicity and kindliness taken from the example of real gentlewomen greatly increase his present ability, and he is even permitted to make love—very respectfully—to Miss Mary, but certainly not to marry her. The author discreetly explains the unsuitableness of such a match and consigns Mary to the safekeeping of Capt. Reggie. There are points in the story at which we could easily persuade ourselves that we were reading a Manual of Deportment for Young Ladies—"How to approach a strange young man who has fallen into a puddle," "How to rebuke a disagreeable father without impertinence," "Teaching a self-conscious youth how to behave at a ball," etc. Enjoyable, even amusing, object-lessons, but object-lessons none the less. Mrs. Harker is really more interested in the younger members of the squire's family than in Mary and the parliamentary Gallup, but even in nursery and school-day episodes, in which she is at her best, we still suspect her of having at heart the edification of the juvenile mind.

Both these books are rich in what is known as "kindly humor." Together they contain an amount of it that is positively demoralizing, not to say smothering. What we need in these days of politely repressed smiles is a burst of healthy, conscienceless, dangerous laughter to clear the air.

Little Mamselle of the Wilderness: A Story of La Salle and his Pioneers. By Augusta Huiell Seaman. New York: Sturgis & Walton Co.

The sub-title at least sufficiently describes this book, in so far as it is to be described as anything but juvenile romance. Nobody else is likely to take its history as seriously as (to judge by the "Foreword") the author does. It is perfectly true, as she says, after Parkman, that La Salle was a great man; but that seems to be no fit cause for placing his helpless effigy in a nursery tale. Little Mamselle and her schoolgirl romance are the main thing. Her experiences are neither more nor less credible than the recipe calls for. That La Salle's expedition to the Mississippi should be chosen as setting for them is a purely arbitrary chance. We do not see that there is anything to be said for this sort of thing, unless that babies cry for it.

The Land of the Spirit. By Thomas Nelson Page. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

In his Preface Mr. Page says that "the most notable one change in our national life in the last decade is the deepening of its note. Whereas formerly attention was given largely to things of the surface, of late the mind has been directed more to those things which lie underneath." He believes that there are signs of spiritual awakening on every hand, and gives the present title to his collection of stories "as in some sort reflecting glimpses of this new Land of the Spirit." We confess that we search in vain through these pages for any kind of novelty, whether of mind or of spirit. They seem rather a survival; theirs is the somewhat obvious piety and sentiment of the Victorian fathers. Their dealings with supernatural matters are upon the simplest of planes. There are two nativity stories, devoutly told, and a tale of Jesus appearing in a modern church and faring ill at the hands of the fashionable parishioners. For the rest, the stories are much like those which Mr. Page has collected in his other volumes, such as "In Old Virginia." Part of his charm for the public lies, no doubt, in a certain ingenuous stiffness of style not to be found in this day north of Mason and Dixon's line—the style of a Southerner "of the old school."

POSITIVISM.

The Positive Evolution of Religion. By Frederic Harrison. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2 net.

In this book the St. Paul of Positivism, as Frederic Harrison might be called, delivers what he evidently regards as his farewell message to the unregenerate world. It is composed of various essays and addresses, many of them already published elsewhere, yet put together so as to constitute a fairly unified whole. The generous appreciation which he shows of every form of religion is perhaps the most striking characteristic of the book. And this honest attempt to be always fair is especially notable from the fact that the author's one aim is to make clear how superior the Religion of Humanity is to every other form of faith and worship.

In order, apparently, to be strictly orthodox in his presentation, Mr. Harrison begins his review of religions, as all good Positivists should, with "Fetichism." This (following Comte and disregarding all later authorities) he identifies with nature worship, interpreting it as the direct worship of material objects in themselves, with nothing animistic about them. After Fetichism comes, of course, Polytheism, which, like its predecessor, has a chapter-full of praise. For the author aims to show that both of these lower stages of religion contained much that was excellent, and that all this has been preserved in purer form by the Religion of Humanity. Monotheism, we are told, is a weakening as well as an ennobling of Polytheism. Christianity is taken as the type of Monotheism, and Catholicism is declared "the only serious, enduring, organic form of Christianity." Except in regard to its creed, Harrison has little but praise and admiration for the Catholic Church. Three very appreciative chapters are devoted to it, and he quotes several times with approval Dr. Congreve's maxim to the effect that Positivism itself is only Catholicism plus science.

In the next two chapters the aged Positivist has a very good time unburdening his soul as to the varieties of religious experience in England. The Anglican Establishment has a delightful chapter to itself, and is characterized as follows:

> The Church of England is the most complex and ambiguous kind of compromise in all Christendom. It is a compromise within a compromise. It is at once Local-Catholic, Spiritual-Temporal, Sacerdotal-Individual, Sacramental-Evangelical, Ecclesiastical-Biblical. It combines every kind of contradictory. . . . Of all Protestant communities, it is the most tolerant, the most elastic, the most large-minded. . . . It has a dummy Pope and Episcopal Conclave, a dummy House of Convocation, a dummy Mass, and a dummy Penance and Absolution. None of these will work; nor are they made to work.

For "Orthodox Dissent" our author has more respect; but both it and the Established Church have the same fundamental weakness of being inconsistent and half-way devices. The Churchman should either return to Rome or become an out-and-out Protestant; and the latter, now that the infallibility of the Bible has been given up, should go on to Neo-Christianity. And Neo-Christianity cannot be consistent till it ceases to be Christian:

> Christianity as a religion rests on the divinity of Christ. If there be no miracle, there can be no divinity. If Jesus were not God, he is a rather feeble type to imitate, and an utterly vain reed to lean upon. If he be risen from the cross, it is a miracle. If he be not risen, he is not God; and if he be not God, "then is your faith vain." If Christ be a man like Socrates, put Socrates for Christ. Talk of the Imitation of Socrates; Socrates's sacrifice for our sins, our good actions being inspired by Socrates; Socrates being our mediator, and receiving us into Heaven. What nonsense would be this Religion of Socrates! So Christianity without the supernatural is nonsense also.

Thus we are driven to Theism, which, in the first place, is entirely indemonstrable, in the second place "may issue in anything," and, thirdly, "is a scheme of thought so bare, so transcendental, and so alien to human interests and sympathy, that it does not offer the basis for a religion definite enough to effect great moral and social action for masses of men." Hence a man who is both religious and logical should turn to the last refuge of all, the Religion of Humanity. This is no more atheistic than theistic. It pins its faith to natural science alone, but on the ultimate questions of the universe it has no opinion:

> It neither accepts nor disputes the solution of Natural Theology. It insists that the normal object of religious reverence lies in a wholly different sphere—not in the Incomprehensible, but in the Comprehensible; not in the universe, but in this planet; not in the Absolute, but in the Relative; not in the supernatural, but in the natural; not in the divine, but in the human world.

In spite of its negations, it is the only complete religion, and in it "are realized all the dreams of the older faiths."

Throughout the book one's attention is repeatedly drawn to the author's naïve acceptance of the unlimited sway of natural science; his utter contempt for mysticism; his failure to understand the power and necessity of tradition in matters of faith; his blindness to the beauty and universality of many of the teachings of Jesus; his strange attitude towards perfectly dead mortals as if they were deathless deities. But most fundamental of all the views which the unconverted reader finds it hard to accept is the view of religion for which this book stands. Religion is defined as "the state of harmony that results when man's entire life, both as an individual and as a member of society, corresponds with the real conditions—first of human nature; and, secondly, of the world around us." This is at best ambiguous. But whatever it may mean, surely a study of humanity and of religion will show that man has always insisted on pondering long and deeply over those ultimate questions which Positivism rules out of court, and that religion, in fact, consists just in the attitude which men take towards those very powers which Comte taught his followers systematically to ignore. Persuade humanity that it has nothing but itself to worship, and it will soon cease worshipping. To preach good will towards men is certainly a fine thing, but it is not religion; nor can you make it into religion by adding a whole calendar of "saints" and all the nine Positivist "sacraments."

THE MERMAID TAVERN.

Tales of the Mermaid Tavern. By Alfred Noyes. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.35 net.

Alfred Noyes, if any one, has deserved well of poetry. He has done his best to raise it from the triviality into which it has gradually fallen to something of its old-time elevation and splendor. In particular, he has sought to restore its ancient dignity of theme by a return from the petty personalities of a late decadence to historical and national subjects such as occupied it in the days of its glory. To say, then, that his latest undertaking is not wholly a success, is not to condemn it so severely as would be the case with a less attempt: in the language of one of his own Elizabethans, "suffice that great attempts have never shame." As his title implies, the author has been at pains to spin about the Mermaid Inn a series of stories more or less characteristic of its traditional frequenters, while he has given the whole collection a kind of unity by putting them all into the mouth of a "drawer" who afterwards becomes host of the tavern. About this device, with all its advantages for the story-teller, since the raconteur is after all a mere man of straw and mouthpiece only for the poet, there is the serious drawback that it frequently involves one narrative within another, so that the story itself finally reaches the reader at second or even third hand and as though by hearsay.

As for the "tales" themselves, Mr. Noyes has shown imagination in elaborating them—in many instances from the more or less meagre outlines of tradition. Nor is he less ingenious in the use of literary, biographical, and historical allusions, by which he seeks to give his inventions an air of plausibility and to assimilate them with reality, while he has succeeded in relieving the unavoidable monotony of his narrator's blank verse by a number of lyric passages in diversified measures.

On the whole, however, his vein is rather epic than dramatic. The moment his greater personages begin to speak for themselves, the spell is broken. No doubt, to the idolatry of a later age such a disillusion is inevitable in the case of figures like Kit Marlowe and Ben Jonson, to say nothing of Shakespeare's self, who by the way is staged but cautiously. Nevertheless, the result is the same; and the impression is strengthened rather than weakened by the poet's disposition to exaggerate the romantic legend as though in recognition of the fact that success in this kind must be something of a tour de force at best. In this way his principal characters come to seem bigger, brawnier, and more obstreperous even than tradition. They impend appallingly out of an intemperate Elizabethan Valhalla of cloud and fog, thunder and earthquake. But unfortunately they are sometimes more suggestive of Ancient Pistol than of his creator.

It is for this reason that the effect is happier when the narrative centres upon a minor character like Will Kemp and his nine-day morris, or when the story is elicited, as it might be, from an intermediary or bystander, as is the case with the death of Marlowe or the burial of Mary Queen of Scots. Indeed, aside from incident, where Mr. Noyes is always at his best in spite of his constant temptation to surcharge his narrative, some of the best passages in the volume are bits of secondary characterization of this kind, among which is the excellent portrait of John Ford,

"with folded arms and melancholy hat":

For such a silent soul
Was Master Ford that, when he suddenly spake,
It struck the rest as dumb as if the Sphinx
Had opened its cold stone lips. He would sit mute,
Brooding, aloof, for hours, his cloak around him,
A staff between his knees, as if prepared
For a long journey, a lonely pilgrimage
To some dark tomb; a strange and sorrowful soul,
Yet not—as many thought him—harsh or hard,
But of a most kind patience. Though he wrote
In blood, they say, the blood came from his heart;
And all the sufferings of the world he took
To his own soul, and bade them pasture there;
Till out of his compassion, he became
A monument of bitterness. He rebelled;
And so fell short of that celestial height
Whereto the greatest only climb, who stand
By Shakespeare, and accept the Eternal Law.

Notes

For the end of this month, the Houghton Mifflin Company are offering "Happy-Go-Lucky," a story by Ian Hay; also the following educational works: "The Nation and the Empire," by Lord Milner, consisting of his more notable speeches and addresses; "Representative Cities of the United States: a Geographical and Industrial Reader for Grammar Schools," by Caroline W. Hotchkiss; "The Teaching of Spelling," by Henry Suzzallo; "How to Teach Reading," by Frances Jenkins; "Studies in Foreign Education," by Cloudesley Brereton, and "Selections from the Prose Works of Matthew Arnold," edited by W. S. Johnson.

In September Funk & Wagnalls will issue a new edition of the New Standard Dictionary.

The Century Co. announces "The Townsend Twins—Camp Directors," by W. L. Eldred; "Beaumont the Dramatist," by Charles Mills Gayley, and "Social Evolution," by T. S. Chapin.

Duffield & Company's list of autumn fiction starts with Marguerite Bryant's "The Master Passion." Other novels offered are: "Circe's Daughter," by Priscilla Craven; "A Mesalliance," by Katharine Tynan; "A Runaway Ring," by Mrs. Henry Dudeney; "Margery Fytton," by Lady Ridley; "The Sphinx in the Labyrinth," by Maude Annesley; "Molly Beamish," by H. de Vere Stacpoole, and "Uncle's Advice," by William Hewlett.

The same house will issue three volumes of unpublished correspondence of Napoleon I, edited by Lieut.-Col. Ernest Picard, translated by Mrs. Louise Seymour Houghton; "Goldoni; a Biography," by H. C. Chatfield-Taylor, and "Footprints Beneath the Snow," by Henry Bordeaux.

McBride, Nast & Co. announce for early appearance "The Insidious Dr. Fu-Manchu," by Sax Rohmer, and "In Midsummer Days," by August Strindberg.

Heath's Modern Language Series will include the following, now in press: Spielhagen's "Das Skelett im Hause," with notes and vocabulary by M. M. Skinner; Schmidhofer's "Zweites Lesebuch"; Stern's "Die Wiedertäufer," edited with notes, vocabulary, and questions by F. B. Sturm; "Gruss aus Deutschland," by C. H. Holzwarth; Rogge's "Der grosse Preussenkönig," edited with notes by Professor Adams; Hauff's "Der Zwerg Nase," a new edition with oral exercises, notes, and vocabulary, by O. R. Patzwald and C. W. Robson; "La France qui travaille," consisting of chapters condensed from Arduin-Dumazet's "Voyage en France," and "Mes Premiers Pas en Français," by Chapuzet and Daniels, designed for children.

Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace is to continue his sociological writing with a book on "The Revolt of Democracy," which will be published by Cassell.

Tables of statisties, with explanatory text, of the wheat cultivation and trade of six European nations during the years 1881-1910 are given by Mr. J. F. Unstead in the Geographical Journal for August. The following numbers will contain similar statistics of the other principal countries of the world. There is shown among other things the area under cultivation, the number of bushels raised to the acre, the net imports and the amount, in bushels, consumed per head. It is interesting to note that while the cultivated area has decreased in all the countries except the Austrian Empire, the amount raised has increased in Germany from 19 bushels to 29 bushels an acre. France leads in the amount consumed per head, 7.8 bushels, Norway being the lowest. The virtually unknown region on the frontier of Bolivia and Brazil is described by Lieut. H. A. Edwards, who explored it during his service on the boundary commission. Much of it is wonderfully fertile land, but in many places life is made almost unbearable by insect pests. Among these are spiders with bodies 6 inches long, whose bite is extremely poisonous. A motor road has been built through a part of the forest by a Bolivian business house at a cost of $400,000 and an annual cost of maintenance of $50,000. An interesting account of the hard life of the rubber collector is given. Mr. I. N. Dracopoli tells of a trip across Juhaland in British East Africa in order to settle a disputed question as to the disappearance of a river in the Lorian swamp.

George Palmer Putnam is convinced that the time is fast approaching when Americans will become more familiar with their Spanish neighbors in the tropics, and in his book, "The Southland of North America" (Putnam), he gives his impressions of the five republics that lie between Mexico and Panama. Costa Rica he found happy, stable, and prosperous; Salvador he calls "another republic worthy of the name." He is not sanguine about Nicaragua, over which the United States may extend a protecting wing for the purpose of preventing the building of a rival canal to the isthmian waterway. Nicaragua's men and means are depleted, he says, and Honduras is almost as bad. Then comes Guatemala, a "land held in the iron hand of a dictator, Manuel Estrada Cabrera," who would like to extend his dominions over all Central America, which Mr. Putnam regards as a chimerie dream. "They [the people of Central America] loathe the idea as thoroughly as they dread the possibility that the ultimate intention of the United States is to annex them all—and against that they rave."

Mr. Putnam has not attempted a profound study of political conditions in Central America; rather his object has been to show that between us and our new transcontinental waterway there lies a little-known land of "glowing possibilities, unique problems, and grave responsibilities." He is a keen and sympathetic observer, and has obviously tried to put the people of Central America in a favorable light, without overlooking their shortcomings. Moreover, he has introduced the reader to cities and scenery that will call the tourist from the North when the travel tide sets through the canal for the Pacific. There are numerous illustrations in the book, and a map giving the author's route.

Readers of Jack London's "Martin Eden" may have suspected that there was a good deal of autobiography in that narrative; how much it remained for "John Barleycorn" (Century Co.) to make clear. Martin's general experience was, it seems, founded on fact. Even his astonishing transformation, in the space of two or three years, from a rough and grammarless sailor to a man of education and a popular author, appears to have been a transcript from life. It will be remembered that as a deckhand he had been an intermittent drinker, and that in his years of success he acquired an appetite for drink. Mr. London tells us that it has been so with himself. In short, this is a disconcertingly frank record of his life from the angle of John Barleycorn. It will appeal to more than one class of readers. As a tract against the saloon, and a professed argument for woman suffrage in order that the saloon may be done away with, it will please the prohibitionists and suffragists. As a record of glorious sprees and multifarious good-fellowship, it is capable of exciting thirst in the thirsty-minded. As a tract, it suffers from this drawback that the author does not pretend to have "sworn off," or even express a wish to swear off. He has acquired, he says, the habit of taking life "glass in hand," and will probably so take it to the end. There seems to be a vein of seriousness in his main contention that the inborn physical desire for drink is rare; that in the vast majority of instances the hard drinker is a forced product of the saloon system. To himself, he says, alcohol remained, through many years of use, distasteful; a social, not a physical, necessity. Everywhere the saloon was open as the meeting-place of full-blooded men, everywhere the lifted glass was the symbol of fellowship. Perhaps Mr. London does not consider as fully as he should, while he is about it, what is to become of his full-blooded men, deprived of their meeting-place and their symbol. He speaks vaguely of a substitute to be devised; but does not our experience with prohibition, at least in large cities, go to show that such a substitute will have to be perfected and set in running order before the old institution can safely be torn down?

Those who have written of early English, Scottish, Irish, or Scandinavian history have usually done so from the loyal point of view of the single country. In "The First Twelve Centuries of British Story" (Longmans), Mr. J. W. Jeudwine aims to write "a clear and readable story" of the relations and development of all these four peoples as a whole, so far as they were active in the British Isles between 56 B. C. and 1154 A. D. His aim is a good one, and he has read fairly widely by way of preparation for his writing. He has, however, an aversion to monastic chronicles as being narrow-minded and local. Though a barrister and member of Lincoln's Inn, he also shows a curious lack of interest in many of the more important sources for constitutional law and in such secondary authorities as Stubbs, Maitland, and Vinogradoff. Instead, he has drawn largely and effectively for picturesque material from the too-much neglected Scandinavian sagas and Irish stories. His recognition of the widely scattered Scandinavian raids and influences in the British Isles is the most distinctive, and the best part of his book. By reproducing three mediæval maps and by inserting a score of sketch maps of his own, he shows that he understands the importance of geography in the study of history. He properly tries to draw his material as much as possible at first hand direct from the sources, and evidences much independence of judgment. But his story is not systematic nor well rounded, and many of his explanations and suggestions are more ingenious than convincing. Nevertheless, both his point of view and his narrative are simple, clear, and interesting.

We have not the advantage of knowing anything of L. Penning, who has written the "Life and Times of Calvin," or the Rev. B. S. Berrington, B.A., who has translated the book from the Dutch; but the name of the publishers (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.) is a household word, which may generally be accepted as a guarantee of value for the book they send out. They have, in fact, given to this volume the only value it possesses, namely, excellent paper and handsome type. It seems simply incredible that such fatuous stuff as this could ever have passed even the first barrier of the readers who filter the turbid streams of manuscripts that flow into the publisher's office. The author seems to have modelled his style upon a rather low type of "penny thrillers," and the translator ably seconds his endeavor. There is not a gleam of scholarly purpose. The only books referred to are a few of the more available biographies. There is no bibliography and, naturally, no index. On the other hand, there are too many illustrations, some taken from familiar portraits, but others, apparently, from dramatic compositions of the cheapest sort —in the one representing Luther burning the papal bull the centre of the background shows the elector of Saxony! It would be idle to attempt specific criticism where all is beneath the level of critical comment. One has only to open the book anywhere to find one's self moved to unseemly hilarity rather than to respectful attention.

The new Oxford edition of Newman's "Apologia," edited by Wilfrid Ward, is unique in one respect and very valuable. It is well known that when Newman reprinted the work in 1865 he omitted the first part, containing the crushing retort upon Kingsley, and otherwise altered the work so as to relieve it of its ephemeral character. He was wise. The book as it has since always been reprinted is a better piece of literature without the directly and personally controversial parts. But the discarded parts have their value also as specimens of keen argument and deadly invective. By skilful editorial arrangement the present edition offers both the full original text of 1864 and the revision of 1865. The preliminary documents, leading to the controversy, are also given; and the editor in his Introduction relates the history of the event.

We may record two recent monographs which will be of interest to students of English. One belongs to the Wiener Beiträge, and is a study, by Julius Wirl, of "Orpheus in der Englischen Literatur." The other is a doctoral dissertation from the University of Virginia, and is a valuable summary of "The Relations of Latin and English as Living Languages in England During the Age of Milton," by Weldon T. Myers. This is an interesting thesis, and introduces questions of literary importance.

The spice of variety at least is not wanting in "The Confessions of a Tenderfoot" (Holt), by Ralph Stock. According to the author's story he set out from his home in England a dozen years ago to find his place in the world and made his first effort as a Canadian cowboy. Here, through many vicissitudes, due partly to youthful inexperience and partly to the unavoidable chances of the game, he learned that "life is a see-saw and one cannot always be at the upper end." His distance from the upper end during his Canadian experiences reached the point, on one occasion, of "beating his way" penniless from Maple Creek to Medicine Hat, sixty miles, by clinging to the rods on the under side of a passenger coach. Drifting on westward, he tried his fortune as a saw-mill hand and as a waiter in a hotel at Fernie, and next as an itinerant photographer, in combination with a tramp piano tuner, who told him: "Between you and me and the gate-post, I'm no great shakes at the game, but down 'ere they only know 'ow ter play 'ims and the like, wot uses the middle of the keyboard, so I just chunes the middle register and lets the rest rip. It suits them and it suits me, so wot's the odds so long as we're both 'appy?" This soon grew irksome, as did life in a Vancouver lumber-camp, which followed it. He then went to San Francisco, where he was quickly relieved of most of his ready money through trusting to the man who knew which horses to bet on at the races. "The San Francisco confidence man, through long and unhampered practice, has reduced his methods to a fine art." Honolulu and the Fijis furnished the next lecture-rooms in his School of Experience, and at length he reached Sydney, by dint of serving as a steward from Auckland, where the last of his money had deserted him. After trying through grim necessity the outdoor sleeping habit now so popular, he finally stumbled into a really lucrative job with a Sydney newspaper, contributing illustrated articles based on his Canadian photographs. This soon wore out, however, and after a disastrous effort at strawberry growing in Queensland, he at last fell into the niche for which the Fates had brought him through so many buffetings by land and sea and is now a contented pineapple grower with every prospect of continued prosperity and happiness. It is a very interesting tale, happily too unvarnished to tempt any other young man to find his place in the world by the same method.

The Proceedings of the Bostonian Society contains in addition to the annual reports of the directors and different committees the eloquent tributes to Mrs. Julia Ward Howe on the presentation of her portrait to the Society. One of the speakers, ex-Gov. John D. Long, said, "Refinement, grave eloquence, the poet's inspiration, the woman's charm were hers and she was a high priestess of humanity and of patriotism. Her 'Battle Hymn of the Republic' will stir its youth to loyalty and to patriotism as long as the Republic endures." An account of the great Boston fire of 1872, by Mr. H. Murdock, is also given.

The death of Henri Quatre and the resulting regency of Marie de Medici brought a reversal of French foreign policy. France and Spain, which had been so continually at war, became allies, and the alliance was cemented in 1615 by the marriage of two fifteen-year-old children, Louis XIII and Anne of Spain—called Anne "of Austria," because she was of Hapsburg blood, and to the French people of that day Hapsburg and Austria were names synonymous and equally hateful. The youthful royal pair were soon estranged by Louis's unappreciativeness and suspiciousness and by Anne's pride and too great familiarity with the Duke of Buckingham. For twenty-three years they were childless. Even the birth of the Dauphin in 1638, the later Louis XIV, and of a second son, who was the ancestor of Louis Philippe and the Orleanist line, did not make happy the relations between Louis XIII and his Spanish spouse. This whole story is told at considerable length by Martha Walker Freer in "The Married Life of Anne of Austria" (Brentano's). She rests her account chiefly upon well-known contemporary memoirs, and of these she has made good use. But she does not appear to have gathered any new material from archives, nor does she show an acquaintance with some of the best recent works in this field. Her subject matter is somewhat broader than her title might seem to suggest. For it comprises an account of the intrigues of Marie de Medici and of Richelieu's numerous enemies and of the great Cardinal's masterly way of finally triumphing over all those that plotted against him in secret. It gives the innumerable petty details of a long unhappy situation which Louis XIII himself summed up in one of his petulant outbursts: "My wife is barren, and she hates me; my mother wishes to dethrone me; my brother desires to put my crown on his head; my chief nobles dislike me—they betray me and rebel against my power. Except for M. le Cardinal I perhaps should not long keep my throne!"

The eighth volume of the Annales de la Société Jean-Jacques Rousseau (Genève: A. Jullien) is devoted, as befits the volume of the bicentenary, to general survey articles. G. Lanson contributes the leading article on the "Unity of Rousseau's Thought." M. Lanson attempts to explain away the contradiction that other students have found between Rousseau's conception of man in a state of nature, ("Discours de l'Inégalité," etc.) and man in society ("Le Contrat Social"). Man, says Rousseau, naturally good, is corrupted by society. How then from these corrupt units are we going to get the ideally disinterested volonté générale of the "Contrat Social"? The youth, M. Lauson replies, who is reared according to the principles of the "Emile," will be fit to become a member of Rousseau's ideal commonwealth. This solution is opposed to what Rousseau himself says at the beginning of the "Emile": You must choose between forming the social man or the man of nature—there is no middle ground—and what he proposes to form is not l'homme de l'homme, but l'homme de la nature.

The contradiction that others find in Rousseau's thought M. Lanson discovers in his character. In his theories Rousseau is a wild revolutionary dreamer, but timid and circumspect in the last degree in everything that relates to practice. His genius, however, appears only in the stormy orchestration of the sentiments of revolt; and so, though "he understands the application of his most audacious doctrines in a way to reassure conservatives and satisfy opportunists, the work, for its part, detaches itself from the author, lives its independent life, acts by its intrinsic properties; loaded with revolutionary explosives, neutralizing the moderate and conciliatory elements Rousseau has put into it for his own satisfaction, it exasperates, inspires to revolt, inflames enthusiasms, and irritates hatreds; it is the mother of violence, the foe of compromise; it launches simple spirits, who give themselves up to its strange virtues, upon the desperate pursuit of the absolute, an absolute to be realized to-day by anarchy and to-morrow by socialistic despotism."

The influence of Rousseau on the eighteenth century is studied by D. Mornet. M. Mornet is one of the new type of scholars at the Sorbonne, who shows prodigious industry as an investigator, but whose power to handle ideas does not always equal his zeal in collecting facts. The most interesting facts that M. Mornet brings out tend to show that the taste for wild nature in the eighteenth century developed independently of the influence of Rousseau. M. Mornet would have us believe that the Jacobins were followers of Rousseau only in about the same sense that they were followers of the "sans-culotte Jésus." In asserting that "between their acts and the most certain convictions of Rousseau there are only accidental coincidences," M. Mornet reveals an inability, not merely to handle ideas, but to deal with facts. Few facts are more certain, for example, than that the passage in the "Contrat Social" on civil religion as interpreted by Robespierre sent many persons to the guillotine.

The articles on Rousseau in the nineteenth century by Harald Höffding and on Rousseau's influence on German philosophy by I. Benrubi are convenient summaries of material already familiar to students of Rousseau. Both writers are very Rousseauistic in their own point of view. New material, on the other hand, will be found in the paper on Rousseau in Switzerland by G. de Reynold. In an interesting article on Rousseau in England in the nineteenth century Edmund Gosse contends that the sudden collapse of Rousseau's prestige in England in the early years of the nineteenth century was due in large measure to the Evangelical movement. After the great romanticists, Byron, Shelley, Hazlitt, etc., the only English writers of the nineteenth century to receive an important impulse from Rousseau were Ruskin and George Eliot. Paul Seippel, in a paper on the "Religious Personality of J. J. Rousseau," cites a passage from Le Semeur (the chief organ of the Genevan Calvinists), exalting Rousseau as the true precursor of the modern point of view in religion. This would seem to indicate that not merely Calvinism, but Christianity in any traditional sense of the word, is in a fair way to disappear from Geneva. The volume closes with an important study of the Favre manuscript of the "Emile," and with the usual reviews and bibliography.

John Swett, one of the founders of the California public-school system, died last Friday on his ranch at Martinez, Cal. He was born at Pittsfield, N. H., July 31, 1830, and was graduated from the Merrimack Normal Institute, Reeds Ferry, N. Y., in 1851. He received the honorary degree of A.M. from the College of California and from Dartmouth in 1866. He was editor-in-chief of the California State Educational Journal, 1864-68. Among the books published by Mr. Swett were "History of the Public-School System of California" and "Methods of Teaching."

Olivier-Emile Ollivier, the French statesman, who died at Annecy, August 20, was in his eighty-ninth year, having been born in Marseilles in 1825. He became a member of the Paris bar in 1847, commissary-general of the republic at Marseilles in 1848, and in 1857 a député. At the time of the Franco-German War he was Prime Minister. His published works include: "Démocratie et liberté," "19 janvier," "L'Eglise et l'Etat au Concile du Vatican," "1789-1889," "Michel-Ange," "L'Empire libéral" (13 volumes), and "Marie-Magdeleine."

Science

The Childhood of Animals. By P. Chalmers Mitchell. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.50 net.

This volume at once recalls "The Infancy of Animals," by Pycraft, published almost in the same month. In appealing to the popular taste Dr. Mitchell has the advantage of having originally prepared much of his data in the form of a series of lectures to children. As published here they are rewritten and augmented, and yet they retain something of a naïve presentation which is particularly pleasing. Even so, the book is rather difficult reading, owing to the vast number of facts included, many of them necessarily accompanied with but little or no discussion. A good method for a book of this character would be to give in the text a few very striking, salient supporting facts, and to add in footnotes or appendix the scores of corroborating facts of more or less similar character.

The sequence of treatment is logical, the chapters having the following heads: Childhood and Youth; Metamorphoses; Duration of Youth; Color and Pattern; Brood-care; Food; The Taming of Young Animals; The Purpose of Youth and Education. The general ground covered is thus much the same as in Pycraft's book, but the psychology of the two men is so different, their points of view and facts so unlike, that the volumes are rather supplementary than conflicting.

Young animals are divided into three great classes: first, creatures like many single-celled animals which have no youth; secondly, animals whose young more or less resemble their parents, and thirdly, where the young are wholly unlike the adults, as caterpillars and butterflies. The second class, including the backboned animals, forms the subject of the volume. As Pycraft emphasized the class of birds, so Dr. Mitchell treats more in detail of the mammals, and has assembled a large number of keenly interesting and significant facts. His comparisons of the human child with monkeys and lower animals is noteworthy. A single paragraph will illustrate the novel point of view which is one of the charms of the book:

> There is also a rough correspondence between the duration of youth and the size of the creatures in the man-monkey group. A full-grown male gorilla, it is true, is larger, although not taller, than a finely built man, but the human race as a whole consists of larger and finer animals than the anthropoid apes, while these in their turn exceed the baboons, which exceed the ordinary monkeys of India and Africa, and so on down to the tiny marmosets. It is tempting to suppose that it must take longer to grow into a big animal than into a little animal. This also is true only when nearly related creatures are compared. Mere increase of bulk tells us little. A mushroom grows much more quickly than a daisy, a gooseberry and a huge vegetable marrow take nearly the same time to swell out. A human child takes nearly two hundred days to double its weight at birth, while new-born mice quadruple their weight in twenty-four hours.

And in the final summary of this important subject, one reads, "We must draw the conclusion that the rate of growth in animals has been altered in the course of evolution, and in such a fashion as to prolong youth in the higher forms. This lengthening of youth is not completely explained by increase of size, nor even by increased complexity of structure. Its advantage is that it gives the opportunity for education in the widest sense of the word, a space for experiment and for the replacing of instinct by intelligence."

The treatment of color and pattern occupies about one-fifth of the text. All the well-known theories are presented, but a half-hearted acceptance of some of the most extreme detracts from this discussion. It is, to say the least, confusing and disheartening to the lay reader to have his interest aroused in theory after theory and then to read, "Patterns that we think conspicuous, and brilliant colors that we have tried to explain as warning or advertising, or for purposes of recognition, or as nuptial plumage, may really be for protective or aggressive concealment." The subjects of basic interest are Brood-care, Food, and the Purpose of Youth, while the Taming of Young Animals carries the most popular appeal. The story of the hyrax, of monkeys, and other mammals is well told, and there is a scientific explanation of why the cat prefers to "walk alone."

The illustrations are unusual. Those in the text of pencil are faint but diagnostic, while those in color are both artistic and very accurate, and as striking as any which have been published for a long time.

An English translation of Gustav Eiffel's work, "The Resistance of the Air and Aviation," translated by James C. Hunsaker, and Vol. II, part iv, of Charles Sprague Sargent's "Trees and Shrubs," will be issued by the Houghton Mifflin Company shortly.

Dr. Edwin Ellen Goldmann, professor of surgery in the University of Freiburg in Baden, has died at the age of fifty. His books deal chiefly with diphtheria, tuberculosis, and malignant growths.

Drama and Music

A DEMOCRATIC ART.

If Tolstoy were alive to-day, it is not unlikely that he would find in the "movies" a close approximation to his ideal of art. A direct and universal appeal to the elementary emotions—that was the standard which Tolstoy held up in opposition to the exaggerations, the aberrations, and the obscurities of the Shakespeares, the Goethes, and the Richard Wagners. The Russian's ultimate test of a work of art was its appeal to the untutored but unspoiled peasant. The cinematograph meets this test completely. The Russian mujik is under the spell of the films. India's millions are deserting the story-tellers and the jugglers of the bazaar for the moving-picture shows. China, Peru, and Washington Heights have succumbed to the photo-play. All nations, all ages, all classes, both sexes—it is inconceivable how art can be more popular than that.

But the moving-picture show is something more than popular. It is intimate. To an extraordinary extent it is entering into the daily thought of the masses. The good men and women who are fond of writing on literature and life, who are devoting themselves to the task of bringing the drama into touch with the life of the people, must be amazed, and slightly chagrined, at the intensity with which the film-play has seized upon the popular imagination. The crowds not only throng to the shows; they talk about them, on street corners, in the cars, and over the hoods of baby carriages. From time to time there have been plays in the regular theatre which have become the theme of general discussion. There have been players whom the public has made its favorites. But the theatre as an institution has hardly impressed itself upon the popular mind in this country. A show was either good or bad, and there it ended with the ordinary theatre-goer. The technique of the theatre was a subject for professionals and "highbrows." But the crowd discusses the technique of the moving-picture theatre with as much interest as literary salons in Paris or London discuss the minutiæ of the higher drama. The crowd knows how the films are made, and what it costs to make them, and who the leading actors in the show are. The producers of these shows have achieved an extraordinary triumph. They have converted their entire audience into first-nighters.

The interest of the masses in the moving-picture show is even more personal than that. They are not only spectators and critics, but to a very considerable extent they are the authors. Everybody is writing moving-picture scenarios. In part it may have been a real dearth of ideas which induced the film-producers to appeal for contributions to the nation at large. In part it may be excellent business to inoculate the audiences, not excluding children of the grammar grades, with the virus of authorship. The regular theatre draws a not inconsiderable part of its revenue from "students" of the drama who go to the theatre in order to learn how to write plays. The number of those thus directly interested in the moving-picture plays must be enormous. In a very real sense the photo-play then becomes a truly popular art. The operatic composer will strive to give reality—and popularity—to his music by incorporating folk-themes into his score. To the extent that the music of the masses enters into the finished product the composer's art is a popular art. The moving-picture showman goes much further than the composer can go by throwing upon the screen the very ideas supplied him by the crowd in the seats.

It is not a very high art, this art of the photo-play as created for the masses and largely by them. The authors on the benches reveal the common predilection of the popular taste for the lurid and the fantastic. But in this the moving-picture show merely takes the place of the old-fashioned melodrama. And it has the added advantage of realism. The setting of the photo-play is incomparably more real than anything even a Belasco can give us. It reproduces action in real deserts, on real oceans, in real forests. The heroine walks out of a very actual cottage, down actual steps, and takes a perfectly authentic trolley car to a real department store. The audience knows that these things and the trees, rocks, bridges, boats, and guns are absolutely true to life, because it has often seen the man with the camera at work. To watch one of these exhibitions is like seeing an animated popular magazine without the labor of turning the pages. And like the picture magazine it requires no thought and little attention.

Whereas in New York last season (as always) Wagner was considerably ahead of Puccini, in London, during the season ended last month, these two favorites came out with equal honors. The opera which was heard most frequently, however, was "Tosca," which was sung eight times. Verdi received scant honor, though this is his centenary year. Apart from "Aïda," which was sung seven times, there were only two performances of "Traviata" and one of "Rigoletto." There were two novelties, Camussè's "Du Barry" and Waltershausen's "Oberst Chabert," which were given twice.

"An indefinable something that left a decidedly unpleasant flavor, something artistically almost gangrenous," characterized, according to the London Telegraph, all the new ballets introduced last season by the Russian dancers, among them Debussy's "Jeux," Florent Schmitt's "La Tragédie de Salomé," and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Compared with their colleagues in London, the musical critics of New York and other American cities are fortunate, since their season extends over only seven months, after which they can loaf, travel, or change their employment, whereas the London critic has only a few weeks to rest his tired ears. As summed up by Mr. Kalisch, the London season, including the important Promenade Concerts, lasts about forty-nine weeks out of the fifty-two. For at least forty weeks there are seven working days in the week, and for nine months there are concerts in the afternoon as well as in the evening, not to speak of operas. "The worst is that the greatest rush comes at the end, just when music-lovers and music-makers everywhere else begin to rest, and when everybody is beginning to feel that the end would be welcome; and it is inevitable, because that is the time when there are the largest number of strangers in London."

Italy is no longer the world's chief source of new operas. In Germany last season the enormous number of 265 operatic novelties were staged, and the great majority of them were home-made. Of these 265 operas, two hundred and sixty-five, or thereabouts, seem to have been failures. It is interesting to note that the leading musical associations of Germany have issued a public appeal to parents and educators to dissuade young people from entering the musical profession, because the average income of musicians is less than that of common laborers.

Theodore Spiering, who was concertmas-ter of the New York Philharmonic for some years and conducted a number of concerts during the illness of Gustav Mahler, is now in Berlin, where his latest duty is the conducting of the People's Free Stage. This society has 50,000 members, who provide the funds for twenty-five free concerts and plays during the season.

One of the most interesting features of the MacDowell Festival in Peterboro, N. H., this week, is the performance of MacDowell's "Indian Suite" in the pine forest, which is said to have acoustic qualities unequalled by any out-of-doors auditorium. The seating capacity of this place is about 1,200; it has a fine view of Mt. Monadnock for a background.

Michael Maybrick, English musical composer, who, under the name of "Stephen Adams," wrote many popular songs, is dead at the age of sixty-nine. He was a native of Liverpool, but had lived for many years in the Isle of Wight, where he devoted himself to municipal politics, serving five times as Mayor of Ryde. Some of his best-known songs are "The Holy City," "The Star of Bethlehem," "Nancy Lee," "A Warrior Bold," "The Blue Alsatian Mountains," and "The Midshipmite."

WATTS AND HIS ART.—II.

II.

Rossetti once in a rare moment of affluence hired a hansom and took young Burne-Jones to Little Holland House to see a painter who "paints a queer sort of pictures about God and creation." The casual phrase still pretty well describes the attitude of the ordinary person towards Watts's symbolistic compositions. Our immediate concern is to ask why Watts quit history for his symbols. In the first place, his historical compositions had been very much a by-product of successful competitions. The pictures represented opportunities which chanced never to recur. Then it is likely that he may already have had misgivings as to the validity of the genre. In his later years he used to insist that the only truthful historical art was portraiture. As early as 1848 he entertained the scheme of forming a gallery of portraits of his great contemporaries—a purpose inflexibly maintained for more than fifty years. Aside from this new and absorbing emprise the turn-over into symbolism seems to me a natural expression of a soul profoundly religious yet discontented with outworn forms of Christian mythology. Watts's task was to ascertain the essential ideals of a holy life, and to find human forms that might fitly impersonate these ideals. In the first quest, he often admitted himself, he invented nothing, for Love and Death, and Life and Hope, and Greed and Time, and Hate and Valor, are always present to every thinking soul. In the second quest, that of finding human symbols for these great forces, he had the guidance of Pheidias and Titian, and, of course, many accepted types lay ready in classical and Biblical legend; but the achievement of fitting the residual faith of his age with appropriate symbols must count among the supreme efforts of creative imagination. For there is nothing cold about the mythology of Watts. His heroic forms are the very antipodes of those sleek transcriptions from the model which grace so many public halls in France and America. They are warm with life, portentous with meaning. It is easy to hate them, and a certain kind of realist or impressionist is probably bound to hate them. It is easy to mock at them, but impossible to forget them. They are as personal as a vision of Giorgione or Blake, and no artist ever needed less a signature. The double process of framing a kind of theology and inventing its symbols is, so far as I know, unique in the history of art. Blake, no doubt, is the nearest parallel, and to him was denied the discipline of monumentality.

Whether my explanation of Watts's symbolistic trend convinces or not, at least the stages of the development may quite accurately be traced. In 1848, the year of revolutions, he planned a comprehensive scheme of decoration to be called The House of Life—a project so significant of his way of thinking that we must linger over it. Very interesting is the constant mixture of history and symbolism, and especially significant the way in which forces, ideals, and abstractions assume human form. This is the true mythological temper. Watts's memorandum runs:

> The ceiling to be covered with the uniform blue of space, on which should be painted the Sun, the Earth, and the Moon, as it is by their several revolutions and dependence upon each other that we have a distinct notion of and are able to measure and estimate the magnitude of Time. The progress of Time and its consequent effect I would illustrate for the purpose of conveying a moral lesson—the design of Time and Oblivion would be exactly in its place. To complete the design, the Earth should be attended by two figures symbolic of the antagonistic forces, Attraction and Repulsion. I would then give, perhaps, upon one-half of the ceiling, which might be divided with a gold band on which the Zodiac might be painted, a nearer view of Earth, and by a number of gigantic figures stretched out at full length to represent a range of mountains, typifying the rocky structure or skeleton. These I would make very grand and impressive, in order to emphasize the insignificance of man. The most important (to us) of the constellations should shine out of the deep ultramarine firmament. Silence and mighty repose should be stamped upon the character and disposition of the giants, and revolving centuries and cycles should glide, personified by female figures of great beauty, beneath the crags upon which the mighty forms should lie, to indicate (as compared with the effect upon man and his works) the non-effect of time upon them.
> Then I would begin with man himself, trace him through his moral and political life; first the hunter stage. . . . Next the pastoral state. . . . This is the Golden Age, the age of poetry. . . . There would be a great chance of exquisite subjects to illustrate this epoch, and here might be introduced the episode of Job.
> Next should be man—the tyrant—the insidious oppressor—the slave, a dweller in cities—the Egyptians raise the pyramids, etc.

Here the manuscript becomes discontinuous, but there seems to have been intended a pageant of the progress of civilization, through the ages, to the preaching of Peter the Hermit. All along would have been depicted, with the mythology of each people, those heroes whom he regarded as most instrumental in the spiritual advancement of the race. Watts later remarked that "with certain material advantages, which would have caused me by their nature to weld my thoughts into a regular form, I think my efforts might have been given place as an epic." The observation shows a curious lack of understanding of what an epic is. Yet I think the mood skeptical will in a fair-minded person yield to the conviction that, given the "material advantages," Watts would have produced, not the epic, but a decorative sequence which might fully have realized his ambition "to do for modern thought what Michelangelo did for theological thought."

One's confidence in his power to execute so grandiose a scheme must rest upon the great fresco of Justice which he executed between 1852 and 1859 for the Chapel of Lincoln's Inn. Many interruptions, including an archæological trip through the Greek Islands to the site of the Mausoleum, delayed the work. In the swift and nervous transfer of his designs to the wet plaster he found the chanting of the choristers an inspiration and solace. Always he loved to parallel his art with music, endeavored himself to master the violin, even dreamt occasionally of composing solemn anthems. The Justice, with its half-circle of great lawgivers, is, everything considered, the finest true fresco executed since the Renaissance. It grows, as such compositions inevitably must, out of Raphael's Disputa and School of Athens, but it has fuller and more satisfactory color. Unlike these hemicycle compositions as a class, it is warm and appealing, without pose or frigidity. Like Raphael's philosophers, these famous justiciaries move in a larger air than ours, yet keep their credibility and retain our sympathy. In monumentality and repose it seems to me to excel the best decoration of Delacroix, while it leaves the best of Puvis looking a little bleak and bloodless. The great fresco for Lincoln's Inn was done, at the painter's suggestion, for the costs, but the benchers insisted on adding a handsome testimonial. Watts characteristically declared his most accomplished and consistent work to be a failure, but in his later years he valued it, and its successful cleaning and preservation from London soot just before he died was a source of great satisfaction to him. It was his single venture in that mixed form which we may call pedantically typological design, it suggests what the House of Life might have been in its historic portions, and it serves as the transition from history to pure symbolism.

To the sixties belong the designs of the Court of Death; Time, Death, and Judgment; The Genius of Greek Poetry, Ariadne in Naxos, Daphne, and Pygmalion. The still more famous compositions, Love and Death, Love and Life, and Hope, belong to the seventies. And in the next decade, as he passed three score and ten, an epic of Genesis, comprising the three Eves and the story of Cain, was partly executed, being a fragmentary episode of the House of Life. The last twenty years of his life were largely devoted to revising and perfecting the old designs, to increasing the gallery of great contemporaries, and to finishing his portrait statue of Tennyson for Lincoln, and the plaster model of the colossal horseman typifying Physical Energy. Only such general landmarks may be noted, since years often elapsed between the tracing of a composition on the canvas and its completion. The older he grew the closer became his dual allegiance to portraiture and pure symbolism, so that if one had to represent his maturity by two pictures, one might well choose the second Hope of 1885, sounding her broken harp among azure depths, and the magnificent Walter Crane of 1891.

III.

> Critics usually fail because they do not regard art and literature from the same point of view, and as occupying the same level, seldom taking into account what the artist has to say, but only how he has said it. When a literary production is offered to the world, the first thing to be considered is, whether from a literary or historical or religious or scientific point of view it has any reason for existing at all, and after that its merits as a literary production. Until something of the kind is applied to art the critic can hardly be of service to the artist.

Accepting as I do this definition of the critic's function, our chief concern is to weigh the value of the kind of thought and feeling in which Watts chose to live. But before raising this crucial matter certain technical questions may properly be faced. For if it be true that what counts is the greatness of the artist's soul, it is also true that his means of expression must be adequate. If those critics are right who assert that Watts's handling is hesitant and bad, his design extravagant, his color lurid and inharmonious, why, then, whatever the seriousness of his inspiration, he remains a painter of minor order. His devotees must undergo the reproach of insensitiveness to fine painting as such, and his considerable vogue among the intellectuels of to-day may be reckoned a kind of sentimentalism.

As a matter of fact, I believe Watts was one of the few notable technicians of our day, in the sense of having a distinctive personal message of an important kind and of working out an individual and appropriate rhetoric. Men who pass as great modern technicians, for example, Whistler and Manet, have frequently been mainly dexterous and have left pictures that are already perishing. On the basal points of design Watts habitually practiced the syncopated forms of representation which were proper to his heroic subjects and scale, and which for that matter he found in the Parthenon marbles and Titian. But Cézanne or Degas himself was not more scrupulous in indicating the essential differences between hard and soft, stiff and flexible. There is no uncertainty as to the movement, mass, and bony structure of a Watts figure. If he waived the modern fanatical emphasis of mass, it was because his purpose was decorative and moral, and not fully pictorial. In the easy and impressive adjustment of heroic forms within a rhythmical design he revived convincingly the grand manner of the High Renaissance. Certain summary indications of landscape in him are unique in art. His color has distinctive and beautiful traits. Certain blues seem the very sign of immensity; certain reds, of the perils that beset the soul, besides glowing intrinsically with the force of sapphire and carbuncle. And these effects of color in the major chord Watts obtained by setting dry color alongside of dry color without varnishing, glazing, or other hazardous and perishable manipulation. Nobody commanded the colors as he did. The Hope is as lovely an arrangement in blue as Cazin or Whistler ever conceived, with the advantage of its meaning to boot. I can think of no picture that rivals it on its own ground except another equally famous subject-picture and equally precious in tone, Winslow Homer's Eight Bells.

In Watts's portraiture the infinity of little touches have been objected to. But each stroke makes for vitality and character and luminousness. Set a good Watts portrait beside a good Bonnat, and it will be easy to see which has been done to death by painstaking, which enriched. In fact, the general disposition to see in Watts a feeble executant represents a common misunderstanding as to what fine technique in painting really is. The modern eye sets undue store by what it calls tone, meaning only the muted harmonies of color; and confuses fine brushwork with mere dexterity. Now, of dexterity, Watts had, as he confessed himself, very little and increasingly less. In his later years he rarely could compass the suavity and directness of the sketch of Lady Somers and the portrait of Mrs. Wyndham. It was his belief that no solemn emotion could be expressed by the swift and nervous handling so much in vogue. His method was consciously slow and deliberate, but assured and progressive. Where he failed, as it seems to me he did in the more florid Eve, in the urchin called Whence-Whither? and in the more cadaverous and seer-like of the Tennyson portraits, the fault was in conception and not in execution. I can see that an eye trained to modern naturalistic color will resent a coloration that is conventional, decorative, and often symbolic, but I cannot conceive of anybody, who has fairly grasped and accepted the intention of the portraits and compositions, wishing them other than they are. And as to lack of dexterity, imagine our requiring it of a poet, setting him down as an incompetent because he lacks the swoop of the trained journalist. Yet some such exaction we do lay upon the painter, forgetting that dexterity, an excellent capacity in itself, is proper only to him whose subject matter lends itself to swift choice, understanding, and execution. No, Watts was not dexterous, but in the resolute attack upon the fundamental problems of form and color, and in a solution personal, meaningful, and instinct with a peculiar solemn beauty, Watts may surely be ranked with the very few great technicians of his century.

IV.

By his own standards this would be doubtful praise. He held that only expression counted, and that methods of expression which obtrude themselves are bad. And, in fact, any fair estimate of Watts's art implies, as I have said, a criticism of his entire stock of ideals. He represents a kind of mysticism, which, while alien to the ordinary man of his day, was characteristic of the finest spirits of the Victorian age. James Drummond, the evangelist; Tennyson, Matthew Arnold, Gladstone, Browning, George Eliot, Frederic Harrison, Ruskin, and less markedly Carlyle, illustrate various phases of a common tendency to identify religion with serious contemplation of social ethics. Most of these thinkers set a minimum value on cult and dogma and ecclesiastical tradition, proceeding to a kind of reconstruction of values in the light of social duty. This was the mood of Watts, and on more than one occasion he spoke of his works as "ethical reflections." Such a life constitutes a sort of via media between self-sufficing faith in authority and the prevalent materialism. About the only religious discovery of the Victorian age was this middle course. The alternative seemed, perhaps falsely, to be sheer materialism, the orthodox scientific attitude. For the materialist life is a curious chemistry, of which thought is a mechanical product and death the mere clogging. Sin and virtue are implied in physical reactions running back indefinitely through a widening group of ancestors. Hence, conscience is largely a morbid excess of memory. Love is simply a tardy product of sexual differentiation. Justice is what has on the whole proved tolerable and convenient in restraining the individual for the common weal. Soul is the capacity for maintaining the bodily chemistry, and is virtually uniform from the amœba to Shakespeare. So, axiomatically, materialism explains the issues of life and death, and where it admits mystery it counsels indifference, since nothing has value for life which is not clearly knowable. Such is the orthodox scientific attitude with which the Victorian age had to cope, and it is fair to add that on such a basis a fine stoicism is possible.

But indifference, the mediæval sin of accidia, was the most impossible vice for a true Victorian to acquire, and with few exceptions the finest spirits revolted vehemently against the simple materialistic formula for "seeing life as it is." Some, with Cardinal Newman, reacted into obscurantism, more worked out the middle road of which Tennyson and Browning are the poets and Watts is the artist champion. To hold to the essentials of Christianity while divesting it of outworn mythology was the task. Or rather to substitute for the old a new, human, and valid mythology, based upon the most general ideas. A poet indeed could stop short of the mythological stage. Great words and ideas suffice him. A painter must see his ideas in clear vision or keep them out of his art.

Watts saw them in exalted human form, and his gift was to be very clear in his generalities. It is significant that as convinced a Christian as he almost never treated a Biblical theme, and then only such as are most unspecific and broadly typical—Eve, Cain, the Good Samaritan. It was as if he would not compromise his faith by linking it with disputable matter of fact, nor cheapen sacred legend itself by a merely imaginative adherence. With regard to classical mythology, where symbolic values were overt and no issue of fact implied, he pursued a freer course. But his chief concern was to ascertain the elemental human values of his time, and to create therefor an appropriate mythology less vulnerable than the old. He conceived man as projected between the mysteries of Life and Death and sustained in his perilous transit by that summation of the virtues, Love, fortified, too, by the remembrance of such as have greatly loved and endeavored. So far his moral dynamic was that of his age. Where the great artist in him came out was in the imperious need of giving visible and human form to these simple elements of a spiritually contemplative life. Nowhere did he show himself more the artist than in his life-long dissent from the literalism of his friend Ruskin, and his vindication of the right of the soul to shadow forth its finest intimations by its own light. So he became a myth-maker—enduing with our own flesh the forces and ideals with which we must live—but of myths Platonically simple and defensible. In his embodiments he sought the aid of those artists who have envisaged mankind with the most candid and hopeful eyes—Pheidias and Giorgione and Titian. Perhaps his chief significance is to have linked a peculiarly modern way of thinking with the noblest traditional forms of sculpture and painting. In energy of creation he was among the greatest artists of his century. Delacroix at times excels him, but is febrile and of shifting viewpoint. Against Watts's energy of invention, a true furia for all its sweet reasonableness, the lovely retrospective idyllism of Burne-Jones and Puvis assumes a pallor of irreality. Rossetti's mediævalism looks flimsy, Besnard's amazing and genial pyrotechnics merely theatrical. The men who best bear the comparison with him are those of wholly alien genius: masters of shorthand like Manet and Courbet and Winslow Homer, scornful stylists like Whistler and Degas, strenuous devotees of mass such as Cézanne. In creative accomplishment and valid relationship to the great art of old none seems to stand so well beside him as Millet, who, refining his actual observations into types, seems to represent a more normal exercise of the artistic spirit. More normal, possibly, only when viewed by our modern standards, for the way of Watts was very much that of the Greeks and the great Italians.

I have written vainly if any one confuses the eminently creative methods of Watts with the arid theological symbolism of the Middle Ages which it superficially recalls, or yet with the cheap symbolism of current decoration—the exuberant front of the Paris model as Plenty, her muscular back as Industry. This is merely a survival of the early eighteenth-century fashion of capitalizing all personified abstractions. From the model Watts made the most scrupulous studies, but when his great canvases were in progress no model was present. He was a true visionary, but of the mind's eye.

A kind of abstract vitality his compositions and portraits should always retain. His gift of embodying the finest essence of the individual soul and the bare elements of moral thinking should retain permanent value. His gallery of portraits alone will give permanency and dignity to what otherwise would pass chiefly for a shopkeeping and ironmongering age. The representative and Victorian value of his symbolic designs may well fluctuate, as men think well or ill of the Victorian via media. His art is not likely to confront a more materialistic age than that through which it won in his life-time. Some more delicate moral adjustment, however, than his own and his friend Tennyson's the future may well have in store. Yet even so, his mood was so elemental and warm that life should persist in it, so simple that it should readily adjust itself to other modes of thinking. While his concrete qualities of noble line and mass and splendid color and reflective handling are so eminent that they should ever appeal to the enlightened dilettante, if, indeed, the future is to keep a place for a type of detached enthusiasm of which Watts himself thoroughly disapproved.

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Excavations were continued at Corfu during the last season by Prof. W. Dörpfeld with important results. Previously only ruins of historic times had been found, dating no further back than the fifth or sixth century B. C.; but this year's excavations in the northwest corner of the island and on the southern side of Cape Kephali have resulted in discoveries going back to the Stone Age. They include several stone hand mills in which the corn was ground into flour in a cavity in a stone block by means of heavy stone balls, some of which have also been found. Toothed flint blades have also been brought to light, as well as hand-made pottery of the pre-Mycenæan period. Of the Mycenæan period there have so far been found only a few fragments, not as yet sufficient to justify the assumption that they are those of the town of the Homeric King Alcinous. Of great interest, however, is the existence in the sea at some distance from Cape Kephali of a rock resembling a sailing ship, which is still known as Karavi, "the vessel." This rock is mentioned by the ancient geographers, Strabo and Ptolemy, as Ulysses's vessel turned to stone.

Excavations on the site of the Etruscan town of Vejum, near Rome, have revealed the existence of five temples, a theatre, a circus, and many dwelling houses. Vases, arms, and jewels have been found in considerable numbers, and these objects are to be housed in a museum, which it is intended to build on the site of the town for this purpose.

The Italian Archæological Mission headed by Professor Halbherr has recently made some interesting discoveries in Crete. A temple to Egyptian divinities was unearthed at Cortina, with a dedication on one of the architraves by Flavia Philyra, who had the building erected. In a cell were found statues of Jupiter, Serapis, Isis, and Mercury; also fragments of a colossal statue of a woman, and a bust of a woman which is thought to be that of the foundress of the temple. On the south of the building was discovered a little flight of steps leading down to a subterranean pool, where religious ceremonies of purification used to be celebrated; on the side of this staircase are two niches for small statues. The mission also found in the interior of the island a large number of hitherto unpublished epigraphic texts.

The discovery of a large ossuary near the port of Talamone, in the province of Grosseto, has been announced. The discovery is on the scene of the Battle of Talamon, fought in the year 225 B. C., during the invasion of Italy by the Gauls, when the invading hordes, as recorded by Polybius, were defeated by the Romans under the consuls Papus and Regulus. The ruins of a Temple of Thanksgiving, erected by the Romans in memory of this victory, were unearthed in 1892, and further important discoveries are expected as a result of the present excavations.

The death, at sixty-three, is announced of the French painter, Aimé-Nicolas Morot. He studied under Cabanel, and in 1873 won the Prix de Rome with his painting, La Charge des Cuirassiers à Reichshoffen, now in the Luxembourg. He decorated the ceiling of the Hôtel de Ville with a series of frescoes representing French dances at various periods of history. His portrait of Paul Deschanel was hung at the last salon. Other paintings by Aimé Morot are portraits of the Prince d'Arenberg, of Mme. Aimée Morot et sa Fille, and of the painter, Ernest Hébert.

Finance

THE RELAXING FINANCIAL STRAIN ABROAD.

During the past six months, possibly the most troublesome fact in the financial situation has been the strained condition of the European money markets and of the great European banks. This, as every one now knows, was a consequence, first, of the prodigious demands on credit, through the quite unprecedented mass of new security issues; next, of the further requisitions on bank resources, due to the Balkan War, and finally, of the depletion of Europe's bank reserves through hoarding of cash by the European people, in their fear of a general war.

For many months, these great foreign institutions have been striving to build up their reserves from outside sources, while at the same time holding down home demands on credit. The American market was drawn upon for gold, to the amount (wholly unprecedented for the first seven months of any year) of $43,000,000. This went mostly to the Bank of France, to offset the French people's hoarding. The Bank of England drew gold from the Transvaal; the Imperial Bank of Germany drew from England, from Holland, and later from the scattered reserves of Germany itself. At length, a few weeks ago, the South American markets gave up $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 gold, which went to London, Paris, and Berlin.

The outcome is somewhat remarkable. Last Thursday the Bank of England reported £42,297,000 gold in its reserve, an increase of £1,385,000 from a year ago, of £15,250,000 since the beginning of July, and the largest holding, with the exception only of a single week in 1911 and one in 1910, of any week in seventeen years. The only period in history when the Bank of England has for any consecutive period held an equal or greater stock of gold was the period from September 18, 1895, to September 9, 1896.

The other European banks have a similar story to report, and the European money and stock markets have at length begun to take full account of it. Just how much this new order of things will affect the general position of affairs, it is not wholly easy to determine, but the expected strain on the autumn money markets has been little talked about, since the rise in these bank resources. Confronted, first, with the building-up of the German Reichsbank's gold reserve to by far the highest figure in its history; then with the rise in the Bank of England's gold supply to a level not approached at this date in any of the past sixteen years, and at length with the addition of $11,000,000 gold to the French Bank's holdings in two weeks—even the skeptical and incredulous European financial communities have now been driven to admit that the situation on the eve of autumn has been radically altered.

It is quite true that much of this new gold has been obtained from South American markets, which surrendered it reluctantly, and which may find themselves embarrassed at the loss of it. The greater part of what Germany has obtained has been got through substituting small notes of the Reichsbank for the coin which the German people formerly carried in their pockets—a substitution which may obstruct the ready redemption of such note circulation. But, on the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that the problem of the European banks and money markets, for many months, has been how to get back from its hiding-places the mass of gold and silver locked up by the Continental public during the period of political alarm.

This hoarded cash has seemed to return very slowly to the bank reserves and to general circulation, even when peace in Europe was assured. There was no such sudden outpour, from the old stockings, and the chimney corners, and the safe deposit vaults, as occurred in this country at the end of 1907. But of that it should be remarked that even in the United States the "currency premium" did not disappear, or the hoarded cash come out, until the public at large had visible evidence that our banks were rapidly building up reserves to normal, with gold drawn from other countries.

It was the sight of these new reserves, and the inference that the American banks would soon be indifferent to the hiding away of cash by frightened individuals, which inspired those individuals all at once to give up their hoards. It has taken longer for the European banks to achieve this end in the present money-hoarding episode, but they have now achieved it. The inference drawn by Europe may be judged from this week's Lombard Street prediction, that the present Bank of England rate—which, though very high for midsummer, would be relatively low for an autumn market—will be raised no higher during 1913.

"The Most Profoundly Interesting Novel of the Times"

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP

By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Richard Carvel," "The Crossing," "The Crisis," "Coniston," "Mr. Crewe's Career," "A Modern Chronicle," etc.

What Leading Reviewers say:

IN LONDON

"Abounds in thoughtful delineation of character, presents certain salient aspects of city life with fidelity and restraint, while the interwoven love story offers, in its refined and spiritual intensity, a refreshing contrast to much that is overheated in the fiction of the day."
The Times (London).

IN BOSTON

"Bigger and broader than anything Mr. Churchill has yet written . . . this novel is destined to be of importance among thinking people . . . worth reading for its pure English, for the enjoyment of a story well told, for what it teaches, and a careless world might do well to learn what it teaches."—Boston Globe.

IN SAN FRANCISCO

"A fine piece of work, palpitating with conviction . . . It is 'Robert Elsemere' from a new angle, written with the virility that we have learned to associate with Mr. Churchill."—The Argonaut.

IN NEW YORK

"Those who are interested in present-day currents of thought will read this book with profound interest and will be thankful that Mr. Churchill was moved to write it. . . . The stage setting and the actors are typical of American present-day civilization."—The New York Times.

IN CHICAGO

"Indubitably its author's greatest achievement . . . eager sincerity lends it conviction . . . strength, simplicity, true greatness . . . excellence of construction. It is not often that a novelist can at once induce thought and challenge and disarm controversy."
Chicago Record-Herald.

IN PHILADELPHIA

"One of the most thoughtful, best conceived books of Mr. Churchill's career . . . a keenly analytical presentation of American social problems . . . of absorbing interest as a record of contemporary thought . . . a purposeful book."—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

HOADLEY'S ESSENTIALS OF PHYSICS

By GEORGE A. HOADLEY, C.E., Sc.D., Professor of Physics, Swarthmore College.

Price, $1.25

This is the author's popular and successful Elements of Physics, enriched and brought up to date. It tells only what everyone should know, and it does this in a straightforward, concise and interesting manner. It takes into consideration the character of high school needs and conditions, and, throughout, lays particular emphasis upon the intimate relation between physics and everyday life. The text, wherever possible, has been simplified, more than fifty topics having been amplified, expanded, or reworded. More familiar illustrations of the topics treated are given. There have been added a number of new topics, mostly in connection with the recent advances in applied science. The number both of questions and problems has been greatly increased and the data in these all relate to actual, practical, physical phenomena. More than one-fifth of the illustrations in the book are new, many of the pictures of apparatus having been redrawn to show modern forms.

Life and Correspondence of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke

By PHILIP C. YORKE, M. A. Oxon.

This Life includes an account of the great judge's work in the King's Bench and in Chancery, and sums up the history of the Georgian period from 1720 to 1764. The characters and careers of Walpole, Newcastle, Henry Pelham, the elder Pitt, Henry Fox, the Duke of Cumberland, George II and George III, and various incidents—such as the fall of Walpole, the Byng catastrophe, and the struggle between George III and the Whigs—appear in a clearer light, by aid of original papers and manuscripts now published, or brought together and annotated, for the first time.

The Week

It was to have been expected that the income tax rate fixed originally by the Democratic caucus would not stand very long. Every such tax starts with a low percentage, and is then increased at the earliest opportunity, on some ground or other. We had not thought, however, that so radical a change would come before the bill had even become a law, as is now contemplated as a result of the revolt of radical Democrats. The Nation does not often find itself in agreement with Senator Lodge, but it must heartily endorse the position he took in the debate. The bill exempts from all burden the great middle class; it discriminates against people of wealth whether that wealth has been acquired by industry, as a result of a Congress-granted privilege, or in some other way creditable or discreditable. It exempts from taxation the great body of our citizens who ought to share their fair proportion of the tax, if only for the sobering effect it would have upon them to realize that the Federal Government does not get its money out of the air, but from their pockets, and that, therefore, it should expend the money wisely and economically.

The House resolution authorizing an investigation of charges against Judge Speer, following so closely as it does the Archbald investigation and trial, is all the evidence the ordinary citizen will need to show him that the Constitution is not utterly powerless in the face of suspected or actual delinquency in our courts. Impeachment is not a weapon which may be seized by a handful of dissatisfied men, but it has a finality, and what is more important, a dignified and judicial method of procedure, about it, that advocates of the recall might well sigh for in their rude substitute for it. Indeed, it is the unjust judge who would naturally prefer the revolutionary device proposed by the Progressives. To be put off the bench by popular vote would not be pleasant, but the victim could very frequently solace himself and confuse many of the open-minded by pointing to the nature of the campaign which would almost inevitably precede such a vote. The upright judge, on the other hand, who had offended, not the popular sense of judicial propriety, but a popular interest or prejudice, would be greatly handicapped in employing the very arguments upon which his case would rest most solidly.

Mr. Morgenthau's nomination as Ambassador to Turkey, long foreshadowed, insures for that post an incumbent of unusual ability, a clear-headed business man, who ought to repeat at Constantinople the successes of Oscar Straus. To do as well in every respect would rank Mr. Morgenthau one of the ablest Ambassadors the country has ever had. At least, in Turkey, the halcyon days of Mr. Straus's two periods of service are still gratefully remembered by Americans, while most of the other Ministers are forgotten. We do not know whether Mr. W. W. Rockhill, the present Ambassador, leaves the service voluntarily or not. He has spent virtually all his life in the State Department, or in China, Russia, and Turkey, and Mr. Wilson ought not to let him go out of the service if it can be avoided. Apparently, however, the President is going to make a clean sweep—something that is most regrettable, particularly in one who was so long devoted to the principles of civil service reform.

The interest of next Monday's election in the Third Maine District will lie as much in its indication of the permanent consequences of the Progressive secession as in its reflection of public sentiment upon the tariff and currency bills. Last year the district had no Progressive candidate for Congress, but Forrest Goodwin, a Republican elected by a vote of 17,221, over 16,512 for S. W. Gould, Democrat, ran ahead of Col. Roosevelt by only 4,000 votes. The present election will show how many of these 13,000 Progressive voters can be held in line in a local contest, into which the personality of their national leader does not enter. The Maine papers find it difficult to regard the three-cornered fight as turning upon approval or disapproval of Democratic policies. Victor Murdock, however, tells the voters "there is no national hope in the partisan habit, a mechanical see-saw from one party to the other." The anxious dispatch of Democratic Cabinet officers and House leaders to the scene also reflects the sempiternal interest in Congressional elections that follow tariff legislation. The district was Republican before 1910 by consistent majorities of 3,500.

While municipal home rule makes steady progress in second and third-class cities, its way in the larger centres seems beset with obstacles. At the Governors' Conference last week Gov. Dunne, in the words of the Chicago papers, "lamely excused" the Illinois Legislature's failure to pass a home-rule measure for the State metropolis. How little better off is New York, the attack by the Bureau of Municipal Research upon the laws recently passed at Albany would seem to show. Its report gains especial force from its concrete examples—nearly one hundred in all—of legislation violative of home-rule principles, fifty-three of these examples being of mandatory and forty-two of permissive laws. Attorney-General Carmody has already pointed out that "as a whole the present law undertakes only to fill out imperfect grants of powers to cities by the Legislature," and leaves the city impotent in many directions. There is no want of models for an adequate home-rule measure for either New York or Chicago. A dozen States have granted their cities power to determine the form of their own municipal machinery and their local policies, usually limited, as in Ohio, upon only the financial side. In California, where local autonomy of this sort has long been an established constitutional policy, it was extended in 1911 even to county government.

For several weeks recently a negro was railway mail clerk on a train between Norfolk and Raleigh, N. C. Under him was a white subordinate. Was this a condition that a free people would long endure? Not on the line of railway between Norfolk and Raleigh, N. C. The Congressman from the Raleigh district was asked to investigate and bring about a change. Mr. Small did investigate. He found that the outrage was one of those perversions of the merit system which make it unpopular here and there. The Civil Service Commission, that is, had actually conducted an examination for railway mail clerk on the line between Norfolk and Raleigh, N. C., without asking any questions about color of skin, eyes, or hair. The questions were such as any capable person could answer, no matter what his race. And, as it happened, a negro had answered them better than some white men. If it had not been for the examination, the negro would have had no chance at the superior position. The examination was, therefore, evidently faulty. Congressman Small, we read, "assured the Civil Service authorities at Washington that the people in his district and on this line of the Norfolk Southern would not stand for a negro being placed in charge of a mail car with white clerks as helpers." The Commission saw the point, and an order has now been issued from the railway division headquarters making the negro the "helper."

As usual in things Shakespearean, the Germans have assumed the lead in the matter of the tercentenary of the poet's death in 1916; while the English are endeavoring to build a National Theatre, the Shakespeare Society in Germany is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary and discussing plans for a memorial performance of the plays. The suggestion of Die Woche, that operas founded on Shakespeare should also be presented, is calculated not merely to honor Shakespeare, but to gratify German pride. In a list of productions that covers several pages a scant half-dozen are English, by such old-world composers as Busby, Purcell, and Bishop; and two of these are attempts to extract a "Rule, Britannia" theme from "The Tempest." Italian composers began to avail themselves of the plays with Gasparini's "Hamlet" in 1705, and their work includes scores of titles, among them Bellini, Rossi, Verdi, and Rossini. The French are represented by Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Ambroise Thomas, and others; the German Nicolai's "Merry Wives" is more widely popular than the comedy itself.

It is always satisfying to see merit recognized, and what group of persons should be more eager to hail it than representatives of a university? If a lad graduating from a secondary school leads his class in the final Latin examination, is there anything wrong in various universities doing all they can to impress him with their respective advantages? Shrewd persistence in such a course would in time redound to the great increase of the fame of a university for turning out men of rare scholarship. So it is one reads with pleasure that Brown has scored a triumph in the announcement of a Springfield, Mass., boy that he is going to Providence this fall. For a time Dartmouth seemed to be upon the point of winning him, but the classic atmosphere of the Rhode Island university prevailed. Drew, for that is his name, is the fastest amateur short-distance runner in the whole world. He is expected to be a thorn in the side of the sprinters from the University of Pennsylvania next year, who were thought to be sure of winning the short-distance races. Of course, one sprinter does not settle the question of relative scholarship among the universities. That must remain in doubt until we know where the champion broad-jumper and pole-vaulter are going to pursue their advanced studies.

How sensitive public opinion has become towards sex-instruction, urged by Dr. Eliot at the Congress of School Hygiene, is shown by the protests against it in Cincinnati and Chicago. Those who feel the sincerity and force in all that Dr. Eliot said will be first to demand caution in carrying out his principles. In the first place, great as public opposition often is to the utilization of the school for the physical welfare of society, it is especially exposed to prejudice and hostility on this point. In the second, while sex-education in the right hands may do great good, in wrong hands it can accomplish a greater amount of harm. What seems chiefly demanded is that its administration be given over to a competent and tactful medical corps. While the public schools as yet offer no grounds for observation, every one in college and preparatory-school circles is acquainted with results of sporadic, ill-digested lectures from semi-religious sources which are at least of debatable value. It is true that fatal ignorance in vital matters cannot be left to chance correction. It is true, in Mrs. Ella Flagg Young's words, that the school can acknowledge no parental "rights" inimical to social progress. But it is equally true that one shudders to think of sex-instruction in the hands of the ordinary school teacher and under the control of a Mrs. Young.

That the problem of enforcing local-option laws is increasingly national is shown by recent attempts in Pennsylvania and throughout the South to prevent illegal liquor shipments. In Indiana, by the formation of "Young Men's Independent Clubs" in nominally "dry" territory, the brewery interests seek to get round the law. Crawfordsville is making a hot campaign against "clubs whose rules permit the sale of liquor to members only—any one being a member who has the money." Strict city ordinances and a good detective have convicted seven such club managers within a few weeks. Other cities, such as Evansville, where the press laments a jury disagreement over the plainest evidence, are preparing to imitate Crawfordsville. Gov. Ralston has repeatedly told the communities that in dealing with local-option enforcement "they must be their own moral agents, without appealing to State help." Of course, enforcement of the law is impossible without positive public opinion. But in the case of fraudulent "clubs" it would seem that officers of the law have a plain duty to perform.

The emphasis of the World's Medical Congress upon not only the wide extent of war against disease, but its coöperative character, is already receiving practical comment. The French Journal de Philanthropie points out how much even of administrative method in combating the chief evil, tuberculosis, is international. To the Germans, for example, the sanatorium long represented the sole means of defence. Lately, however, the German Central Association has borrowed a leaf from the book that Calmette and Waldeck-Rousseau began to write at Lille in 1901, and has centred its attention upon the dispensary. The secretary already reports four of these in Berlin, and 720 in all Germany. At first passive, they are now active agencies, and inspect homes, lay down rules of hygiene, and help the public to follow them. Assisted by workingmen's societies, the Association has given especial attention to "forest dispensaries," of which in 1911 there were 98, receiving 3,000 patients yearly. These stations are located near the larger cities, and with the smallest possible plant they receive the ailing daily, care for them in the open air, and send them home at night. Two suggestions used are ascribed to America—the plan of receiving at these forest dispensaries night patients, busy in the daytime, and the open-air schools.

Our large cities may find profit in the recommendations of a Parliamentary committee on "London's gigantic problem." This is the connection between the vast development of the motor-'bus there and the increase in risk to public life and limb. In 1907 the 3,700 power and 12,700 horse vehicles injured about 12,000 people; in 1912 the 13,800 power and 2,800 horse vehicles ran down more than 20,000. This weighs gravely against the service of the omnibus in carrying two billion passengers and linking the city to its outermost suburbs. But, as in Paris, which also is protesting against the daily list of écrasés, neither speed nor weight is singled out as responsible. "With its great increase in size, power, and speed," says the report, "the motor-'bus must lose its privileges of irresponsibility. It cannot be let choose its pathway unrestrained." Nothing more. And the omnibus company declares "speed has the smallest possible share in the causing of accidents, and has been talked of until the public are impatient." The reduction of the number of motor-'buses to the necessary minimum, the perfection of safety devices, and the education of the public as to the exact course of the routes, are suggestions which the company endorses. All these tend to give the motor-'bus lines the same status as surface street-car systems, and to restrict or destroy the old liberty of movement of the individual vehicle.

President Wilson may or may not succeed in his Mexican policy, but one thing is certain, the English newspapers are not entitled to sneer at him for failure. Some of them are now complacently saying that we see what comes of entrusting diplomacy to "amateurs." Well, for the past two years England has had her finest professional diplomat at work in the Balkans, and a fine mess he has made of it. A simple enumeration of the successive positions taken by Sir Edward Grey, with a list of his unfulfilled prophecies and frustrated efforts, ought to make his countrymen see that gibes at anybody else are just now delicious effrontery. There was to be no Balkan war. But there was. If there was a war, no territorial changes whatever would be permitted. But Turkey in Europe has been carved to pieces. When Turkey pressed back into Adrianople she was instantly to be turned out. But the latest number of Punch has a cartoon in which the Turk in Adrianople asks Sir Edward Grey who is going to put him out, and the great English diplomatist replies that this is exactly the thing which the Concert cannot make up its mind about. An American "amateur" could not do worse than that!

Two things stand out clearly in the report on rent and prices, just published by the English Board of Trade, the most comprehensive and thorough of recent studies of the cost-of-living problem. One is that the rise in prices, as has been recognized before this, is a world-wide phenomenon. The other is that, certainly in so far as Great Britain is concerned, and holding true probably for other countries, wages have not kept pace with prices. In Great Britain the increase in the cost of living since 1905 has been 10 per cent., whereas the increase in wages has been from 2 to 5 per cent. Here is a simple explanation of the labor unrest which has marked recent years on both sides of the Atlantic. In Syndicalism we are probably not witnessing, as its prophets would have us believe, a new philosophy and tactics of social reconstruction. Under a new name and through somewhat novel methods, the old process of readjusting wages to prices is at work. There is no real reason to suppose that the foundations of society are in greater peril to-day than in preceding periods of economic readjustment.

Anglo-German relations will suffer no harm from the disclosures contained in Count Hayashi's diary regarding the diplomatic history of the alliance between Great Britain and Japan. The alliance dates from 1902. When the idea of an agreement between the two Powers on affairs in Asia was first broached by the Japanese Ambassador, it was Lord Salisbury who suggested the inclusion of Germany. The Japanese Government, for reasons not yet made public, objected. This bit of news will be rather embarrassing to the jingo element in Germany, by whom England's policy during the last two decades has been described as one of implacable hostility to the Empire. British statesmen supposedly lay awake nights thinking out all the possible permutations and combinations by which the Kaiser might be isolated and encompassed. Yet here was the head of the British Government and the leader of the party that had always stood for Imperialism and a forward policy in foreign affairs, urging the inclusion of Germany in a partnership which, as events showed, was destined to exercise an extraordinary influence on the history of the last ten years. And Lord Salisbury's proposal came at a time when the Boer War was still under way and the Kaiser's telegram to Krüger was a very vivid and bitter memory.

How different the present international situation in Europe might have been if Lord Salisbury's proposals had been accepted! In 1902, it will be recalled, the famous entente cordiale was not yet in being. The Anglo-French agreement came two years later, and even then it required the stress and agitation of the long controversy between France and Germany over Morocco to convert the Anglo-French marriage of convenience into an alliance of the heart. Ten years ago the advocates of a reconciliation with Germany were much more influential in French public life than they are to-day. If Great Britain had entered into partnership with Germany, even if it was only for the regulation of affairs in Asia, the present entente would have been rendered difficult, if not impossible, and France, because there was no one else to turn to, might have consented to enter into an understanding with the Kaiser. There might have ensued an era of international good feeling; or, if England, regretting, in turn, any close approach between the opponents of 1870, had set about to redress the balance, we should have had a European alignment almost the opposite of what it is to-day, and come much nearer to a reduction of armaments.

PROGRESS WITH THE BANKING BILL.

With the vote of the House Democratic caucus, approving the banking and currency bill as amended to date, the third stage in the history of that important measure is completed. The first stage comprised the original drafting of the bill for submission to Congress. In that process, many hands were at work, and by no means with harmonious plans or purposes. Among those whose handiwork was recognizable in the original bill were conservative men who had made thorough and useful study of the subject; radicals who were eager to inject as much of inflation and Government paper issues as circumstances would admit; and theorists who wished to try all sorts of venturesome experiments at once. In its original form, the banking bill, despite many fundamental and incidental merits, was a highly defective measure, containing unquestionably dangerous possibilities, on the side of currency issues in particular.

The spirit in which these defects were taken in hand, when the second stage of the measure's history began with its reference to the House Banking Committee, is familiar to all who have observed the progress of events. The changes made were radical and fundamental; in many of the sections they transformed a bad measure with incidental merits into a genuinely good measure with incidental defects. Except for its misleading and inaccurate language in regard to the Government's part in what is to be purely a bank-note currency, the note-issue sections were amended into a scientifically sound and practical provision. The holdings of United States bonds, pledged by national banks against their present outstanding circulation, were protected, as they had not been in the original bill. Powers of the national board, in certain important directions, were restricted, partly through requiring unanimity of decision, partly through the formation of an Advisory Council chosen by the banks themselves.

During its third stage, now completed, in which the House Committee's amended bill was placed for debate before the Democratic caucus, further progress of an equally significant character has been made. Discussion being free and unrestrained, the radicals, the hot-heads, and the inflationists had their day in court. They offered and urged amendment after amendment embodying their ideas. On the other hand, the banking community made its first formal entry into the discussion through the debates and resolutions of the Chicago bankers' conference, on Friday and Saturday of last week.

What has happened in the caucus is that the changes urged excitedly by the radicals have been steadily voted down by large majorities—the one concession which they claim, the elimination of a clause which might be construed as forbidding rediscount of agricultural warehouse paper, being in fact an ineffective alteration—while two of the amendments urged by the bankers' conference have been adopted. Reserve requirements for individual banks have been reduced as the bankers at Chicago asked, and, again in deference to their suggestion, the reserve against the proposed new note issue is now prescribed to consist of gold alone, and not of "gold or lawful money."

After this rather striking attitude on amendments, the measure was adopted in the caucus by a vote of 160 to 9. Within a week the bill as thus approved goes formally to the House of Representatives, whence, after debate and vote, it will be handed over to the Senate Committee and the Senate. It is not yet free from serious defects, and it is wholly reasonable to expect that its remaining shortcomings will be a matter of serious consideration in the other house. We believe it, however, to be a thoroughly workable bill as it now stands, or at least to be a bill which may be made so by a few further changes which will not affect vitally its underlying principles.

Here, then, in the future stages of the discussion on the bill, is the legitimate opportunity for broad-minded bankers and business men of the country to serve a public purpose. The delegates who voted for the series of resolutions at last week's Chicago Conference were perfectly well aware that all of their recommendations would not, in the nature of things, be accepted. But they wisely separated criticisms on general principles from criticisms based on technical experience. Their final attitude was of a sort to invite the friendly discussion which was peremptorily necessary, between the legislators and the bankers, if snags and pitfalls in the practical operation of the bill were to be avoided. The more consistently this policy is pursued, the less of an obstructive influence will arise from that vague suspicion of the bankers' motives which prevailed very largely up to last week, and for whose prevalence the bankers themselves were by no means wholly free from blame.

The rest of the discussion of the bill must, in our judgment, centre to a great extent upon the powers of the national board. Those powers, as they stand in the bill to-day, and notwithstanding the House committee amendments, are too sweeping and unrestricted. We should so describe them, even if the four civilian appointees to the board were all, by law, to be trained bankers. That the system of separate regional banks requires large powers in a central board, for exercise in a possible emergency, we have heard no one question. But ours is, in more ways than one, a government of checks and balances, and the powers referred to are of a sort whose misuse, even with the best of purposes, would have immediate and serious consequences on the country's welfare. It is not abolition of such powers, but restriction on their hasty, ill-judged, or impetuous exercise, which our national experience indicates as essential to the safety of the new experiment.

FIRST CLASS IN SENATORIAL LOGIC

One advantage of the linked sweetness long drawn out of the Senate debate on the tariff has been strangely overlooked by educators. It is the splendid exhibition of the logical faculty in the give and take of discussion. It is a pity that every student in logic could not have been in the Senate galleries to derive instruction from the continued display of the deepest principles of the art. Few have availed themselves of the great opportunity, since the event came off in the time of school and college vacations; but we wonder why no summer school or university extension grasped at the opportunity. To stand by and see giant minds grappling with one another and illustrating every phase of the art of reasoning would have been an invaluable privilege to any who desired to learn how to think clearly and argue soundly.

Something of the effect, though only a pale reflection, can be got from a perusal of the Congressional Record. In it we get the cold results without the personal animation, the flashing eye, and the triumphant mien with which some logical demonstration was accompanied. Not to neglect entirely the alluring material, let us turn to the debate of Monday of last week. The cotton schedule was under discussion. Senator Smith, of South Carolina, took the floor and read from a careful report on the New England mills, showing the low wages and the long hours of the operatives. This was only preliminary to the real clash of mind on mind. Senator Lippitt, of Rhode Island, begged permission to ask a question. It was granted. He said:

> I merely wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if the wage paid in his State for this same occupation is not in the neighborhood of one-third less than that paid in New England, and if the hours the people work in his State are not more than 10 per cent. greater for that wage, and if it is not true that there is practically no age limit for the children employed in the cotton mills in his State.

This was clearly a neat case of the argumentum ad hominem. But was the South Carolina Senator staggered by it? Did he betray even a glimmering of the ignoratio elenchi? Not at all. Observe the completely logical and crushing reply which he instantly made:

> I will reply to the Senator from Rhode Island that those we employ in my section of the country are native born, and whatever they get goes back to an American for the work an American does, and we have not used the pauper labor of Europe to displace him.

Have the standard writers on logic ever given such an illustration as this of the effect of close and sinewy reasoning? We should like to see them try to get Senator Smith's syllogism into any of their formal categories! It would not even come under barbara, though that word suggests certain analogies in the case. As for the great native reasoners, like Socrates, they would certainly be lost in wonder at the dexterity and logical resource of Senator Smith. Of his overwhelming retort upon his questioner, Socrates could only say, as he did on a certain occasion: "Great, oh, Glaucon, is the power of contradiction."

It certainly required a degree of audacity in Senator Lippitt to return to the intellectual combat after so heavy a logical blow, but he took his courage in both hands and put another question to Senator Smith. He said:

> I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he thinks native-born Americans should be paid 33 per cent. less wages than New England is willing to pay the people who come from abroad. New England pays her native-born Americans more than she pays these people from abroad; and yet the Senator from South Carolina is boasting that in his own State, for more hours of employment, he is satisfied to pay 66 2-3 per cent. of the wages New England pays.

There appears to be a certain plausibility about this, but Senator Lippitt did not know his man. He could scarcely have been prepared for the terrific logical "facer" which the South Carolina Senator at once delivered. It was this:

> When we take into consideration the number of millionaires there are in the New England section and the number of millionaires we have in our section, I do not think the Senator and I will find much to argue about.

There was a good deal more of this, but we have given enough to show what a treat for the logician, and the lovers of high debate, may be got by dipping almost anywhere into the Congressional Record. It really ought to displace the text-books on logic. Not one of them could furnish so much instruction. And it is teaching which is blended with the element of constant surprise, and even amusement, which is the best thing to hold the attention of the pupil. Why should there be expensive schools to teach young men how to reason when the Senate is giving such wonderful examples virtually free? Schopenhauer had an entire cynical treatise on "The Art of Reasoning," which he dealt with as a thing of trick and artifice, rather than a real intellectual process; but the most whimsical rules that he gave for dodging the point of an argument, or evading the consequences of your own logic, along with the most fanciful examples which he invented, would seem plodding and prosaic alongside the Senatorial reality. "Logic is logic, that's all I say." Yes; but there are more things in Senate logic than were dreamed of in the philosophy of the one-hoss shay.

SEQUELS OF LABOR LEGISLATION.

The past fifteen or twenty years have seen a great body of labor legislation, proposed or enacted, in all civilized countries. The United States has not been so laggard as some have asserted. In nearly all the States, as by the Federal Congress, new laws have been put on the statute-books intended to secure the rights or to improve the lot of workingmen. Into this movement different motives have entered, but there can be no doubt that its chief driving power has been the humane spirit of the age. This it is which has been sympathetic to the demand that the laborer in dangerous occupations shall be safeguarded, as far as possible; that child labor shall be more and more limited; that special protections shall be thrown about workingwomen; that workers disabled by accident shall have full right of recovery of damages from negligent employers, or be insured for loss of time or health. It is not necessary to extend the catalogue. The kind of legislation referred to is familiar to all. It responds to the growing humanity of the age. But it is our duty to be intelligent as well as humane; to look ahead at consequences as well as about us at misfortune and suffering. And labor legislation has now been long enough in force in various places to give us material upon which to base a judgment concerning some sequels of it that its benevolent promoters were very far from foreseeing.

An article in the last Edinburgh Review on "National Insurance and National Character" is said to have been written by that stout individualist among English public men, Mr. Harold Cox. Whoever the author, it is an instructive study which he makes of some of the unexpected results, physical, mental, and moral, of laws insuring workingmen against accidents and against sickness. He turns at once to the country which has had the widest experience in such matters—Germany. The subject has attracted a great deal of attention from German physicians and students. A recent suggestive book is that of Prof. Ludwig Bernhard, "Unerwünschte Folgen der Deutschen Sozialpolitik." "The tragedy of all great reform movements," writes Professor Bernhard, "lies in this—that the unintended results are more powerful than the intended results." And in the spirit of this saying, the Edinburgh Review writer masses a part of the evidence which German investigators have been getting together about the effect of workingmen's insurance laws in Germany. Already in England, where legislation of the kind has but lately been embarked upon, much is heard about sim-

In the main, it is an old story. Paternal legislation tends to make its beneficiaries childishly dependent, where they are not increasingly exigent. But some of the special results observable on a large scale in Germany are peculiarly interesting. It is not merely the general question of individual self-respect being impaired and initiative cut into by looking to the aid of Government. There are specific developments which are giving thoughtful Germans pause. Malingering has enormously increased; and the authorities have to be increasingly watchful against it. If a workingman knows that his pay is to go on while he is ill, he falls sick with wonderful ease. Nor is it all a matter of feigning. Every doctor knows the part played by the imagination in disease, and it has been displayed in extraordinary ways in the experience of insured German workingmen while they are ill. The facts show that they fall sick quicker and stay sick longer than before the law protected them. In certain forms of illness, the psychology of this is well understood. The determination to recover speedily is a help to recovery, and without it, or the motive for it, the patient stays longer in bed. Even in cases of fractured bones, where this mental element would not be expected to operate so strongly, the German experience makes a remarkable showing. Take the common accident of a broken collar-bone. In the young, medical statistics prove that the period of mending is from 15 to 20 days; in older persons, 20 to 40. But the average insured German workingman who breaks his collar-bone requires eight months to get over it!

We will not dwell upon other details set forth in the Edinburgh Review. Its article but reflects the concern which German statesmen feel over these aspects of the practical working of laws which were undoubtedly beneficent in intention. Various studies of the operation of the German laws for the insurance of workingmen show what good reason there is for doubt of their entire success, and what is the need of amendment and strengthening. There is something in Voltaire about the light-hearted way in which men pass laws, and the astonishment with which they observe how these laws work in practice. This has been distinctly the case with the matter under discussion. Disappointments and unforeseen results are, indeed, no argument against attempting humane legislation; but they are a clear warning against rash lawmaking. The utmost care should be taken in the drafting of labor legislation, so as to make it as sure as is humanly possible that evils will not be created greater than those which it is designed to cure.

ANGLO-SAXONDOM AND WORLD-PEACE.

The main trend of Lord Haldane's address before the American Bar Association at Montreal was determined in advance by the nature of the occasion. When the Lord Chancellor of England comes across the seas to speak in Canada before a gathering of lawyers, of whom a very large proportion are from the United States, it is inevitable that his subject should concern itself with the affiliations that bind this country, Great Britain, and the Dominion into what may be described as a community of nations. Speaking before lawyers, Lord Haldane was at pains to point out that the causes of Anglo-Saxon amity are independent of treaty arrangements. The Lord Chancellor is a student of philosophy and he went to the vocabulary of the German philosophers for a word that would adequately describe that spirit of amity. But when we have followed the speaker through his eloquent and lucid disquisition upon Sittlichkeit, we find ourselves, after all, in the presence of a familiar thing. He is referring neither to legal systems nor to specific morals, but to those habitual sanctions which determine the conduct of men in a community, the way of reacting towards the duties of civilized citizenship, the way, in short, of looking at life. And he finds that in this country, in Great Britain, and in Canada there prevails a common Sittlichkeit, a similarity of social conduct, which is the principal basis of Anglo-Saxon friendship, and which may become the foundation of still more intimate relations in the future. It is a scholarly way of formulating the idea embodied in such familiar phrases as "hands across the sea" and "common inheritance."

Emphasis laid on Anglo-Saxon friendship as a factor in the establishment of the ideal of world-peace is desirable only to a certain point. The danger of expatiating on Anglo-Saxon unity consists in the fact that it may serve as an irritant upon the world at large. There are nations which may be inclined to regard a union of the English-speaking races as a union, not for something, but against somebody; not for the encouragement of the ideas of peace, but for the imposition of peace on those outside the Anglo-Saxon community. In specific instances we have seen how the proposal of a treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain has been received, even by citizens of this country, as a menace to Germany. The Kaiser's people have been trained to envisage a unity of Germanic races no less ambitious, and we may reasonably suppose no less inspired by high motives, than the unity of the Anglo-Saxons. In Eastern and Southeastern Europe Slavdom has its own aspirations. The political evolution of the Old World will be shaped for many years to come by the rivalry of the English, the Germans, and the Slavs. The question arises whether this country, by making itself a member of an Anglo-Saxon "unison," does not to that extent make itself a party to the great rivalry of races.

There is no need to lay stress upon a community of Sittlichkeit in the Anglo-Saxon world as an argument for peace between Great Britain and the United States. We may concede that our American way of looking at life is closer to the English way than it is to any other, though such a statement never fails to bring out arguments regarding the enormous infusion of non-Saxon blood and brain into our people. Conceding that we have a community of thought and habits and language with the English people which makes war between the two nations an inconceivable thing, it is still true that war between this nation and any other of the leading Powers of Europe is almost equally inconceivable. Does any statesman really foresee the chance of our engaging in hostilities with the German Empire, or with Russia, or with France? There was, of course, that flurry over German designs in the Philippines at the time of our war with Spain. But, then, there was something more than a flurry with Great Britain over Venezuela. No; we must still maintain that conflict between this country and any European nation is rendered impossible by other than ethnological or sociological causes. The old arguments still hold. Situated here on the Western Continent, at a remote distance from the age-old rivalries that make of Europe an armed camp, these United States are as unlikely to be the armed enemies of one European country as of any other.

If war is to make way for reason in the settlement of international disputes, it will not be because the world will be transformed into a single community with only one code of manners. World-peace, if it comes, will come with the triumph of those universal ideas which are above all national habits and manners, the ideas of justice, of reason, and of law. We can have world-peace with world diversity. For diversity is no more an essential force for armed conflict than uniformity is an unfailing factor for peace. Where, for instance, could Lord Haldane find a closer identity of Sittlichkeit than that obtaining in the two Balkan peoples that have lately been tearing at one another's throats like mad dogs? Bulgaria and Servia are two peasant populations living on the same economic level, speaking what is virtually two dialects of the same language, acknowledging the same faith, and held in subjection for centuries by the same master at Constantinople. What but the survival of primeval brute instincts is responsible for the horrors of Macedonia and Thrace? The same way of looking at life will not keep two nations at peace if both look at life with distorted vision.

IS THERE A "PUBLIC"?

One thing is quite certain: we are living in a highly significant age. The only question is whether this is the age of Strindberg and Brieux or of Hall Caine and Harold Bell Wright; the age of Matisse and Picasso or of Dingbat and Desperate Desmond; the age which insists on ruthless details of life in the white-slave markets or the age which insists that its heroes of fiction must be six feet six inches and more; the age of Debussy and Anna Pavlova or the age of the Temagami Rag. One thing is certain: the Public is eager for something. The question is whether the public wants the red meat of John Masefield, the cosmopolitan fare of Arnold Bennett and H. G. Wells and Theodore Dreiser, the plain home cooking of Winston Churchill, or the sugar and cream confections of Eleanor Hallowell Abbott and Gene Stratton-Porter. Or, after all, is nothing certain? Are we at liberty to doubt whether there is such a thing as a Public, instead of merely so many people? Is there such a thing as a spirit of the age, instead of now this fad and now that one forging ahead in the newspapers?

Not that the formulæ makers are altogether at fault. The temptation to generalize at times becomes well-nigh irresistible. The current at times does seem to set steadily in one direction. The vista does seem to stretch out over new landscapes. We can hardly blame, for instance, the student of morals and manners who assures you that this country is in full revolt against the hereditary Puritanism. The old prudery of speech—and of behavior—is passing. On subjects worthy and worthless we feel and speak to-day with a freedom that ten years ago would have been inconceivable. The habits and speech of common life have become heavily charged with the habits and speech of the intellectuels and the underworld. Tango, eugenics, the slit skirt, sex hygiene, Brieux, white slaves, Richard Strauss, John Masefield, the double standard of morality—here is a conglomerate of things important and unimportant, of age-old problems and momentary fads, which nevertheless have this one thing in common that they do involve an abandonment of the old proprieties and the old reticences. Neither our newspapers nor our preachers nor our college presidents can be accused of being mealy-mouthed. Take, as a single instance, the invasion of the theatre by the crook play and the white-slave play. Is it rash to say that a revolution has occurred in the few years that have elapsed since the police put the ban on "Mrs. Warren's Profession"?

It is rash. No such revolution has occurred in the sense of a profound transformation working itself out within the great mass of our people. To make a revolution it needs something more than that all of the people shall be stirred some of the time and some of the people shall be agitated all of the time. The great public, in spite of the tango and the white-slave propaganda, has not shifted its moorings. Its fundamental tastes are very much what they have been. When we speak of every one reading Strindberg and Brieux it is only in the same sense that everybody is out of town in summer. We generalize from insufficient data. The assertion that the American reading public is learning to view life boldly with Bennett and Wells and Dreiser is disproved by the fact that hundreds of thousands are viewing it in the good old romantic fashion with Hall Caine and Marie Corelli. The underworld theme may sell books by the thousands, but to sell books by the hundreds of thousands we still require such old themes as home and mother and love's devotion. The noisy few may point the way and a goodly crowd may follow in meek imitation. But the great crowd also chooses for itself, and its independent choice is for the broad and simple effects that have always appealed to the masses.

We must still distinguish between the fluttering taste of the few who have lost their intellectual mooring by a kind of half education, and those profound changes which truly constitute a revolution in the life of the people. The self-esteemed intellectuels are terribly exposed to self-deception; they have neither the instincts of the masses nor the settled conviction of those who have felt the long judgments of time. In their hands are all the organs of publicity—the newspapers, the reviews, the circles and cliques which create "movements," and tendencies, and vistas, and revaluations. There may be a lively play of wave and spume on the surface; in the depths change works almost by imperceptible stages.

POINCARE'S LAST BOOK.

PARIS, August 20.

"Dernières Pensées" (E. Flammarion, 3.50 francs) is the last book of general interest which we are to have from that lucid thinker and clear writer, Henri Poincaré. It comprises late articles and lectures, some written within a few days of his death in July of last year. He intended the collection to form the fourth volume of his series of works on the philosophy of science—"Science and Hypothesis," "The Value of Science," "Science and Method," and this one dealing with outstanding questions, such as the evolution of laws; Space and Time; the logic of the Infinite and of mathematics; Matter and Ether; and moral systems and science, and moral union among men. A supplementary lecture by him on new conceptions of matter has since been published in a volume by several authors, "Le Matérialisme actuel" (Flammarion, 3.50 francs); and two years ago he published a brief pamphlet on another burning question, "Les Sciences et les Humanités" (A. Fayard, 1 franc).

All these convey with sufficient fulness the message to the world of the one master who has recognized the limits of science and proclaimed them frankly. Other gleanings, particular applications of a method of thinking more valuable perhaps than his science or philosophy, may be found by even general readers in his special works. They must have the patience to skip the mathematical operations which a dozen in each generation may hope to follow; and between they must read the paragraphs where slow processes of physics merge into intuitions of the universe.

These "Last Thoughts" emphasize the hard sayings which so offend those who have been dreaming of science without limits ruling absolutely the universe of thought:

> Science will always be imperfect, and not only because our faculties are weak. It will be imperfect by definition. He who speaks of science speaks of a duality between the mind knowing and the object known; and so long as this duality subsists, so long as mind is distinct from its object, mind will be unable to know its object perfectly, since it will never know aught of it but the exterior. Therefore, neither the question of materialism nor that of determinism—and I do not separate this from that—can be solved in last resort by science.

The lecture from which this is taken comes in the series of "Present Materialism" immediately after Professor Bergson's declaration on "Soul and Body":

> In philosophy we have to choose between pure reasoning, which aims at a definitive result, not to be perfected because it is judged perfect, and an empiric method which contents itself with approximate results that are capable of being corrected and completed indefinitely. . . . Between these two manners of philosophizing, my choice is made.

It would be a measureless error to confound Henri Poincaré's philosophy of science with Bergson's philosophy of what he thinks underlies science. Poincaré mischievously reduced Bergsonian Time to a fourth dimension of Space, and he says here seriously:

> Psychological time, Bergsonian duration, from which the scientific man's time issues, serves to classify phenomena which pass in one and the same consciousness; but it is powerless to classify two psychological phenomena which pass in two different consciousnesses—and, a fortiori, two physical phenomena. One event passes on earth, another on Sirius; how shall we know whether the former is anterior to the latter, or simultaneous, or posterior?

Of the value of science, Poincaré had already noted:

> Newton showed us that a law is only a necessary relation between the present state of the world and the state immediately following. All other laws since discovered are nothing else—they are differential equations.

He now adds:

> If we wish to write out the differential equations that rule the world, either such equations will be inexact or they must depend on the state of the world whole and entire. There will not be one system of equations for the world of earth and another for that of Sirius; there will be a single system applicable to the whole universe.
> Now, we do not observe directly the differential equations. What we observe are finite equations which are the immediate translation of observable phenomena and from which the differential equations are deduced by differentiation. . . .
> How, then, can we pass from finite equations to differential equations of which the former are the integrals? . . . One only solution is realized in nature, although there is an infinity of possible solutions. To form the differential equations, we should have to know not only this one solution which is realized, but all those which are possible.

At a time when philosophy has once more come in fashion—and when the scholastic bane of philosophy multiplies labels for every thinker and each thought—we must here follow Henri Poincaré to the brink. For his critics call after him names such as phenomenist, relativist, idealist, pragmatist—and, doubtless, would cry skeptic if they did not fear to imply that science has become dogma. In reality, all Poincaré's reasoning tends to establish the essential verity of the "relations" which science discovers between the terms of our sense observations. These relations are reduced to mathematical equations, without which Kant said there could be no physical science. But what may be the essence of the "terms" of our sense observations—why, that is a question Professor Poincaré leaves to Professor Bergson and those who choose to occupy themselves with it otherwise than by science, which cannot go beyond sense observation and experiment.

The charm and power of Henri Poincaré's thought came largely from his alert sensitiveness and ready response to the mental difficulties of living thinkers around him. It would be a sin not to cite here a refreshing sample of his kindly trial of conclusions with an American on the Infinite:

> Mr. Russell, no doubt, will say to me that the question is not one of psychology, but of logic and epistemology; and I shall be led to answer that there is no such thing as logic and epistemology independent of psychology—and such a profession of faith will probably close the discussion, because it will bring to sight a divergence of views beyond remedy.

To a question more important to the average man than all this scientific philosophy, Henri Poincaré gives an answer that contradicts schoolmastering reformers and republics:

> There cannot be a scientific morality; but there also cannot be immoral science. And the reason is simple—purely grammatical, if I may say so. . . . The principles of science, the postulates of geometry, are and can only be in the indicative; only in the indicative are experimental truths—and, at the basis of the sciences, there is not, there cannot be, anything else. So the most subtle dialectician may juggle with such principles as he will, may combine them and build up scaffoldings of one upon the other—all he will get out of them will be in the indicative. He will never get a proposition to say "Do this!" or "Do not do that!"—that is, a proposition either to confirm or to contradict morality.

Religious thinkers, if they were in the political ascendant, would very likely be little more pleased with Henri Poincaré than his brethren of science are:

> All dogmatic morality, all morality that is demonstrated, . . . is like a machine in which there are only transmissions of movement and no motor force. The moral motor, that which sets going the whole apparatus of wheels within wheels, can only be a feeling. . . . And that is why religions are powerful and metaphysics are not.

Henri Poincaré did not despair of his generation. The last time he spoke in public, three weeks before his death, he summed up in one the many reasons why the so-called "conflict of moralities" does not exist and ought not to exist:

> On one reason, at least, we cannot help agreeing. The life of man is a continuous struggle. . . . If we enjoy relative rest at times, it is because our fathers have striven much; let our own energy and vigilance relax but a moment, and we lose all the fruit of their struggles, all they have won for us. . . . What I say applies to the struggle which humanity has to sustain for life—the discipline it must accept is called Morality. The day that Humanity forgets Morality, that day it will be vanquished beforehand and plunged into an abyss of evil. . . . On all such things, we all think alike, we all know where we should walk—why, then, do we separate from one another?

The master who had the courage to maintain that the Ten Commandments of our fathers are scientific enough for morality might be expected to uphold their classical training "for the formation of men of science." He has a curious example of a university examination in which an entire class from its modern training failed to grasp the verbal bearing of the demonstration that the product in multiplication does not depend on the order of the factors. "Yet they had been drilled in grammatical analyses. . . . In a class from the classical training, M. Vacquant (the mathematician) said to me, nothing of the kind could have happened!" But Poincaré rises higher:

A spirit breathed of old on Greece and gave birth to poets and thinkers. There remains in our classical education I know not what of the old Greek soul—something that makes us look ever upward. And this is more precious for the making of a man of science than the reading of many volumes of geometry.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Bernard Quaritch, who died on Wednesday of last week, was without question the greatest bookseller in the world. He was a young man, not more than forty-five, had always been a hearty eater and drinker, and these habits had no doubt undermined his health. He had been ill a long time, in fact, ever since his last visit to New York to attend the second Hoe sale in January, 1912. He was unmarried, and his property will, probably, pass to two sisters, who survive him.

The elder Quaritch came to London from Germany in 1842, and after some delays established himself in the book business in a very small way near Leicester Square. Later he removed to 15 Piccadilly, and made that address well known to librarians and book-buyers the whole world over. When he died in 1899, leaving an enormous stock and heavy debts, it was generally predicted that the business, built up with such skill, would disintegrate. His only son, who had taken little or no interest in the business, took hold, however, and showed unexpected ability. He sold, sometimes probably at a loss, some of the big things that his father had carried a long time in stock, and in a year or two Quaritch was again the leading name in the auction room and in the trade, and this position it has retained. He left the old Piccadilly shop, took Lord Howe's old house in Grafton Street, and leaving the rooms much as they were, only installing a slow-moving "lift," he filled the house literally with books from wine-cellar to attic.

The elder Quaritch was overbearing in his manner, didactic and sarcastic in his speech. The son, though gross in appearance, was genial and kindhearted, and withal more politic in business than his father. He made friends and made sales, and above all else kept the name Quaritch standing for absolute honesty, with no misrepresentation of anything which he offered for sale.

He made frequent visits to the United States, bringing a trunkful or two of his treasures, and these trips were generally successful. He sold many fine books to Mr. Morgan as well as to almost every other collector of fine books in this country.

Like his father before him, he was independent and generally against the combination of London booksellers, which has established the "knockout" system at English book sales. The booksellers in the "ring" do not bid against each other in the salesroom, but later at a little auction of their own resell the books among themselves and divide up the profit.

The father used to impress upon collectors the advantage of giving him their commissions at auction sales, and if he allowed an important item to go to a competitor, the latter won a Pyrrhic victory. The son followed the same plan, but in extreme cases seems to have exercised a better judgment.

But while the larger part of his business was with collectors, Mr. Quaritch was equally proud of the fact that he had books for scholars and students. Books on natural history, Oriental languages, and archæology were some of his specialties, and he was London agent for the publications of learned societies in all parts of the world. He published few books, generally scholarly monographs on special subjects, and these were, probably, seldom profitable.

Mr. Quaritch did not have the wide knowledge of books which his father, with more than sixty years' experience among them at the time of his death, possessed. In this respect, no doubt, the death some ten years ago of Michael Kerney, who since 1862 had been his father's literary adviser and chief cataloguer, was a severe blow. Kerney, one of the most erudite of modern Englishmen, published almost nothing over his own name and is already all but forgotten. Mr. F. S. Ferguson, a quiet-mannered scholar, and an authority on early Scottish printing, who came to New York to attend all four of the Hoe sales, now fills the position of chief cataloguer. It is to be hoped that an arrangement will be made so that the business will be carried on, with Mr. E. H. Dring, who has been Mr. Quaritch's manager for many years, as its head.

THE PASSING OF GREEK?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A few days ago I was searching for a certain edition of the Iliad, in the original text. Requisition upon one of the large repositories of educational works in my own city having failed to bring to light the desired book, the brisk young salesman who waited upon me explained apologetically, "We don't keep up our stock of such things nowadays. Greek's gone by!" I meekly withdrew, pondering whether it were really true that the study of that marvellous language of the past, the delight in the literature of ancient Greece, in the works of Homer and Plato and Æschylus, of Bion and Moschus, of Herodotus and Xenophon and Thucydides, were extinct, or nearly so.

Thackeray, who himself loved to besprinkle his writings with phrases from the ancient poets, once lamented that Walter Scott, with his "modern troop of gallant young Scotch adventurers, merry outlaws, valiant knights, and savage Highlanders," had overcome the heroes and demigods of Greece and Rome. "See! Robin Hood twangs his bow, and the heathen gods fly, howling. Down goes Ajax under the mace of Dunois!" Must we add that in their turn the mighty deeds recorded by the Wizard of the North have now paled before the exploits of the cowboy and mining prospector? That Ivanhoe's shout of battle is drowned by yells and revolver shots of the modern offspring of Jack London and Rex Beach?

It is true that just now we are experiencing a sort of "wave" of interest in Greek—the smug young bookseller's pronunciamento to the contrary. Our leading literary magazine has recently yielded several of its closely guarded pages to an extended and extremely interesting dissertation upon Greek metres and rhythm. Here and there, in the other periodicals of the day, there have been sporadic attempts by professional experts in the language to revive an evidently flagging interest in Greek, and fresh translations of Homer still find a sure, if limited, market.

In spite of this revival, or pseudo-revival, of interest in Greek literature, it cannot be denied that strong forces of modernism, the tremendous and clamitant "progressive" spirit of the day, are arrayed against it. Many schools and colleges are seriously considering the omission of Greek from their curriculum; others have already dropped it. It is moreover undeniable that even a slight knowledge of the language is far more rare, among well-educated people, than in Thackeray's day, when schoolboys were required to commit to memory long passages, and, as the great English novelist has implied, were as familiar with the exploits of the heroes of Homer as are those of to-day with the various "boy aviators," detectives, scouts, and what not.

The practice of memorizing page after page of the Latin or Greek textbook has long since been abandoned. There was much to be said, after all, in favor of that method. Its thoroughness, at any rate, was commendable. It gave the student a certain firmness of footing, a solid foundation, that was pretty sure to remain unshaken throughout his life. At our class reunions those of us who were brought up on Andrews & Stoddard, or Harkness, or Sophocles, are fond of calling upon one another for the list of prepositions governing the accusative; or the principal parts of certain Greek verbs that seemed to us, in our boyhood days, the result of deliberate and ingenious malice on the part of the ancients: forms invented to entrap the unwary lad, nodding over his humdrum recitation. No wonder the Greek grammar was the pet aversion of every healthy boy in school!

The trouble undoubtedly was that the system then in vogue, with all its merits, gave the student no broad view of the language or its literature. The fact that it was a dead language was driven home to him by its constantly repeated dissection. His attention was, so to speak, of necessity concentrated upon its morphology and chemical analysis. Homer, the grand old poet and story-teller, was to him but an inventor of out-of-the-way forms and phrases, each of which must be studied and classified. It was as if a party of boys were taken to the Grand Cañon—that Iliad of landscapes, with its deep and shadowy gorges, its records of the strife of the elements for untold æons, its marvellous glow of color, its low, far-off murmur of many waters, its lurking-places for strange and awful Powers of the Air, its drifting clouds and wondrous radiance of each coming of "rosy-fingered Dawn, the child of Light"; lacking only the wide and mysterious expanse of the "wine-dark sea"—as if, I say, a class of young students were taken to Colorado, and upon the brink of this wondrous chasm were set to geologizing, scanning the storm-beaten cliffs with dactylic strokes of their little hammers: Clinkety-clinkety-clink! What marvel that "their eyes are holden," and that only in later years do their hearts burn within them, as they begin to realize the revelation they have so long missed.

We return to our first question—in the onrush and novelty of modern life and its varied interests, has the study of Greek really "gone by"? A few weeks ago a body of learned educators met at Richmond, Va., in a "National Conference for Education in the South." In the course of debate, one of its members urgently demanded "the complete abandonment of effete classicism in the public schools." "Effete classicism!" How poor and ill-considered, how futile, unpractical, and weakly sentimental, under the glow of these impressive words, delivered at white heat by the learned doctor from Mississippi, seem the memories of Rugby and Eton, of Oxford and Cambridge, of the old Boston Latin School, of Columbia, Yale, and Harvard!

Doubtless there are many among our statesmen and professional men who, like Rufus Choate, find their truest recreation in their classical library, softening the memory of the asperities of competition and slander and forensic passages-at-arms by the mellow phrases of Cicero's "De Amicitia," or the tales of Homer and Ovid, so free from the wearisome subjectiveness of the literature and conversation of the twentieth century. An old friend of mine was recently stopping at my house. As I showed him to his bedroom, I asked, "Shall I not bring in some books, in case you are wakeful in the night?" "Thank you, no," he replied; "I have my New Testament and Homer." There was the genuine lover of Greek, as against the restful charm of which the modern "best seller" had no attractions.

This brings me to one branch of my theme which I approach with reverence, and upon which I may not linger. To one who reads Greek, even slowly and with frequent reference to his lexicon, the Scriptures become as never before a treasure-house. To read the original text for the first time is to come upon an entirely fresh revelation. It is indeed a New Testament. The effect it produces is like that of the first visit to Palestine, for him who reveres the sacred story of old, and who now treads in the actual footsteps of the Carpenter of Nazareth. Whatever a man's religious belief, or non-belief, the study of the New Testament in the original is well worth all the time and trouble expended upon the language.

THE "YELLOW PERIL."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The California newspapers are ringing the changes on the alleged danger of "Asiatic invasion," as did Hobson in the years agone. The yellow peoples of the Far East are said to "menace this continent today as they menaced Europe centuries ago." That such fears are groundless is made plain by a study of the relations of America and eastern Asia from the visit of Perry to the present, also by a study of the Oriental spirit.

Instead of war, the prospects of continued peace between the Orient and the Occident were never brighter. The increasing importance of the Asiatic peoples in the economic life of the world should not be lost sight of. The interests of commerce make for peace, as does the interchange of ideas by means of books and papers printed in the English language, which is studied in the schools of China and Japan, so that a better understanding is possible now than ever before between the yellow and white races. Increased familiarity is bringing an enhanced regard for the Orientals, especially the educated classes of Nippon and the "Middle Kingdom."

There are, too, financial obstacles. The Chinese lack the sinews of war, and the Japanese are staggering under a heavy load of debt. War is out of the question and will be for a long time to come. The inheritance of acquired character in the Orientals is against aggression. Their horizon has been broadened by travel in the United States and by the spread of Christianity in the Far East. Motives of self-interest make for continued peace. The folly of war is apparent to the men who shape public policy in these ancient countries; they are not to be classed with the Mongol and Tartar chiefs such as Tamerlane and Genghis Khan. In view of these considerations, it is no time for intemperate language. "Fiery talk fans the flame of war."

Japan had its anti-foreign demonstrations in the '50's and the '60's. Then came the era of enlightenment (under Mutsuhito, which might be well named the era of toleration). The moral sense of the nation asserted itself. For thirty years or more Christian missionaries in Nippon have not been molested, and the native converts have enjoyed religious freedom. Christianity is the faith of a minority in Japan, but a very influential minority. The influence of the Christians outweighs that of the jingoes. Notwithstanding the disturbances of the first decade of the régime of progress and the conflicts of recent times, New Japan is rightly called "The Land of Great Peace." The wars with China and Russia were really defensive wars, because of Japan's intimate relations with Korea.

Is it not a reasonable hope that Tennyson's dream will be realized at no distant day, that the time is not far off when "East and West will meet and be merged into a higher form of existence, a Federation of the World, perhaps, in which men shall learn war no more"?

BASEBALL SLANG.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an article on "English and Baseball," in the Nation for August 21, you say, "Why baseball should be more addicted to this vice [referring, of course, to the use of distorted slang in the reports of baseball games] than golf, tennis, or even football, is part of the general mystery of the case."

Two reasons, perhaps, operate in the use of extraordinary slang in reports of baseball games. Golf, tennis, and football are games that have few terms peculiar to themselves, as a comparison of the rules of these games with those of baseball will show. Naturally, there is more opportunity offered in baseball for a quick-and-ready synonym.

And this opportunity is eagerly seized by sporting writers because of the readers they are writing for. Baseball appeals, generally, to a different crowd from that which is interested in golf, tennis, or football. Whatever objections one may have to professionalism in any sport, he must at least recognize the fact that for recreation many people go to see baseball games who have no opportunity to play golf, tennis, or football, or to see them played. That a baseball crowd is a cosmopolitan crowd is evident to any one who ever saw a professional baseball game.

Furthermore, the greater part of this crowd is everywhere as democratic and careless as it is at a baseball game. These people use slang. With some of them it is part of their habitual method of talking, and they understand it and appreciate it when used by any one else. Consequently the "great American daily," with its avowed intention of giving the people what they want rather than what is best for them, writes its reports of baseball games in such slang as its readers understand and like, even though they don't use it.

THE WRITING OF HISTORY.

History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century. By G. P. Gooch. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3 50 net.

"The object of this book," says the author, "is to summarize and assess the manifold achievements of historical research and production during the last hundred years, to portray the masters of the craft, to trace the development of scientific method, to measure the political, religious, and social influences that have contributed to the making of celebrated books, and to analyze their effect on the life and thought of their time." An author whose ambition is so inclusive may achieve much and yet fall short of the goal.

One feels that it is so with Mr. Gooch. He has written an excellent book, and a useful one: useful, especially, because there is no book in English, and no book of similar scope in any language, which covers the field; and excellent because what the author has done has for the most part been extraordinarily well done. And yet what he has done is something less than he professes, in the preface, to have aimed at. If one may distinguish, as Mr. Gooch himself seems to do in the title, between history and historians, it may fairly be said that the book is far more concerned with historians that it is with history: it is rather a collection of appraisals of many historians than an ordered presentation of the evolution of historical research and interpretation as a phase of intellectual history.

Mr. Gooch's plan would almost of itself preclude any serious attempt to trace the evolution of historical interpretation as a phase of intellectual history. He has grouped his historians partly according to their nationality, partly according to the countries whose history they studied, partly according to the conception of history which inspired their work. To the synthetic mind it is a little irritating to find Niebuhr, a Dane, who wrote Roman history, placed with the Germans because he feared the French Revolution and was an inspiration to Ranke, although Mommsen, who was a German, is placed elsewhere because he was engaged in Roman studies, while Lamprecht, who wrote a "Deutsche Geschichte," is not classed with Treitschke, who wrote one also, but with Burckhardt, because, like Burckhardt, he had faith in the socialpsyche. Mr. Gooch probably has not the synthetic mind. There is no harm in that; but his classification is clearly not well suited to measuring "the political, religious, and social influences that have contributed to the making of celebrated books," or to analyzing "their effects on the life and thought of their time."

In this respect, therefore, one feels that Mr. Gooch has not been altogether successful. It is true, we learn what were the particular influences which directed Savigny, for example, or Ranke, Thierry or Michelet, Macaulay or Guizot to the study of the past; and the point of view from which they regarded it, as well as the conclusions which they arrived at and set down in their books. But their work is nowhere related to the "political, religious, and social influences of the time" in which they lived. Mr. Gooch does not tell us whether there was any philosophy of history common to these men, or what the connection was, or whether there was any connection at all, between this philosophy and the general ideas that lay at the basis of liberalism in politics, romanticism in literature, and idealism in philosophy proper. Similarly, although the reader understands that the ideals and methods of natural science had a great effect on the work of Taine, he will lay down the book with no clear notion of the profound influence which the positivist and materialistic tendencies in the third quarter of the century had upon the formation of the modern conception of "scientific history."

That Mr. Gooch is not much interested in such questions is partly due, no doubt, to his own attitude towards history—to his loyalty, if one may so express it, to the current orthodox conception. Manifestly, he approaches the subject from the point of view of a devotee of "scientific history." At the close of the Introduction, he tells us why there was, as he thinks, so little genuine historical work done before the last century. "The conditions which rendered it possible to set forth the truth without fear or favor were as rare as the will to learn it, and the critical equipment required for its discovery. For the liberty of thought and expression, the insight into different ages, and the judicial temper on which historical science depends, the world had to wait till the nineteenth century." Again, in connection with Froude: "The main duty of the historian is . . . interpretation of the complex processes and conflicting ideals which have built up the chequered life of humanity." And at the very close of the book: "While historical science is thus extending its conquests in every direction, the philosophy of history lags behind. But though it is not yet possible to formulate the laws explaining the purpose and the plan of human evolution, every true historian contributes equally with the student of science and psychology to the progress of our knowledge of man."

The salient characteristic of this somewhat naïve and altogether pleasant conception of history—a conception which is neither so complacently nor so generally held to-day as it was twenty years ago—is in supposing that the past can be known in some ultimately true and final manner: once determine what actually occurred in any part of it, however small, and so much of the historian's task is done for all time—a "permanent contribution to knowledge" has been made. And what is chiefly essential to such discovery is the proper way to go about it, the "true scientific method." This, unhappily, did not exist, was not, as it were, invented, till the nineteenth century; but, happily, does now exist; and, being every day more faithfully applied, and applied by more workers, will one day bring all the past within the category of the definitely known; so that the historian, having finished his predestined task, may give way to the philosopher, who will "formulate the laws explaining the purpose and the plan of human evolution."

If this indicates, doubtless with some exaggeration, Mr. Gooch's general point of view, it at the same time helps to explain his lack of interest in the sort of synthetic treatment suggested above. For if one already possesses, in the "scientific method," a standard of value for measuring and assessing historical work, it matters little in what order the masters of the craft are presented for the test, or whether they are seen in their proper social setting. The social setting is all important if one seeks an explanation rather than a judgment. But Mr. Gooch seeks, incidentally, to explain it is true, but fundamentally to judge, or, as he says, to "assess," the historians of the century: his primary interest is in determining to what extent any actual historian has approached to a kind of ideal historian—an historian whose research is based upon methods abstractly and universally valid, whose interpretation, precisely because he has withdrawn himself from the social setting, is untainted by prejudice or bias, and whose work is perfect because the facts which he declares, and the meaning he attaches to them, will prove a permanent possession. As a matter of course, therefore, it is possible to say which historian is "greater" and which "less"—and which is greatest: Ranke is "beyond comparison the greatest historical writer of modern times; . . . no one has ever approximated so closely to the ideal historian."

These remarks are offered, not in disparagement of Mr. Gooch's book, but in order to define it, to place it in its setting. One has but to accept the author's point of view, in respect to history, to find that there is singularly little to object to in his judgment of historians. He is at his best in portraying the masters of the craft, the great writers of Germany, France, and England, in summarizing their works, in balancing their merits against their defects. Not infrequently the gist of the matter is put in a striking sentence: Schlosser, he says, was a "child of the Aufklärung, who had learned the Categorical Imperative from Kant." Occasionally, perhaps, the just measure is sacrificed to the crisp phrase, as where it is said of Lamartine's "Girondins": "The most worthless and the most eloquent of books had done its work; the constitutional monarchy had been succeeded by the Second Empire." Many readers will not agree that the "literary ability of the massive prefaces [of Stubbs] was as striking as their erudition"; and some will think that Carlyle gets scant justice in the matter of style, while Ranke gets more than his due. But on the whole Mr. Gooch's judgments are remarkably fair-minded; and notably so in the case of certain writers whom the scientific historian too often dismisses as of slight worth—half-forgotten men like Gervinus, or men whose works will be long remembered, such as Froude and Taine. No judgment, of course, would please at once the ardent admirers of Taine and of Aulard, or of Froude and of Freeman; and no just judgment, it may be added, would please either.

Mr. Gooch's knowledge of the subject is remarkably accurate and detailed. It need scarcely be said that it is not derived exclusively from the sources. As a matter of course, he has read widely in the books which he describes, and his summaries and estimates of the principal historical works of the century are his own. Yet he is thoroughly familiar with the secondary literature, of which he makes discriminating use, so that his conclusions do not often differ widely from accepted views. In dealing with the Germans, for example, Mr.

Gooch follows rather closely (as who would not?), sometimes even to phraseology, the profoundly penetrating essays of Lord Acton; but it is precisely an evidence of his independence that he has not embodied in his own work those judgments, often so original and illuminating and sometimes rather cryptic, which may be said to be peculiarly Actonian.

The nineteenth century is doubtless still too recent to be seen in right perspective. In the eyes of the future historian, one feels sure, the stature of this "historical century," even in the matter of historical research and interpretation, will appear much reduced. No doubt the student of historiography will always have much to say about our "scientific history"; but he will probably be interested in it less as a measure of value than as a phenomenon to be evaluated, less as an explanation than as something to be itself explained. And for those who seek below the surface for an explanation of the historical work of the century, it may be worth while to quote, as pointing the way, two sentences of Lord Acton. The notion that "the state does not exist for the purposes of men, and is not governed by laws of their devising, but by the Cosmic forces above," he pronounces to be "the strongest of all the agencies that have directed German effort towards history, viewed as a remedy for the eighteenth century and the malady of vain speculation." And again: "All the successions of thought during three generations constitute the shaft whose shining point is made by the Berlin interpreters of enlightened and triumphant Germany. They are the legitimate dynasty, reigning by right as well as by force, inheritors of the line that came down from Burke to the last stage of evolution and selection, who have set up the reign of imperishable moral forces for an intermittent Providence, the play of passion, and the blind will of man."

CURRENT FICTION.

The Woman Thou Gavest Me. Being the Story of Mary O'Neill written by Hall Caine. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.

Blazoned on the fly-leaf of this absurd book is a list of translations which are ready or in the making. We do not see that the story is likely to lose anything of importance in any of them. It has the sort of sensational mediocrity which is bound to appeal to the vulgar of any speech. Mary O'Neill and her Martin Conrad bid fair to be quite as convincing in Bohemian or Yiddish as in the tongue of Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine.

The theme is as threadbare as possible. A fair and innocent maiden is snatched from her convent to be married to a wicked lord. Her father, of course, is a millionaire of lowly origin. The maiden, having changed her name, wakes on her wedding night to the evil of the world, and refuses to change her estate. Wicked lord, furious but helpless, goes his wicked way and presently finds a fit companion, formerly the naughty girl of the convent. Maiden wife still does not love lord, but is jealous, and tries to lure him back to her side by painting her face and other fashionable wiles. He laughs at her, and she is on the eve of desperate action, when Martin Conrad, an old playmate, reappears, and Mary and he soon discover that they have always loved each other. Martin is an Antarctic explorer, about to make a dash for the pole; but he is ready to give up all for her if she will fly with him. This she will not do, partly because it would not be right, and partly because it would ruin his career. But the wicked lord sets a trap for them, and at the last moment she gives herself to Conrad. The upshot is that while he is pushing towards the pole, she is bearing him a child. She flies to London with a few pounds, is confined in a hospital, puts her child out to nurse, and slaves in a sweat-shop to provide for it. The third elaborately sensational moment in the book is that at which she brings herself to street-walking to keep her child from starvation, and the first man she approaches is Conrad! The moving conclusion is to the effect that although she does not regret having given herself to Conrad momentarily, or having meant to sell herself for bread, and though the wicked lord has divorced her, she will not marry Conrad. The utter muddlement and fuddlement of her mind (and apparently of the author's) are sufficiently shown in these adjacent passages from the woman's last message to the man:

> Don't think I regret that night at Castle Raa. If I have to answer to God for that, I will do so without fear, because I know He will know that, when the cruelty and self-seeking of others were trying to control my most sacred impulses, I was only claiming the right He gave me to be mistress of myself and sovereign of my soul. . . . All the same, my darling, to marry again is another matter. I took my vow before the altar, dear, and, however ignorantly I took it, or under whatever persuasion or restraint, it is registered in heaven.

O Pioneers! By Willa S. Cather. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

Few American novels of recent years have impressed us so strongly as this. There are two perils by which our fiction on the larger scale is beset—on the one hand a self-conscious cultivation of the "literary" quality, and on the other an equally self-conscious avoidance of it. The point may be illustrated by the work of two "late" novelists of native force, Frank Norris and David Graham Phillips. There was no doubt about the Americanism of either of them, so far as their subject-matter was concerned. It was the newer Americanism which has displaced the New Englandism of our nineteenth-century fiction. These men saw American life on a larger scale. Its scope and variety, its promise rather than its accomplishment, absorbed them. The big spaces and big emotions of Western life seemed to them far more interesting and more significant than the snug theory and languid practice of society in the smaller sense of the word. But Norris could not forget the books he had admired, and died before he had outgrown the influence of the French masters of "realism." Phillips, on the other hand, failed to shake off the pose of the plain blunt man, who thinks that the amenities of life are symptoms of weakness and that all Harvard men are snobs.

Now (in writing this story at least) it is the same big primitive fecund America which engages Miss Cather's imagination. She dwells with unforced emotion upon the suffering and the glory of those who have taught a desert to feed the world. The scene is laid in the prairie land of thirty years ago. The settlement to which we are taken is of some years' standing. The rough work has been done, the land cleared and broken up, sod homesteads built, crops planted—and then (the great test of courage and faith in that land) a succession of dry seasons. The weaker have already abandoned their claims, or lost them by mortgage. Only here and there a strong heart, like that of the heroine of the story, refuses to be discouraged, persists in believing that the country has a future. Her father, though defeated, has died in this faith, bequeathing it to her; so that when the stupid brothers wish to give up the fight, it is she who insists not only upon holding the land they have, but upon buying every acre they can in the thinning neighborhood. The years justify her, bringing wealth to her and to her beloved country. She prospers beyond her dull and penny-wise elder brothers, who nurse a grudge against her accordingly. Her heart she lavishes upon her younger brother, the baby of the family, and she procures for him the advantages of education which shall give him a larger horizon, more flexible interests, than her own. He is a fine lad, manly and responsive, but youth and circumstance prepare a dreadful end for him and for the hapless object of his love. The familiar matter of "rural tragedy" is here. Whether its detail is dwelt upon too ruthlessly is a question which readers will decide according to temperament and individual taste. To us the treatment of the episode seems justified by the mood of tragic emotion which underlies it. As for the bereaved sister, if loneliness has shadowed her youth and tragedy darkenced her maturity, there still remains the quiet fulfilment of a long-dreamt-of happiness. The sureness of feeling and touch, the power without strain, which mark this book, lift it far above the ordinary product of contemporary novelists.

An Unknown Lover. By Mrs. George de Horne Vaizey. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The agreeably irrepressible Grizel who blithely renounces a fortune to wed a modest novelist, and the scrupulously conscientious Katrine who hesitatingly permits herself the luxury of being wooed by correspondence, share equal honors. First there is the novelist's superannuated loyalty to the long dead bride of his youth to be dispelled, then the conscientious girl's cherished delusions as to the duties of a widower's sister. Grizel makes short work of both difficulties. She has no respect for tiresome duties. She insists upon making the novelist happy in her own way, and packs the chronically self-sacrificing sister off to India and the up-country station where the romantic correspondence took its rise. The voyage considerably enlarges Katrine's experience. Symptoms of the "Cranford cramp," contracted in twenty-six years of provincial English life, completely disappear. She arrives in Bombay horrified by her own sudden loss of principle, for even while the epistolary Jim awaits her she has fallen hopelessly in love with his brother-officer deputed to escort her from Port Said—a dilemma more apt to nonplus a heroine than a reader.

The story contrives to include a deathbed scene, a suicide at sea, and a shipwreck, without ever losing for more than a moment at a time its prevailing light-heartedness.

BUSINESS AND LAW.

The American Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser. Editors-in-Chief: John D. Long and William P. Wilson. Five volumes. Boston: J. B. Millett Co.

If we had not examined this voluminous publication with considerable care, we might have been tempted to adopt the typewritten estimate of the work with which the publishers have favored us. In one of the publishers' declarations we concur: "There are no other publications of this sort in the country." We do not hesitate to go further, and to declare that there ought not to be another. "Our main object," say the publishers, "has been to produce a work that is entirely devoted to such subjects as are of value to business men." Persons "just starting their business careers" are advised what industries are "back numbers," and, on the other hand, what vocational "lines have a big future for all the efficient and energetic people connected with them."

Opening the initial volume, we find that the editors inaugurate the "bold emprise" of the publishers with a four-page article on Abbreviations, beginning thus: "When in doubt about a business abbreviation, the best rule is to spell it out." Spell what out, we are moved to ask? Apparently the abbreviation. The reader is adjured never to employ the abbreviation "Gents." There is always time enough, he is told, to write out "Gentlemen," which is preferred to "Dear Sirs." Again, he is advised to use "Doctor" and "Professor" in full, "remembering, however, that professors in our leading universities usually prefer to be addressed as Mr." Sensible advice, undoubtedly. After giving the usual abbreviations of the names of the States, the contributor adds: "Note, however, that Cal. is often mistaken for Col.; Pa. for Philadelphia; Miss. for Missouri. It is well to spell out California, Mississippi, Missouri, Maine, Iowa, Ohio, Utah, Alaska, and Idaho; and to use Penn. or Penna. That care in adopting such abbreviations is a matter of dollars and cents, every mail-order house understands."

The matter of dollars and cents occupies a prominent place in the thought of the editors throughout these five volumes. If any one doubts this, let him examine such articles as Accountancy, Advertising, Banks, and Department Stores, with their accompanying bibliographies. Much interesting information is contained in this class of articles, and many of their suggestions should prove useful to the business man. Some of them remind one of the primer of one's boyhood. This is true especially of the discourse on correspondence, which rambles along disconnectedly through more than thirty pages and assures the reader, among other things, "that the pronoun I should always be capitalized."

It seems to have been "a matter of dollars and cents" that induced the publishers to furnish a generous supply of articles on legal problems. "Charges for legal services," to quote from their typewritten statement, "are regarded as among the important charges on most businesses of importance." The reduction of such charges by supplying the owner of this work with legal information which will enable him to solve or to avoid "the difficulties which are found in the path of every-day work," is one of the altruistic purposes of the publishers. And with ex-Secretary Long as editor-in-chief, many a person may be induced to expect that this purpose has been achieved. Alas! After reading many of these legal-problem dissertations, we are forced to wonder how much ex-Secretary Long could have written or revised of them. Certainly, he is not responsible for the following: "Stare Decisis.—Under the doctrine of Stare Decisis, i. e., to abide by the principle of the decisions made by it, a court makes but few exceptions to this rule, and whenever it overrules or qualifies one of the earlier cases, it is called upon to show good cause for it. The public act under the law laid down by its highest court, make bargains, buy and sell, and do whatever the court decides it may." Nor do we believe that he is responsible for the definition of a check as "a bill of exchange drawn on a national bank on demand." It would be interesting to learn the source of the legal contributor's misinformation on this point. Most laymen and all lawyers know that a check may be drawn on a State bank or a private bank or banker as well as on a national bank.

The article on Sales consists of a reprint of much of the Uniform Sales Act, but without any commentary. That the contributor is not perfect master of his topic is indicated by his statement that the act was codified by "the committee on uniform laws of the American Bar Association," whereas it originated with the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, a body wholly distinct from the American Bar Association.

The imperfections in the legal articles did not surprise us, for we had read the "editor's introduction to legal topics," and had found him asserting that the decisions of the New York Court of Appeals are reported in Cowin (misspelling for Cowen), Denio, Duer, and Johnson. Apparently, he is sweetly ignorant of the fact that the Court of Appeals was not in existence while Johnson, Cowen, and Denio were editing their reports, as well as of the further fact that Duer's reports are confined to cases in the Superior Court of the City of New York.

Schleiermacher: A Critical and Historical Study. By W. B. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.25.

The Theology of the Church of England. By F. W. Worsley, M.A., B.D. The same.

These volumes belong to a new theological series entitled the Great Christian Theologics, edited by the Rev. Henry W. Clark, M.A.; and according to their statement they "are not controversial, except incidentally, but are primarily careful expositions of the theological systems dealt with."

The volume on Schleiermacher comes at a most appropriate time. For just now, when we are in the midst of romanticism, it is worth while to read Schleiermacher, whose significance in theology lies in his relation to the romantic school. Although he was never dominated by that movement, and would have regarded its excesses with horror, yet his first and in some respects most important book, "Reden über die Religion," was written under its influence, and within that school won great popularity. That influence, and his Moravian training, led him to give most emphasis to the immediacy of feeling as the ultimate element in the religious consciousness, especially the feeling of dependence on God. On the other hand, his studies in Plato, his loyalty to Kant, his practical experiences as a great preacher, enabled him to avoid extreme individualism. He tried to steer between rationalism and crude supernaturalism.

Principal Selbie has given a clear exposition of Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, doctrine of God, the person of Christ, the Christian life, and the church. His criticism is just and discriminating. He recognizes the strength and weakness in Schleiermacher, "a man of his day, governed by its antecedents," and yet a man of the century, profoundly important in the history of serious thought. Considering the excellence of the work, and the fact that we have comparatively little in English about Schleiermacher, we heartily recommend this volume.

"The Theology of the Church of England," by F. W. Worsley, is in reality a commentary on the Thirty-nine Articles. The method is that of the Proof-text. Definitions are found in the Articles, and satisfactory explanations in quotations from the Book of Common Prayer. The depth and originality of this treatment may be judged by the statement: "These quotations need no comment; they demonstrate with perfect clearness the teaching of the church on the subject." Its reach of thought may be observed in its attitude towards the Atonement. Perhaps no question in theology is more difficult; yet this, having been defined as in the Articles, with a prayer from the Prayer Book as a gloss, is dismissed with the remark:

> It may be said at once that the Church of England does not discuss the many minor points and questions which may arise in connection with the Atonement. Probably many different theories are held in regard to them. The church is content with the broad outline in the statement quoted above, and indeed nothing further is really required.

One short chapter is given to the Being and Nature of God. The principal part of the book is devoted to creeds and sacraments. The former are authoritative; the latter are vehicles of grace. The style of the book is scholastic, the atmosphere ecclesiastical. The readers of the "Apologia" will remember the question which so seriously disturbed Newman. "What will you make of the Articles?" Evidently that question is still a troubler in the Anglican Israel.

Eggs in California are so bad that it has become a custom never to serve one which has not had its contents first examined by the cook; consequently, if you ask for a boiled egg in a restaurant, the waiter brings it to the table with its contents turned into a glass—a most uninviting dish. This is one of the brilliant observations of an Englishman, Arthur T. Johnson, who has just honored the Golden State by adding another to the countless books written about it. And be it said at once, those bad eggs are merely a sample of the general rottenness of that overpraised State. It is overrated even as a fruit-growing and agricultural region; "hence the struggle for the tourist's money." It is the alien who makes most out of the soil; the Western American is never satisfied with anything, anywhere. He is a born gypsy, always eager to move on, after selling out to a tenderfoot from the East. And how they do misrepresent and cheat! Lying pamphlets are sent broadcast, and many are the victims; "but no one who has ever lived three weeks in California with his eyes open will hazard his money on that great gaming-table of earth, unless he does so in a spirit of sport and devil-may-care." To add insult to injury, the Californian has a most irritating way of laughing contemptuously if you happen to mispronounce one of the many Spanish names on his maps and real-estate circulars, although those names are almost the only things he himself speaks correctly.

In short, Mr. Johnson appears to have had a sad time of it in California, especially in the mosquito-infected irrigated regions, where everybody had "the shakes." In moving on from Sacramento towards Mount Shasta, he pitied the herds of sheep, defenceless against the merciless heat. The poor birds, with drooping wings, took refuge in the slender shade of the telegraph poles—the only available shade—keeping pace with it as it slowly moved; but for the weary traveller there was not even that comfort. At last he was cheered by the sight of snowy Shasta. That mountain he liked; in fact, there were several things in the State he managed to enjoy, among them the salmon and the rainbow trout, "the finest, gamest, loveliest fish that swims," the native redwood trees, the lovely exotic plants that adorn California. He was impressed by Los Angeles; her "splendid streets and great business blocks were a revelation"; and he was sorry to leave Catalina Island and, later, Santa Barbara and Monterey; also, he admits that the electric trolley system of Los Angeles is the best he has ever seen in any land. In conclusion, he gives Californians a bit of advice they need badly: They must not, he says, expect wealthy European tourists to submit to their habit of having only three meals a day and those at fixed and limited hours. Furthermore:

> California may have the climate of Paradise, but she will never get the European winter visitors—as Nice and Mentone get them—or the wealthy Eastern American visitor either, until she more closely studies the desires of others, until she puts Mrs. Grundy in the cupboard and prepares to resolutely defend her liberties against those universal pests, the so-called reformers, female orators, meddling Sabbatarians, and other faddists.

Opposed to Mr. Johnson is the author of "Under the Sky in California," to whom everything is couleur de rose, even the desert. One reason why Mr. Saunders liked the desert so much better than Mr. Johnson did was that he did not go to see it at random, but when it had on its holiday attire. His object in visiting the desert regions was chiefly to study flowers and paint them, and he went at the right time to each section, knowing that, to be seen in the glory of its spring, the Mojave should not be visited till early May, whereas the Colorado Desert offers its best in March, although those who are heat-proof may linger till May or even June to enjoy the glorious display of cactus blossoms, of the purple tree-dalea, and the gold-bespangled palo verde.

Useful hints to those who would see the deserts at their best are given by Mr. Saunders. But the deserts are only a detail in his general scheme. He travelled many hundreds of miles, in all parts of the State, and while there is a chapter on the Tourist Towns from San Diego to Monterey, the greater part of his book is devoted to the immensity of almost unexplored mountains, cañons, and flowery plains, of which the ordinary tourist at most gets a glimpse from the car window. The California known to hunters and anglers, to prospectors and cowboys, to miners and Indians, is the California we learn to know better in this delightfully sympathetic and entertaining volume. The author is an expert in camping, which is a recreation most Californians indulge in passionately at least once a year. He has much to say about desirable equipment, and some of his cooking recipes are worth trying at home; but he gives this counsel: "Never attempt to camp at all, unless some one of your number understands how to cook and thoroughly enjoys it." He found the cost of camping no more per week than it is to live in a hotel a day. The Yosemite is seen to best advantage by campers, who have better opportunities to enjoy the sights by day and the "nights of the gods," tents being usually superfluous in this climate. On this climate Mr. Saunders has one of the most informing and unbiassed chapters we have ever seen; nor has any one given a better answer than he (pp. 246-56) to the question so many Easterners ask themselves: "Could I make a living in California?"

J. Smeaton Chase is another enthusiast to whom California is "by much the most beautiful, interesting, and attractive of all the States of the Union." In this opinion he was more than confirmed by two trips he took, one south from Los Angeles, the other north to the Oregon boundary, aggregating together some 2,000 miles. They were leisurely horseback journeys through the coast regions, and he particularly emphasizes the fact that there is only one region of the United States (with few anywhere else) in which one may travel with enjoyment for half a year continuously, secure from climatic vagaries, and carrying on the animal one rides everything needful for comfort by day and night. He gives a list of the things he took, admitting that they made a good load for his horse; but his daily stages were short, as his object was not to make speed, but to look about at ease. The most entertaining pages are those telling of his agreeable experiences with the dwellers in these regions. Among them all he found a surprising amount of hospitality, regardless of whether they were native Californians or Mexicans, or Irish, or Italians, or Portuguese. For the Californian Spaniards and Mexicans he professes a genuine liking.

Mr. Graves's book gives the experiences of a well-known citizen of Los Angeles as an automobilist of the present and a hunter of the past, chiefly, though there is also a section headed "Last Quail Shoot of the Year 1911." Shooting is not what it used to be in the days when the author, as a boy of eight, began to carry a shotgun, and often, on going to bring home the cows, brought back a dozen or so quail, slain with one gunshot. There are accounts of a visit to the Yosemite and an auto trip through the Sierras. But the most readable and novel chapter is one entitled "Professor Lo, Philosopher." It is about an Indian whom the author found fishing, and engaged in conversation. To his amazement, the Indian talked about everything under the sun, much like a professor; and, indeed, he proved to be professor of belles-lettres and philosophy in the Indian College on the Klamath reservation. His wife, who presently joined them, was an old Indian woman, clad in a calico wrapper, bareheaded and barefooted. The author had noticed, before he spoke to the professor, that on catching grasshoppers he ate three of every five, keeping the others for bait. In this and other respects he was still a savage; a "savage" also (as the author might have added, perhaps, had not a guilty conscience prevented) in both his fishing and hunting habits: "I never catch more fish, or kill more game, than I need for my present wants."

The Old Irish World. By Alice Stopford Green. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.60 net.

Readers of Mrs. Green's "Making of Ireland and Its Undoing" will be prepared for both the excellences and the defects of her latest work on Irish history. They will find in "The Old Irish World" the same wit and vivacity, the same shrewdness in argument, and the same strong and effective insistence on the use of native Irish materials in the investigation of Irish history, which have characterized her earlier writings. They will recognize the justice of many of her claims, and will perhaps find an excuse for the unduly controversial tone of the book in the unquestionable prejudice of many writers against whom it is aimed. But they will hardly lay the work down, in our opinion, with the feeling that Mrs. Green herself has achieved the result of writing sober and impartial history.

The volume has less the character of a learned treatise than the "Making of Ireland." It is rather a collection of popular essays or lectures, with no special order or unity beyond the fact that they all bear upon Irish history or illustrate the character of Irish civilization. Two chapters, the first and the last, are direct protests against the treatment which Ireland has received at the hands of British historians. Between these is a chapter on Trade Routes, which sets forth interestingly the commercial relations between Ireland and the Continent in early times, and emphasizes some facts which are often overlooked; an account of A Great Irish Lady (Margaret, the wife of Calvagh O'Connor of Offaly), which is disappointing in that it tells us much less of the lady than of the troublous times in which she lived; and a description and historical sketch of the old castle at Ardglass, recently restored as a monument of Irish civilization. The author makes all three chapters bear upon her main thesis by emphasizing the evidences they offer of native Irish virtue, culture, hospitality, or material prosperity.

In so far as Mrs. Green's arguments, either here or in her other writings, challenge the traditional "wild Irish" theory that has obtained in many literary and historical books, they serve a good purpose. Without doubt, British historians have often shown as little sympathy in writing of Ireland as some British statesmen have manifested in their attempts to govern her. A substantial treatise might be written on the successive phases of anti-Irish satire in English poetry, drama, history, and journalism; and while much of the contempt visited on the Irish is the natural feeling of the political and economic superior for the poorer and less successful race, much of it is unquestionably the product of mere ignorance and misunderstanding. It is only lately that the advance of Celtic scholarship has made it possible, on the historical side, to present Ireland in a truer light, and Mrs. Green is doing well in her determined effort to spread the new knowledge. But now that she has made her protest, or joined it to that of native historians before her, we wish that she might write, on her own side, with a little less animus.

The time is ripe for an impartial estimate of the value of Irish civilization, made in the light of the best Celtic scholarship. There are real problems at issue, and the solution of them is by no means easy. If the disparagement of the "wild Irish" party must be discounted on the one hand, so, on the other, must the claims made for Irish culture be critically examined. The language of native writers concerning saints and scholars, law-givers and poets, cannot be taken at its face value, but sound and fair standards of comparison must be applied to the various phases of Irish civilization. We believe that, on the whole, the reputation of Ireland will gain from such an examination.

Notes

The Frederick A. Stokes Company will shortly issue the following novels: "The Way of Ambition," by Robert Hichens; "The Heart of the Desert," by Honoré Willsie; "Anne, Actress," by Juliet G. Sager; "Dave's Daughter," by P. B. Cole; "A Modern Eve," by May Edginton; a volume of short stories by Richard Dehan, under the title "The Headquarter Recruit," and a romance entitled "The Soul of Melicent," by James Branch Cabell.

A new novel by Meredith Nicholson, entitled "Otherwise Phyllis," is announced by the Houghton Mifflin Company, as are also the following: "Midshipman Days," by Roger West; "The Housekeeper's Handy Book," by L. M. Baxter; a new edition of Hawthorne's "House of the Seven Gables," and a number of children's books in the Orange Tree series, illustrated in color by Patten Wilson.

The autumn list from McClurg & Company includes, under fiction: "The Maid of the Forest," by Randall Parrish; "The Dominie of Harlem," by Arnold Mulder; "A Master's Degree," by M. H. McCarter; "The Great Plan," by E. H. Mason; "The Island of the Stairs," by C. T. Brady; "Captain Protheroe's Fortune," by Oswald Kendall; "The Coming of Cassidy," by C. E. Mulford.—History and travel: "The Odyssey of the Philippine Commission," by D. R. Williams; "The Story of the Pony Express," by G. D. Bradley; "Kit Carson Days," by E. L. Sabin; "The Coming Canada," by J. K. Goodrich: "The Story of California," by H. K. Norton.—Juvenile: "The Trail to El Dorado," by J. M. Hanson; "Will o' the Wasps," by Margaret Warner Morley; "The Wilderness Castaways," by Dillon Wallace; "Flamehair the Skald: A Tale of the Days of Hardrede," by H. Bedford-Jones; "Billy To-Morrow's Chums," by Sarah Pratt Carr; "Storming Vicksburg," by Byron A. Dunn; "The Enchanted House, and Other Fairy Stories," by E. O. Harrison.—Miscellaneous: "The Study of Literature," by P. H. Pearson; "Myths and Legends of the Plains," by K. B. Judson; "The Making of an Oration," by Clark Mills Brink; "Choice Readings," by Robert McLean Cumnock; "Early English Water Color," by C. E. Hughes; "How to Improve the Memory," by Edwin G. Lawrence; "American Irrigation Farming," by W. H. Olin; "The New Competition," by Arthur Jerome Eddy; "Daly's Billiard Book," by Maurice Daly and W. W. Harris; "Dame Curtsey's Book of Candy Making," by Ellye Howell Glover; "Free Trade vs. Protection," by Amasa M. Eaton, and eight new works in the National Social Science Series, edited by Frank L. McVey.

The Selden Society has issued and sent to its members in America the regular and also an extra volume of its publications for the year 1913. The volume for 1911, however, is still delayed in the hands of its editor. One of the volumes for 1913 is of the Year Book series, Volume VIII, being Volume III of, and completing, the Eyre of Kent, 6 and 7 Edw. II, 1313-1314. The secretary and treasurer of the Selden Society for the United States is Mr. Richard W. Hale, whose new address is No. 16 Central Street, Boston. If the Society should have the additional support which it endeavors to deserve, it might be able to carry out its ambition to give an extra volume every year, publishing one Year Book and one volume of more varied character.

Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, with whom the name and fame of Francis Thompson are a kind of sacred deposit, has made a careful edition of his works which Scribners publish in this country in three substantial volumes. In dealing with the verse Mr. Meynell has had at his command the last revisions of the poet, which render this edition definitive. Some readers will prefer to have "The Hound of Heaven," "To the Dead Cardinal of Westminster," and his few other really great lyrics in a small volume of selections, and it may be said plausibly that the difficulty of reading Thompson's poems increases by a sort of geometrical ratio with their bulk. But we have acquired a taste for complete editions, and Thompson wrote less than many a lesser poet. The quality of his verse Arthur Symons once expressed in a fit metaphor: "Other poets of his time have had deeper things to say, and a more flawless beauty; others have put more of their hearts into their song; but no one has been a torch waved with so fitful a splendor over the gulfs of our darkness." The third volume of this edition contains the prose—the essay on Shelley (a miracle of critical genius to some; to others a piece of overblown enthusiasm), "Health and Holiness" (a subtle study of spirituality and asceticism), and a group of literary reviews and brief critical articles. These last one naturally compares with the similar remains of Lionel Johnson recently published. They are not a match for Johnson's work in learning, penetration, or judgment, but they are well worth reading. There are three portraits of Thompson at various ages. Mr. Meynell is to be thanked for executing so well a task of piety.

The personality of Salisbury Plain, with its cathedral, Stonehenge, the Saxon and Roman camps at Old Sarum, and its rolling chalk downs, diversified by occasional quaint villages, Ella Noyes has tried to express in a volume ("Salisbury Plain," Dutton), to which Dora Noyes contributes a number of illustrations. Some scholarship has gone into an attempt to trace the historical background of the more important localities, and literary and architectural attractions have their space; but the best portions of the book are the descriptions of agricultural life and village customs, reminiscent in their way of Jefferies himself, who is buried in Salisbury. With the northern and eastern parts of the plain invaded by military camps, and the vicinity of Salisbury overrun by tourists, it is a pity more space was not given such places as Longford, Bemerton (where Herbert had his charge, "appearing twice every day at the church prayers," as Izaak Walton tells us), Durrington, and Bulford. Even such a seat as the wooded demesne of Fonthill, where the Nadder skirts the plain, and Beckford held extravagant sway, is dismissed with a footnote reference.

Books of the type of Lady Macdonell's "Reminiscences of a Diplomatic Life," imported by Macmillan, can hardly be produced in America, though they are common enough on the other side. Lady Macdonell is more consciously the person of quality than the diplomat's wife. Least of all would she wish to be regarded as a writing woman. These are merely "stray memories," the idle product of certain convalescent hours, meant for the amusement of her family and published only at their request. Her disclaimer of literary pretensions is somewhat quaintly borne out by the attribution to Matthew Arnold of the single quotation in the book, the line "Allured to brighter worlds and led the way," and her style has the good-humored inaccuracy which, romantic fiction to the contrary, belongs to the speech of the upper world. But that is neither here nor there, since the book is offered as a document and not as a work of art.

Lady Macdonell's father was a younger son of good Yorkshire stock, who went as a lad to Buenos Ayres, made his fortune there, and there married an English girl and brought up a family. Presently one Hugh Macdonell came to Buenos Ayres as a Secretary of the British legation. He was all a girl could ask for; "he danced beautifully, was a splendid shot, and a first-rate horseman"; and promptly fell in love with one of the beautiful Misses Lumb. Not long after their marriage he was appointed to Madrid; and in the years that followed he served as attaché successively in Berlin, Rome, and Munich. In 1885 he procured his promotion as Minister to Rio de Janeiro, and later held the same post at Copenhagen and at Lisbon, retiring in 1902. To these various scenes Lady Macdonell brought an unaffected enjoyment of society, and a warm interest in the great people with whom she was thrown. When the shift was made to Berlin, she was already the mother of three children, but had lost nothing of her childlike zest for "a good time." The old Emperor was very attentive to her, and the Crown Prince (the present Emperor) became a sort of playmate: "then a fine young man, with a strong sense of fun and fond of teasing." She records how he swung her off her feet in dancing; and how when, to tease her, he once accused her of cheating at draughts, she leaned over and boxed his ears. It is this sort of experience which pretty frankly means to the author of these reminiscences "a diplomatic life." It might have been unsafe for Hugh Macdonell to practice the same kind of diplomacy!

In "London Streets" (London: T. N. Foulis), Mr. Arthur H. Adams has made himself the singer of the great metropolitan thoroughfares. The Strand, Fleet Street, Hyde Park, Cheyne Walk, among others, are celebrated in a modification of the rather inflexible stanza of FitzGerald's "Omar Khâyyâm." Whether a varying verse would not have lent itself better to the multifarious aspects of the city, is a fair question. But that Mr. Adams has by no means failed in eliciting poetry from a subject which seems to strike the modern imagination with particular force, is evident from the following lines on the Temple:

> About its feet the city brawls;
> But deep within high shelteriug walls,
> The shadows dawdle listlessly,
> Reluctantly the fountain falls.
> For this an isle of silence seems,
> A cloistered place between two streams,
> For Fleet Street here goes swirling past,
> And here the Thames remembering dreams . . .
> So the loud city has its deeps
> Of solitude, as though it keeps
> The silence of the country-side
> About the place where Goldsmith sleeps.

The publishers of the useful and inexpensive little books collectively entitled "A History of the Sciences" (Putnam) have included in the series two volumes on the history of ancient and modern philosophy by A. W. Benn. Mr. Benn writes from a lifelong study of the philosophical classics, and he has the art of being concise without being dry; so that, though his expositions are at times open to criticism, he has on the whole told the long and complex story of European speculation more readably than it has hitherto been told in English in such extremely small compass. He is perhaps more at home among the ancients than the moderns. The writers and tendencies of the last half-century are treated with disproportionate brevity, and with far less understanding than are those of earlier periods. The general character of the series might well have suggested a closer correlation of the history of philosophy with that of natural science than is attempted.

In the seven consecutive and closely coherent essays which make up Sir Francis Younghusband's "Within" (Duffield), the author has attempted what can hardly be better described than by calling it a philosophical view of the essentials of human life. Though the theme is therefore a somewhat tremendous one, the treatment is modest and unpedantic; and though some of the views expressed may seem to many readers, even in these days, extremely radical, few into whose hands the book is likely to fall will find it other than delightful reading, so well written is it, on the whole, so fine and even-tempered in tone. The subtitle, "Thoughts During Convalescence," is explained in the first essay. There the fact is brought out that the book is the result of a very painful and all but fatal motor accident of which the author was the victim some time in 1912. During the long days of his slow recovery, his thoughts were directed more insistently than they had ever been before to the enigma of suffering in a world commonly supposed to be under the dominion of a being at once kind and benevolent, and omnipotent. Consideration of this enigma leads Sir Francis to the conclusion that there can be no such being, and then to an attempt at the formulation of views consistent with the known facts of existence. These views have some kinship to those of English Positivists like Mr. Frederic Harrison; but they are the product of markedly independent thinking, and cannot profitably be placed in any familiar category. Orthodox Christianity itself would doubtless claim for its own the conclusion of the author that love is the fundamental and final good in human life; but it would be very far from approving his handling of love, particularly in reference to marriage and the domestic relations. Even here, however, what he has to say is both strikingly and graciously put.

"The Bliss Book" (Hartford: privately printed), by Charles Arthur Hoppin, is one of the best of the newer, readable type of genealogies. In connection with the account of the early Blisses, considerable information is given concerning the life and customs of feudal and Tudor England. Full copies of ancient records and attractive half-tones of the churches and towns mentioned in the text add greatly to the value and character of the volume. Mr. Hoppin's comment on the Bliss arms and their use is interesting and suggestive, even if purposely vague. Historical accuracy seems to have been kept constantly in mind, with the result that the American pedigree extends only to 1460 rather than to that too popular 1066. The volume is a large quarto of 184 pages, and many illustrations.

There seems but little excuse for the publication in this country of a book like Edward Thomas's "The Icknield Way" (Dutton). The first general chapter, On Roads and Footpaths, is interesting and promises well; the second chapter contains a succinct and painstaking account of the history and traditions of the Icknield Way, the ancient road that crossed England from east to west and is still traceable over the greater part of its course. These two chapters would make an acceptable pamphlet issued under the auspices of an English archæological or topographical society. Later chapters record details of the author's tramp over a portion of the road and include extracts from his philosophy of life and snatches of conversation with chance acquaintances of the way. Borrow could make this sort of thing extraordinarily fascinating, but Mr. Thomas, although a confessed Borrovian, is by no means a Borrow, and the reader who must follow his peregrinations finds himself limping in spirit no less than did the author on his blistered feet. We are not optimistic enough to think that many American readers will be inspired by this book to spend their next European vacation on Shanks's mare tracing the course of the Icknield Way. The illustrations, some in color, by A. L. Collins, are attractive.

There is one State in the Union, at least, that has so organized its activities in historical research as to promote the greatest industry in publication; and that State is Iowa. Under the general superintendency of Prof. Benamin F. Shambaugh, the State Historical Society turns off volume after volume, series after series, in the greatest profusion; and the most amazing fact is that a relatively high standard is maintained. The two latest volumes are intended to supply the need of the Legislature of the State with facts for their guidance in future legislation. The Society is developing into a kind of historical reference bureau. Mr. John E. Brindley, in his "History of Road Legislation in Iowa," treats his subject chronologically, from the time when plank roads were popular down to the present-day movement for good roads. The second volume is the "History of Work Accident Indemnity in Iowa," by E. H. Downey. This is a general treatise on the law and economics of the subject and is well done. As is the case with all the volumes from the Iowa Historical Society, the printing and binding are excellent. Each volume has an analytical index; but the arrangement of the notes and references at the end of the volumes is most inconvenient for the reader, and should be abandoned in future publications.

The small volume on contemporary German philosophy by Professor Külpe, of Bonn, which now appears in an English version by M. L. and G. T. W. Patrick ("The Philosophy of the Present in Germany," Macmillan), is designed for the general reader, and has for a decade had a wide circulation in its original form; it was therefore a book which clearly called for translation. The reader will not, indeed, find in it all that the title seems to promise. It attempts no synoptic view of the present state of the German mind in relation to philosophical issues; and of the individual teachers whose opinions it expounds, several were in their prime more than half a century ago; while numerous living philosophical writers of consequence are unmentioned or but briefly touched upon. The book is chiefly a concise presentation, with some slight criticism, of the doctrines of Mach, Dühring, Haeckel, Nietzsche, Fechner, Lotze, Hartmann, and Wundt.

The translation is occasionally happy as well as faithful; but more often it follows Külpe's German too closely to be agreeable, or even always intelligible, English. The original, it is true, is written in the sort of blurred, circumlocutory, professorial German which, to be truly Englished, needs to be translated into another intellectual as well as another verbal idiom. But not all the faults of the translation are explicable on this ground. For example, "reale Disziplinen" does not signify "real sciences," but sciences of empirical facts, in contrast with the sciences of formal relations. When the author says that to logic and mathematics the "reale Bedeutung" of their objects is unimportant, he means that it is indifferent to those sciences whether their objects exist or not —not that "the question of the real significance of their objects" is unimportant for them. The phrase "just as little is it identical with the conscious reality of the facts expressed" (p. 135) makes the entire passage meaningless; the sense is: "just as little is it identical with the actual content of consciousness." "Die achtziger Jahre des 19. Jahrhunderts" were not "the eighth decade" of the century—though this is rather an arithmetical than a linguistic blunder. Proper names are printed throughout in italics—a disagreeable typographical affectation which it is to be hoped will not be imitated.

Black's "Guide to Ireland" (Macmillan) has now appeared in its twenty-fifth edition. In the absence of a Baedeker for Ireland, Black's book has long been used as the best available substitute, and while it does not quite measure up to the standard set by Baedeker, it nevertheless deserves high praise as a digest of practical information for tourists. The accounts of routes of travel, hotels, and local institutions of all sorts are full and trustworthy. The book is conveniently arranged and well indexed, and supplied with plenty of maps. But on the side of history, archæology, and the fine arts, the reader will miss the systematic essays, usually the work of learned experts, which Baedeker's guidebooks contain. Black's introductory notes on the Irish language, and to a less degree those on art and archæology, seem very meagre by contrast. They have been somewhat expanded since earlier editions, but to be of any real value they ought to be rewritten at greater length by competent scholars. Considerable information of an historical character, we ought to add, is given in the body of the work, in the accounts of various places, and the compilers seem in general to have drawn upon good sources.

The new volume of "The English Factories in India" (The Clarendon Press), carefully edited like its predecessors, with an introduction, by Mr. William Foster, calendars documents in the India Office for the years 1642-1645. As this is the period corresponding with the beginning of the Civil War, from the raising of the royal standard at Nottingham to the battle of Naseby, one naturally wonders how the strife affected the East India Company. Apparently the war interfered with the company less than might be expected. To be sure, the market for Indian silks fell off sharply, and one of the company's ships was betrayed into the hands of the royalists by her jealous and cantankerous captain, who tricked his superiors into landing on a barren shore and then sailed away to England without them. Otherwise the Civil War was without serious effect on trade in the East. Much more serious was the continuous competition of Courteen's rival trading association and the superior power and success of the Dutch. "The Dutch in these parts," says a characteristic English letter from India, "only prosper and flourish by their industry, patience, and indefatigable paines and unalterable resolutions obtain what they please." The attempts of the English to open trade in China at Macao and in the Philippines at Manila, which are described in picturesque letters in this volume, met with less success than they deserved.

Through the generosity of one of its resident members, the Colonial Society of Massachusetts has been able to issue the second volume of its Collections (Boston: Published by the Society), containing the extant royal commission granted to certain of the crown officials of Massachusetts Bay from 1681 to 1774, both dates included. The material for this volume has been in preparation for many years, ever since in 1893 Abner C. Goodell presented to the Society copies of certain commissions and instructions that were in his hands, with permission to print. Lack of funds and a growing realization that further and more prolonged search was necessary before printing should be begun led to continued postponements, until in 1910, when pecuniary support had finally been assured, it was found that enough material had accumulated to fill two volumes. This accumulation was due to the decision reached by the Society to print not only the royal commissions, but the royal instructions also; and the same member having placed the Society under additional obligations by offering to pay for the printing of the new material, a second volume will be issued in the near future. The documents here presented number fifty-eight in all and include all the royal commissions that the editor has been able to discover, either himself in Boston or through agents in London. The series is not complete, as five of the commissions have eluded the editor's search; but the loss is not great, for these five commissions would have added nothing of value to the historian, being duplicates in all essential particulars of similar commissions already obtained. The collection as a whole is unique, none of the original thirteen colonies having printed anything like a complete series of these royal documents; the best that has been done hitherto is the issue, here and there, without any pretence at systematic presentation, of an occasional instrument. The Society, therefore, is to be heartily commended for its enterprise, and the anonymous member who furnished the funds deserves thanks not only of the Society, but of all interested in colonial history. The work has been done with great care, and the editor, Albert Matthews, has demonstrated again, as so often before, his ability to perform the work that he has been called upon to do. Aid in compiling the second volume will be furnished in the forthcoming report of the American Historical Association, which we recommend to the editor for his guidance.

Italian immigration plays so important a part in our social and industrial life that we welcome every means which enables us to understand it better. One of these is La Vita Italiana all' Estero, a monthly magazine, which began publication last January. It consists of eighty pages a number, and contains many articles and discussions concerning the condition of the Italians in the United States. Its editor, Dr. Giovanni Preziosi, has spent much time in this country, and is the author of the best book on the Italian situation here. His journal naturally pays great attention to the hardships suffered by immigrants, and it expresses the popular Italian opinion on supposed abuses and injustice; but it aims at fairness. In the July number, for instance, M. Piacentini gives a temperate account of the Ettor-Giovannitti case, showing that they were not tried merely because they were Italians, as was the current supposition in Italy, but because they were suspected of statutory crimes. He adds that it is praiseworthy that the responsibility of the strike leaders towards society should be increased, so that strikes may be conducted with dignity instead of with violence. The Vita Italiana is published at Via Due Macelli, 9, Rome; its annual subscription is 12 lire.

"Italy To-day," by Bolton King and Thomas Okey, was first issued in 1901. In 1909 a "new" edition appeared. Now we receive a "new and enlarged edition" (Scribner), but we fail to discover any statistics or references to public events later than 1909. This is unfortunate, because during the past four years Italy has witnessed the close of an old epoch and the opening of a new. For better or for worse, the Italians have assumed the rôle of world power; so that the "To-day" of Messrs. King and Okey, which takes no note of this, seems already antiquated. Nevertheless, the more fundamental conditions described by them have not wholly changed, and their work may still be consulted with profit, although their strong socialist bias and their generally pessimistic view of Italy and the Italians color, if they do not sometimes vitiate, their statements.

The Rev. Dr. Marvin Davis Bisbee, for many years librarian of Dartmouth College, is dead at Portland, Me. Dr. Bisbee was born in Chester, Vt., June 23, 1845. He was graduated from Dartmouth in 1871, and prepared for the ministry at the Andover Theological Seminary. He entered the Congregational ministry in 1874. In 1881 he became associate editor of the Boston Congregationalist. He was appointed professor of divinity and librarian at Dartmouth in 1886, and professor of bibliography in 1893. In 1910 Dr. Bisbee retired on a Carnegie Fund pension.

The Geography of New Zealand: Historical, Physical, Political, and Commercial. By P. Marshall. Melbourne: Whitcombe & Tombs.

On October 10 last, three works on the geography of Australia were reviewed in these columns. They were treated as applications of the doctrines of the new American school of physiography. The volume by Professor Marshall on the geography of New Zealand is another application of the same methods and concepts, and it is worthy of its place in the series. It owes not a little of its merit to the luminous introduction by Professor Gregory, now of Glasgow, to the chapter on geysers by the same writer, and to the chapter on earthquakes by Mr. George Hogben. On all the topics there discussed, and, indeed, on all that are connected with physiography, New Zealand has something to teach.

While New Zealand consists of two large, one smaller, and many small islands, its structure is continental. Its rock-sequence is as complete as that of Australia, which is thirty times as large. It is still immature. While Australia is comparatively stable, New Zealand is still rising and falling, and great earth-movements are yet in progress. The important physiographical agents are unusually active, and powerful forces are wearing the country down. Hence the variety and freshness of its land-forms. The rivers are still undergoing development. Valleys and mountains are equally immature. The planing down of ancient mountain ranges and the dissection of old plateaus can be plainly discerned. Here fan-shaped deltas and there fan-shaped hills betray their common origin. Here, too, the river that forms the fan is observed to have been captured and destroyed. It is illuminating to know that the great Hauraki Gulf, with its magic clusters of islands —emeralds set in a sapphire sea—is a drowned river-valley. Beaches that have not yet lost their freshness mark the recent elevation of the coast. Everywhere we perceive the tool-marks of the demiurgic powers. The flora and the fauna are alike archaic. And we may add that, in many parts of the country, the very soil is too unripe to carry cereals, because it has never been enriched by decayed foliage.

Not a little of the book is new, and in parts the authors are at variance with one another. In opposition to Professor Gregory the view of Professor Marshall is that the features of New Zealand have been formed by extensive glacial erosion, though in other respects he would limit the action of huge glaciers. Peculiar facts are often elucidated. Thus, the abundant hanging valleys are found in districts where glaciation has been most severe, and are lacking in others that have never been glaciated.

Professor Gregory shows how the theory of geysers due to the observations of Descloiseaux and the work of Bunsen and Tyndall is confirmed by the geysers of New Zealand, which for four short years had the greatest geyser in the world, as it still has the loftiest waterfall.

Mr. Hogben's chapter on earthquakes is brief but masterly, and it is probably the best contribution on the subject from this part of the world. It adduces confirmatory evidence of the theory that earthquakes are connected with fault-movements and repacking processes. Most of that evidence, though still meagre and disconnected, bears in favor of the view that the floor of the Western Pacific is gradually elevating.

But much of New Zealand remains unexplored. Meanwhile, it appears certain that, with its immeasurable water-power, it will resemble the Scandinavian countries that are almost antipodal, by becoming the centre of the electro-chemical industries of the southern hemisphere.

The first number of the University of California Publications in Geography is an account of "The Russian River, a Characteristic Stream of the California Coast Ranges," by Prof. Rufus S. Holway. The chief problem here discussed is the departure of the river from an open valley, which it follows southeastward for fifty miles and which continues to San Francisco Bay, by flowing westward for twenty miles through a rugged cañon cut in a highland a thousand feet in altitude. The manner of discussion is one that is often followed in modern geographical investigations, in that it is chiefly concerned with the discovery of past conditions as an end in itself, and that it does not proceed sufficiently to the systematic generalization of those conditions, whereby they may be used in the explanatory description of existing features. The essay is illustrated by a number of excellent photo-plates, but the direction in which the views are taken is unfortunately indicated only on the accompanying map, and not in the explanatory legend.

An atlas, or "Mapa escolar," of the Republic of Chili on a scale of 1:1,500,000 has lately been issued. It was prepared by order of the Minister of Public Instruction, Don Domingo Amunátegui Solar, during the Presidency of his Excellency, Sr. Don Pedro Montt, constructed under the direction of Chief Engineer Don José del G. Fuensalida, and printed in ten or more colors by Justus Perthes, of Gotha. The long north-southward extent of nearly 3,000 miles requires the subdivision of the country into nine double-page sections, each of which includes an area of the Pacific on the west and a liberal extension eastward into Argentina. The three strikingly unlike divisions of the republic are well brought out: in the north, the arid or desert district, with salt basins in the highlands and scanty population on the barren coastal lowlands; in the middle, the fertile and well-occupied belt between the lofty Andes and the discontinuous coast ranges; and in the south, the region of glaciers on the higher mountains, lakes in the inner valleys, and long fiords and channels between the countless islands of the coast. The atlas is especially interesting in connection with the Chilian-Argentine boundary and the dispute of some years ago regarding the interpretation of its definition as following "the crest of the Andes between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific." This definition could not be applied in the north, because the crest line is there double, enclosing basins that do not drain to either ocean; nor in the south, where the crest line is deeply cut down by valleys which drain lakes lying at the eastern base of the mountains, the divide between the two oceans there lying on the pampas farther east. The compromise decision made by the late King Edward VII was accepted by the two countries, and the line thus determined is well displayed in the atlas.

The "Common Diseases" (Houghton Mifflin) of Woods Hutchinson is, as usual, a collection of his articles, nineteen in all, already utilized in magazines. A goodly number of diseases are discussed in such a way as to enlighten the ordinary reader and particularly to lessen the vague dread of many of them. We have often found this author somewhat wild in his generalizations and given to too much looseness of statement. In this book these defects are by no means altogether absent, but they seem much less obnoxious than usual. Those to whom the Hutchinsonian breeziness is not wearisome may read him with comfort and profit, not least his chapters on worry, obesity, and drugging. Concerning obesity we miss the illuminating dictum of Mr. Dooley that "when a man is in the prime of life he should be provisioned," leanness being the proper portion of only very young and very old men. There are also entertaining and instructive chapters on insomnia and imaginary diseases, which ought to be helpful to any one who suffers from them. "Necator Americana" (p. 317) is a bad slip in proof-reading, but the correct form appears in the index.

Drama and Music

The publication of the Tudor "Hamlet," Sonnets, and the second part of "Henry VI," which have now reached us, leaves but two volumes in this series (Macmillan) forthcoming—"The Tempest" and "Antony and Cleopatra." Prof. George P. Baker, who edits "Hamlet," offers no new theories, yet sifts the evidence of previous judgments, both as to text and interpretation, with the care to be expected of him. The only important omission we have noted is his failure to summarize Prof. A. C. Bradley's masterly analysis of this perplexing character. On page x "1554" should read 1594. Prof. Raymond M. Alden presents the time-honored problems connected with the Sonnets, but is careful not to register his own opinions. From the hasty conclusion that because sonnet sequences were the fashion Shakespeare must throughout have maintained a conventional impersonal attitude, we are duly warned, etc. Nor even at this day can we safely decide between the Earl of Southampton and the Earl of Pembroke as the person addressed; though the bias of the general editors is betrayed by the inclusion as frontispiece of the Earl of Southampton's portrait. "A Lover's Complaint," which was issued in the Thorpe edition of the Sonnets in 1609 and there ascribed to Shakespeare, also forms a part of the present volume. "Henry VI," part ii. is edited by Prof. Charles H. Barnwell.

The last work to which the late Dr. Furnivall put his pen has been completed and issued by his disciple, Mr. John Munro, with the title "'The Troublesome Reign of King John': Being the Original of Shakespeare's 'Life and Death of King John.'" Dr. Furnivall's share of the editing runs to only a few pages, but we may be sure that his plans have been carefully followed. The difficult literary history of this old play is gone into minutely and its service to Shakespeare is fully stated. It is interesting to note that Mr. Munro, catching up a hint of Sir Sidney Lee's, makes out a fairly plausible case for the common authorship of "The Troublesome Reign" and the much-discussed "Leir." The present volume appears as a member of the Shakespeare Library, published by Duffield, of which Prof. I. Gollancz is general editor.

It is evident that both money and pains have been expended upon the production of "Much Ado About Nothing," which Charles Frohman has just made at the Empire Theatre—and for these acknowledgment is due—but the general result is a performance which cannot be ranked above the second rate. And this is in accordance with what might naturally have been expected. It is virtually impossible now to collect at will a company capable of dealing satisfactorily with either Elizabethan prose or blank verse. In the company assembled by Mr. Frohman there are many modern actors of more than common ability, but they proved absolutely incapable of giving to the text the life and color which properly belong to it. Innumerable passages were robbed of point and force by slovenly delivery. Moreover, the romantic spirit of the piece found no expression in the tameness and invariableness of the stage action of the modern school. John Drew, by far the greater part of whose professional life has been devoted to modern and semi-farcical social drama, was utterly unable to give to Benedick the authority, the brilliancy, or the distinction brought to it by actors of the calibre of Lester Wallack or Henry Irving. He was effective in the church and challenge scenes—where he emphasized the soldierly side of the character, but elsewhere indulged far too freely in his own mannerisms and the tricks of low comedy. In some respects his impersonation was inferior to that of E. H. Sothern. Nor was Laura Hope Crews equal to the part of Beatrice. She had nothing of the great lady about her, and her wit, ever suggestive of the carefully calculated impromptu, lacked fire and spontaneity. Her "Kill Claudio!" was but a feeble manifestation of outraged womanhood. The part is, as yet, too large for her in every way, but her attempt was intelligent. The Dogberry of Hubert Druce was not a bad embodiment, but the actor made the mistake of putting an excessive stress upon his verbal blunders, as if the constable were inventing them for his own amusement. Most of the players affected a modernity of speech and style which was ridiculously inappropriate to a piece of this romantic character. An amusing illustration of the fallacy of this device was afforded in the case of the Don John, the Bastard, who uttered his ferocious sentiments with a placidity of feature and serenity of tone which might have been comic if they had not been so stupid.

Josef Stransky has procured for the New York Philharmonic the right of the first performance in America of Richard Strauss's latest work, a "Festival Prelude," for organ and orchestra. This score will have its first hearing at the inauguration of Vienna's new concert hall on October 19.

The house in which Wagner composed "Lohengrin" is not to be turned into a distillery after all. The King of Saxony, on hearing that this was to be done, expressed his disapproval, and the young Crown Prince, who is an enthusiastic Wagnerite, promptly took up the matter, about which he conferred with prominent artists. Furthermore, a wealthy Dresdener, who has given large sums to artistic projects, has announced his intention to purchase the "Lohengrin" house and convert it exclusively into a Wagner Museum.

The most important product of the Verdi centenary will be the publication of his correspondence. For sixty years (1840-1900) he habitually made sketches of the more important letters he wrote. These sketches, bound in five volumes, have been in the care of his niece, Mme. Carrara, since his death. She has also placed at the disposal of the publishers thousands of letters, telegrams, and cards sent to Verdi, including many by famous contemporaries. Among the treasures hoarded by Mme. Carrara is a "King Lear" libretto. During the last years of Verdi's life, there were occasional rumors that he was writing a "Lear" opera; but in truth he never got beyond the libretto, which he arranged himself. The oldest among the Verdi manuscripts is a "History of the Popes."

Verdi's Requiem Mass and three of his operas will be heard at Milan the coming season, the operas being "Falstaff" (with Scotti), the juvenile "Nabuco," and his first great success, "Ernani." The conductors will be Toscanini, Mancinelli, Mugnone, and Serafin. The last-named will have the honor of conducting "Parsifal."

Operatic competition does not seem to result in disaster in Paris. The management of the Grand Opéra reports an exceptionally favorable season, in spite of the rivalry not only of the Opéra-Comique, but of the newly founded Champs Elysées, the manager of which boasts of having taken in 1,213,620 francs at seventy performances. It is said that this manager, M. Astruc, has his eyes on the Grand Opéra when the seven-year lease of MM. Messager and Broussan has expired. Other candidates for the place are Gailhard and Gunsbourg. M. Astruc promises "Parsifal" in German, next January, with leading German artists. The Grand Opéra made a special arrangement with the German publishers, whereby it is enabled to use the orchestral parts four months before the copyright expires. The Opéra-Comique has also promised a "Parsifal," but it is not likely that this promise will be kept.

Ferruccio Busoni will leave Berlin in a few weeks to assume the directorship of the Bologna Conservatory of Music. He will also conduct the Bologna Symphony Orchestra, which consists of ninety players.

Maud Powell believes that women should play in symphony and other orchestras if they want the work. But "if they accept the work, they should be prepared to accept no privileges because of their sex." John C. Freund suggests that an orchestra of women should be established in New York with Maud Powell as conductor. Such an orchestra would not be a new thing. Women ensemble players are rapidly coming to the fore.

Gustav Mahler's version of Weber's "Oberon" has been produced successfully in Cologne. Weber wrote this opera hastily in order to keep his promise to a London manager. He intended to rewrite it, but died before he could begin the task. There is much entrancing melody in the opera, but the spoken dialogue marred it. Mahler changed this dialogue into recitative and melody, using Weber motives throughout. He wished to produce it in New York while he was one of the conductors of the Metropolitan, but got no encouragement.

The majority of the actors and actresses of the theatres in Germany have an income not exceeding $500 a year, while more than one-third of them earn only half that sum. Among the singers connected with the opera houses, there are a few stars who earn up to $10,000, or even more; but $1,500 is reckoned a very good income, even for those who take the leading parts. Chorus singers get at best $450 a year, but most of them earn much less than that. Dancers average about the same as the choristers, and, like them, they are kept busy eight or nine hours a day. Even solo dancers get only $500 to $750 a year. These figures are based on careful investigations by the Reichs-Arbeitsblatt.

Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," which is an example of modern harmony without melody, will have its first production in an English version next season in the English provinces by Ernst Denhof's opera company. Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" also will be done in English. Six of Wagner's operas are included in Mr. Denhof's scheme, besides Gluck's "Orfeo," Mozart's "Magic Flute," and Strauss's "Elektra." Thomas Beecham will conduct some of these operas.

Art

"Symbolism of Animals and Birds Represented in English Church Architecture," by Arthur H. Collins, is to be published by McBride, Nast & Co.

The fourth volume of Lanciani's "Storia degli Scavi di Roma" (Rome: Loescher), covers the period from 1566 to 1605, and the reign of six Popes, Pius V, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, Gregory XIV, Innocent IX, and Clement VIII. From the standpoint of general history this was a half-century of unusual significance, for in it the position of the Papacy as a great temporal power was solidified, and the old régime of family Popes, who used their elevation to aggrandize their relations, was definitely superseded. From the standpoint of the archæologically inclined the period is less vividly interesting than those that preceded it. Only one work of ancient art of prime importance was then brought to light, the fresco of "the Aldobrandini marriage." But the investigation of the catacombs was inaugurated under Gregory XIII (1578) by the discovery on the Via Salaria of the first catacomb known to modern times, and many of the most prominent features of the Rome of the present day are due to the restless activity of Sixtus V. To him we owe, for example, the fan-like arrangement of streets that radiate from S. Maria Maggiore, the building of the Acqua Felice, the erection of obelisks, the placing of statues of Sts. Peter and Paul on the columns of Aurelius and Trajan, the re-establishment of the statues of the Dioscuri before the Quirinal Palace. Against him, besides much else, must be reckoned the wanton destruction of the magnificent remains of the Septizonium of Septimius Severus at the southeast of the Palatine, and the removal of the ancient structures of the patriarchal palace by St. John Lateran. Sixtus cared much for his city, but little for antiquity. The municipal council voted him a statue for his services in the restoration of prosperity and public security; but when he died (1590), the magistrates announced the fact thus: "On this day our holy Lord Pope Sixtus V, amid universal joy and gratification, has ended his life"! The collection of ancient material for new building projects went merrily forward during this half-century, as it had done before, but the visible ruins of antiquity had already assumed by this time substantially their present aspect. Only the Baths of Caracalla, apparently on account of their remote and isolated situation, continued to be exposed to piratical devastation till a time within the memory of men yet living.

The runic crosses of Bewcastle and Ruthwell have been fertile matter of controversy. Especially the Ruthwell Cross bearing a portion of a poem on the legend of the cross has with many passed for one of the oldest monuments of the English language and decoration. Prof. Albert S. Cook devotes an elaborate monograph to the subject, "The Date of the Ruthwell and Bewcastle Crosses," separately reprinted from The Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences by the Yale University Press. Professor Cook's conclusion is that the inscriptions, though archaic in form, contain also very late spellings, and can point to no early date. The figure sculpture and ornamentation suggest a date about the middle of the twelfth century. He supposes we have to do with monastic columns of Continental derivation set up by David I of Scotland. About the time of publication, Rivoira, in the Burlington Magazine, arrived at an identical conclusion on grounds solely archæological. His opinion has since been contested by Mr. Lethaby and Sir Martin Conway, both of whom assume the existence of an accomplished school of sculpture in Anglia in the seventh century. The existence of such a school is most doubtful, and nothing that these critics have advanced seems to us to offset the evidently late and Romanesque look of these crosses. Professor Cook seems to us to have made out his case. In fact, much additional evidence for his dating might have been got from paging over Westwood's facsimiles of manuscript miniatures. There are found exact parallels for the figures and for the interesting combination of geometrical and naturalistic ornament which we find on the Bewcastle Cross. Furthermore, it is hard to escape the conviction that the rinceaux on both crosses are specifically Romanesque and French. With the Coptic examples cited by Lethaby and Conway they have only the remotest connection. Again one who knows the French tomb-slabs of the twelfth century will see merely a vertical adaptation of familiar motives in these two crosses. No reversal of the conclusion reached by Professor Cook with fairly appalling thoroughness is to be expected.

To the Country House Library (McBride, Nast) are added two new volumes. Charles Edward Hooper, in his "Reclaiming the Old House," gives a great deal of sound advice to those who, with moderate means and some antiquarian taste, wish to establish themselves in modest country homes. He is probably justified in assuming, as he does, that people of this type are, as a rule, ignorant of methods of construction and have little knowledge of country life. His book contains a large number of plates, showing old, and often abandoned, houses that may be suitable for, or that have been so altered as to become, comfortable and attractive places of residence. Aymar Embury, 2d, in his "The Dutch Colonial House," gives us an attractive survey of the modes of construction, and the architectural forms, if they may be thus dignified, employed by the early Dutch farmer who settled in this country, illustrating his text with many good plates. Quaint and interesting as these examples are, we surely cannot afford to take them very seriously. Those of us who find the antique attractive are all too likely to overlook crudities, and even ugliness, in constructions which are old; and are thus prevented from the cultivation of good taste without which we can have no hope of advance in architectural design.

James Wall Finn, mural painter, died Wednesday in Giverny, near Paris. He was born in New York about forty-five years ago, and studied art here and in Paris. He worked for a while as an interior decorator for McKim, Mead & White, and for Carrere & Hastings. He decorated the Public Library, the Hotel Astor, the Knickerbocker Hotel, and the Century Theatre.

Finance

THE AUTUMN MARKETS.

This week the financial markets, here and abroad, entered on what is perhaps the most interesting period of the year. This is particularly true of the American markets, for the interior now begins to draw heavily on its New York balances. Last year the surplus reserve of New York banks, which had already been falling at the end of August, almost disappeared by September 7, and was raised to a respectable figure only by reducing loans $46,000,000 in three weeks. Call money rose in 1912 from 3½ per cent. at the end of August to 7 per cent. at the end of September. In 1906, September brought a deficit in New York bank reserves; in 1905, a September deficit was avoided only by a $73,000,000 loan reduction. Call money went to 7 per cent. at the end of September, 1905, and to 40 per cent. at the beginning of the month in 1906.

Four or five months ago it was very generally believed that a strain of great violence would be witnessed in the period now immediately before us. To take the most extreme predictions: Germany was, by autumn, to be in the grasp not only of extremely tight money, but of paralyzing industrial reaction. Paris was to be witnessing serious failures and defaults. London was to be fighting to keep its gold from being depleted by the demands of the other European markets. New York, and the United States as a whole, were to be drifting into some sort of financial panic.

Nobody pays attention to any of these predictions, now that we have really entered the period when they were to be fulfilled. But at just this particular juncture it should be interesting to point out why the predictions went astray, what has happened to change the situation from what it was in the first quarter of the year, and, not least of all, just what the financial history of the coming season is likely to be.

The predictions of the pessimists went astray, partly because they ignored some underlying elements of strength in the situation, partly because the fear of a general European war was not realized, partly because the progressive increase in certain burdens on credit was checked, and partly because outlying markets (in North and South America especially) were able to provide the gold which Europe needed to replenish its bank reserves. Several things have happened in line with these influences for good. It has turned out that general trade conditions, in America especially, but in Europe also, were much sounder than many people had supposed. Relations of the great neutral Powers in Europe have come out of the severest of tests more strongly harmonious than they were before.

London and, in a less degree, New York have laid a heavy repressive hand on the mass of new securities which, six months ago, were choking the markets; underwriters have consequently been getting rid of their holdings, and new issues have begun, even at London, to sell at a premium instead of a heavy discount, after their issue. Not only has the United States been able to spare $43,000,000 gold for Europe without inconvenience, but Brazil and Argentina have sent thirty to forty millions. As for the coming "American panic," the past few months have shown that panics do not come on a business community doing a conservative business, with merchants' shelves stocked only for immediate and peremptory needs. On the contrary, such a state of things means repeated quickening of legitimate industry.

When one comes down to prediction, the first fact of interest is that money rates were going lower, especially in New York, through the very month of August. That usually means a relaxing strain, a full preparation for autumn needs, and vanishing expectation of money stringency. Money should normally go higher in the autumn, even in an ordinary year. But London is now beginning to predict that the Bank of England rate will not rise this season above its present 4½ per cent.; it was 5 at the beginning of the year. Paris will probably continue to hunt for gold (unless the past year's money-hoarders solve the problem); in London and Berlin, however, the central banks are unusually strong.

The fact appears to be that nearly all of the world's great markets have prepared for autumn on the basis of the worst apprehensions of last spring. To a large extent, this would warrant the inference that they have overprepared. The first test of how far this overpreparation has gone should occur with this week's completion of the "quarterly settlements" at Berlin and elsewhere. The second should be witnessed when the traditional season for New York's heaviest shipments of currency to the interior begins—say a week or ten days hence. We shall then know how far the Treasury deposits have helped the situation. The third test possibly may come through a legitimate demand for gold imports to New York from Europe. It would be important to see how Europe would meet such a demand. If we have really easy money, and if our Government deposits find their proper lodging-place, we may need none of Europe's gold.

PROFESSOR KITTREDGE'S ANNIVERSARY BOOK

At the end of the past academic year Professor Kittredge completed twenty-five years of teaching in Harvard University. A number of his colleagues, desiring to celebrate this date in a term of service which has been unusually significant for the advancement of American learning, planned the publication of a congratulatory volume, "Anniversary Papers." A review of the book will be found on another page of this issue of the Nation.

A limited edition of "Anniversary Papers" was printed and copies may be procured from Ginn and Company, Trade Department, 29A Beacon Street, Boston, until the edition is exhausted. "Anniversary Papers" is a quarto volume of 470 pages, bound in green cloth, stamped with gold. The price is $5.00 net. The publishers reserve the right to return any remittances that are received after the present edition is exhausted, as no subsequent impression will be made.

RECENT BOOKS OF NOTE

An Advanced English Grammar

By GEORGE LYMAN KITTREDGE and FRANK C. FARLEY .....80 cents

This grammar is distinguished by a thorough and careful treatment of the advanced problems of syntax and analysis. Constructions are explained in accordance with the historical facts, as well as with the laws of thought. As a reference book for work in English literature and composition it is easily the leading book in its field.

Essentials in Journalism

By HARRY FRANKLIN HARRINGTON and THEODORE T. FRANKENBERG.....$1.75

A practical and comprehensive discussion by men of wide experience in actual newspaper work, taking up both the practice and the philosophy of every phase of their profession. As a textbook in journalism it is unsurpassed.

History of Modern Elementary Education

By SAMUEL CHESTER PARKER.....$1.50

The development of the elementary school is here traced from the first vernacular schools of mediæval cities to the present. The author shows how educational practice has been influenced by changing social conditions and by the theories of the foremost educational reformers.

Schiller

By EUGEN KÜHNEMANN. Translated by KATHERINE ROYCE. Introduction by JOSIAH ROYCE $3.00

The most adequate treatment of the poet's personality and life work is here made available for American readers. The author carefully traces Schiller's mental and spiritual development and shows his relation to predecessors and successors.

British Social Politics

By CARLTON HAYES.....$1.75

The most important acts in the Liberal programme of the last seven years—such as the Lloyd George Budget, the defeat of the House of Lords, and National Workmen's Insurance—are here treated at length. The text of each act is given, its historical setting explained, and extracts inserted from the liveliest speeches in Parliament for and against it.

History as Past Ethics

By PHILIP VAN NESS MYERS.....$1.50

A distinct contribution to historical literature and the historical viewpoint. History is treated in its ethical significance, and there is a detailed study of moral life in all the stages of historic evolution.

Aristotle on the Art of Poetry

Translated and adapted by LANE COOPER 80 cents

This amplified version of the "Poetics" aims to make Aristotle's treatise immediately intelligible to the general reader through interpolated comments after obscure passages. In particular, Aristotle's examples are expanded, and additional examples from Shakespeare, Milton, and other familiar sources given.

Social Forces in Modern Literature

By PHILO M. BUCK, Jr.....$1.00

A study of the attitude of the six leading European writers of the past century towards the problems arising from our complex social life. The authors discussed are Montesquieu, Rousseau, Lessing, Goethe, Wordsworth, and Shelley.

IMPORTANT TEXTBOOKS

Economics Texts

By Members of the Department of Political Economy, University of Chicago

OUTLINES OF ECONOMICS DEVELOPED IN A SERIES OF PROBLEMS

160 pages, interleaved, 12mo., cloth; price, $1.00; postpaid, $1.13.

MATERIALS FOR THE STUDY OF ELEMENTARY ECONOMICS

900 pages, 8vo, cloth; price, $2.75; postpaid, $3.00.

The "Outlines of Economics Developed in a Series of Problems" consists of a careful analytical syllabus of the subjects usually covered in the introductory economics course, accompanied by some 1,200 questions and problems. The student is enabled through the use of the inductive method embodied in this book to comprehend the subject clearly, and to construct in outline the entire system.

The "Materials for the Study of Elementary Economics" contains a wealth of illustrative material gathered from the entire field of economic literature, both scholastic and commercial, which has been thoroughly tried out during the past three years in the economic classes of the University of Chicago. Brief explanatory notes will serve to guide the student in an understanding of selections set before him.

FIRST-YEAR MATHEMATICS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS

378 pages, 12mo, cloth; price, $1.00; postpaid, $1.15.

SECOND-YEAR MATHEMATICS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS

296 pages, 12mo, cloth; price, $1.50; postpaid, $1.63.

TEACHER'S MANUAL FOR FIRST-YEAR MATHEMATICS

176 pages, 12mo, cloth; price, 80 cents; postpaid, 89 cents.

By GEORGE W. MYERS, Professor of the Teaching of Mathematics and Astronomy, College of Education, University of Chicago, and the Instructors in Mathematics in the University High School.

The most striking departure from the old method of teaching consists in the fusing of arithmetic, algebra, and geometry into a single study. To confine the student to the handling of symbols for one year and to the study of forms for another is to shut out all possibility of natural development. Instead he is now led to express geometrical facts by algebra, and to illustrate algebraic ones by geometry, and thus to grasp the essential facts that underlie both.

THE COLLEGE CHAUCER

EDITED BY HENRY NOBLE MACCRACKEN, PH.D., Assistant Professor of English, Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University. With notes, glossary, etc.

THE COLLEGE CHAUCER provides with due regard to the moderate size, attractive page, and readable print required in a modern textbook, as much of Chaucer as can be given in a single volume. The teacher may welcome the opportunity offered here of varying his course from year to year without change of text, and the possibilities presented of full cross-reference and helpful "outside" readings. The editorial apparatus has been compressed within the smallest possible compass, while a glossary of greater than average fullness supplies the place of the usual notes. The Appendix contains only such additional matter as the beginner absolutely needs before attempting to read Middle English. Confusion in morphology and pronunciation is greatly lessened in this edition by etymologies given in the glossary, which supply source-materials for correction of manuscript peculiarities. On the other hand, the student has not been relieved of his proper labor by any device of friendly dots or italics. Footnotes are reserved for the indication of necessary variation from manuscript readings.

ENGLISH LYRICAL POETRY

From Its Origins to the Present Time

BY EDWARD BLISS REED, Assistant Professor of English, Yale University.

"He has brought to his task the necessary knowledge of the scholar and student of literature, and, what is much rarer—taste, judgment, and a broad perspective." —The Athenæum.

"Well balanced historical study of the whole field of English lyrical poetry."—American Library Association Book List.

"Professor Reed's new history of English lyrical poetry fills a long-felt want. Professor Reed has a genius for reconstructing a period, and a quick eye for essentials. English Lyrical Poetry will undoubtedly be useful in college courses, but it can also be heartily recommended to the gentle 'general reader.'"—H. M. Boynton in the New York Times Saturday Review.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY'S IMPORTANT BOOKS OF THE EARLY FALL

Letters and Recollections
OF ALEXANDER AGASSIZ
With a Sketch of His Work and Life by George R. Agassiz

In the annals of American science, the work of Alexander Agassiz is quite as notable as that of his father, Louis Agassiz. No less remarkable than the definite advances in science due to his energy and ability was the effectiveness and charm of his personality. His Letters and Recollections, arranged and compiled by his son, with a sketch of his work and life, present him to the reader fully and adequately. Dealing, as they do, with his explorations in many fields, with his steady constructive work in the building of a great museum, they present a story of a life of fascinating interest.

Illustrated. $3.50 net. Postage 21 cents.

GREEK IMPERIALISM

By William Scott Ferguson. This brilliant and scholarly work is of special interest to present-day readers in view of the close parallelism between the development of imperial government in Greece and certain present tendencies to be seen in our own day, notably in England and America. $2.00 net. Postage 15 cents.

THE NATION AND THE EMPIRE

By Lord Milner. This important volume brings together Lord Milner's more notable speeches and addresses through an active and successful public life. No serious student of the present tendencies in government should miss reading it. $3.00 net. Postage extra.

NEWSPAPER WRITING and EDITING

By Willard G. Bleyer. "No one but a practical newspaper man could write such a book. It is an account of how to be a thoroughgoing newspaper man—reporter, deskman, correspondent, make-up man, or headline writer. I think it admirable."—Robert Lincoln O'Brien, Editor of the Boston Herald. $1.65 net. Postpaid.

REPRESENTATIVE CITIES of the U. S.

By Caroline W. Hotchkiss. This book, which presents a new idea in the teaching of geography, is devoted to descriptions of those cities in our country which best represent the industries and life of their sections, and shows how the physical surroundings of a town affect its development. Fully illustrated. 65 cents net. Postpaid.

LINCOLN AND SLAVERY

By Albert E. Pillsbury. A valuable contribution to Lincoln literature, as helping to a true understanding of this greatest of all Americans in the supreme act of his life. 75 cents net. Postage extra.

A CONFEDERATE GIRL'S DIARY

By Sarah Morgan Dawson. This diary of a girl's life in Baton Rouge and New Orleans during the Civil War is one of the most complete, vivid, and interesting documents of the kind that has come to light. Illustrated. $2.00 net. Postage 14 cents.

THE WRITINGS OF JAMES BRECK PERKINS

France Under Mazarin — 2 Volumes

France Under Louis XV — 2 Volumes

France Under the Regency

France in the American Revolution

Mr. Perkins's well-known and authoritative historical works, now put together in a uniform edition, cover continuously and with practical completeness what is perhaps the most interesting and important period of French history, to wit, the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. The six volumes of the edition comprise the four works listed above. That there is still a demand for them in the separate editions shows that the author knew how to impart the interest that he himself felt in the portrayal of "the progress of human intelligence, the development of social life, the records of commerce and art, of taxation and legislation, forms of government, and phases of thought," as well as in the characters who were conspicuous figures in the times of which he writes.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1913.

The Week

The special Congressional election in the Third District of Maine was fought over with peculiar intensity. It was the first test of party strength, on traditionally debatable fighting-ground, since Roosevelt finished his meteoric campaign, since the Republican party received the stunning blow of being placed third in the popular vote of the nation, since the beginning of President Wilson's Administration, and especially since the absolute identification of the Democratic party with a sharp reduction of the tariff, now on the eve of going into effect. The Republican candidate has been elected by a plurality of about five hundred, being a little less than the Republican plurality in the Congressional election of last November; but as the Progressives had no candidate in that election, this must be accounted a distinct gain for the Republicans. The Progressives polled a vote of only about 6,500, as against 13,236 for Roosevelt last year; and this in spite of a most strenuous campaign on their part—an outcome that falls in line with a long series of indications all over the country of the want of staying power in the Progressive ranks. As for the relation of the vote to President Wilson and the Democratic tariff policy, inasmuch as the number of voters in this Maine district who cast their ballots for the Democratic candidate for Congress on Monday was about 14,600, while the total number of votes cast for Wilson for President was 14,692, it is evidently impossible—in spite of the Democrats' disappointment in not carrying the district—to find in the result any trustworthy sign of that anti-tariff-reform reaction upon which the Republicans are counting.

"Foreign books were returned to the free list as originally provided in the House." Thus ran a brief but important item in the Washington dispatches reporting Monday's happenings in the Senate. By foreign books is meant, of course, books in foreign languages. The proposal to put a tariff on them led to the most vigorous protests on all sides, for it was the least defensible of all taxes—a tax on learning. Fortunately, those protests were so successful, although made at the last moment, that no one can doubt, hereafter, that it pays to oppose unyieldingly a deliberately planned injustice. With reason triumphing in this case, there is no ground why anybody should despair of yet getting the similarly incomprehensible tax on art removed when the conferrees of the two houses meet. We again urge every one interested to make it clear to Mr. Underwood how widespread is the feeling of disgust at so backward and anti-democratic a proposal.

The House of Representatives did the expected thing in passing the Hetch-Hetchy bill. The Committee on Public Lands had unanimously approved the scheme, and had submitted a report piling up all the pleas that could possibly be made in its favor, while giving extremely scant attention to the protests of those who are earnestly opposing the project as one that will destroy the distinctive character of a wonderful national park. Upon many readers of this report, it will doubtless make the impression of having shown that the possession of the Hetch-Hetchy water supply is indispensable to the welfare of San Francisco. This, however, is by no means the fact. Not only does the report fail to show that the Hetch-Hetchy supply is indispensable; it does not even assert that such is the case. All that is contended, in the repeated references made to the matter throughout the report, is that the Hetch-Hetchy supply is the most accessible or the most economical source available to San Francisco; and very little indication is even given of the degree of this advantage. We have no doubt that a large part of the favorable vote was due to the false impression, conveyed not by the specific statements of fact, but by the tone and temper of the report, that the San Franciscans have no other practical recourse.

Mr. Taft has the courage of his convictions on the subject of the judiciary. So far from assuming that "good Lord, good devil" attitude which some persons, even though they dislike the idea of recall of judges, adopt towards that scheme, he referred to it, in his American Bar Association address, as "the preposterous innovation of judicial recall." And the reasons for its preposterousness were clearly indicated in the address, both directly and by implication. Mr. Taft urged, what it seems impossible that any person who has thought seriously on the subject can doubt, that not subjection to removal by an irresponsible majority of voters, but independence of passing clamors and assurance of permanent tenure are needed to raise the quality of the administration of justice by American judges. That accessibility to some process less difficult than that of impeachment may be desirable, Mr. Taft does not deny; but he refers with fully justified scorn to the loose and ignorant identification of the recall nostrum, by some of its advocates, with the method of removal "by joint resolution of the House and Senate, in analogy to the method of removing judges in England through an address of both houses to the king." This method, which has long existed in some of our States, manifestly provides, as the ex-President says, an opportunity for "full defence, hearing, and argument." And he might have added, what is no less important, that the vote for removal is the recorded action of a small and definite number of conspicuous men, whereas in the proposed recall by popular vote the odium of an unjust vote cannot be brought home to any of the thousands who deposit their ballot in secrecy against a judge who may have incurred, whether through merit or through fault, the immediate dislike of a majority.

We cannot sympathize with the position of Secretary Daniels in refusing to accept the resignations of naval officers who wish to return to civil life, or to grant the applications of those who wish to go on the retired list voluntarily. Mr. Daniels is of the opinion that an officer educated for the navy at Government expense has no right to resign when he can get a better opportunity in civil life. But the contrary has been the policy of the Navy Department since the beginning of this Government, with the exception of wartime. It has always been felt that these resignations were of benefit to the whole service by accelerating the flow of promotion, and by increasing the number of trained officers available in war time. It was conclusively shown during the war with Spain that officers who had resigned were only too willing to volunteer for war service, unless prevented by reasons of health. They have always felt themselves under a moral obligation to rejoin the navy in a national emergency. At this very moment, the House Naval Committee is considering testimony with a view to relieving the stagnation in promotion now existing in the navy's personnel. Yet the Secretary of the Navy is deliberately increasing that stagnation by refusing to permit men to resign or to retire voluntarily.

In the matter of permitting officers of thirty and forty years' service to retire, Secretary Garrison has taken with the army the same rigid position. The Nation has always been opposed to the unnecessary increase of the retired list, repeatedly calling attention, during the Spanish and Philippine war, to an abuse which Congress finally stopped—the loading up of the retired list with officers who merely served for a day or two as brigadier-generals. It has also urged that there be stricter physical examinations, on entrance into the service, to prevent the breaking down of young officers. But we cannot feel that there would be any grave danger to the Treasury of the United States, or to the services themselves, if Secretary Garrison and Secretary Daniels should permit every officer above the rank of major or commander to retire who so desired. There were twelve such army retirements in 1910, 24 in 1911, 27 in 1912, and there have been only 12 thus far in 1913. Moreover, the officer who wants to get out of the service, or is unhappy because he cannot retire, is not apt to add to the contentment of his comrades, or to be himself at the high-water mark of efficiency.

The Army-Navy football game at the Polo Grounds in November will bring to New York a welcome touch of color. For a city of its size, New York has very little of the brave pageantry of gold lace and epaulets. Even the fraternal, benevolent, and protective orders do not parade as they used to do. Candor compels one to say that the Polo Grounds, in their dingy surroundings of railway trestles and factory chimneys, are not the ideal setting for the brilliant display that has made Franklin Field in late November a very fair approach to the jousting places of European knighthood in its flower. But the poetry of color and motion is one thing, and the increased receipts available at the Polo Grounds is another. It may very well be that the Army-Navy game will set a fashion. The people of New York have had no chance to see first-class football since the big college teams ceased dropping in on Columbia's, which means that the people of this city have been deprived of the most stirring of all athletic spectacles.

Chicago taxpayers are having an opportunity of comparing the cost of administration under the merit system with that under the spoils system. For two years the county offices were filled by appointment following examination. Then, a few months ago, the State Supreme Court declared the County Civil Service law unconstitutional because of the careless failure of the Legislature to print amendments to the bill. The consequence was to reopen these places to the politicians. Now the County Civil Service Commission estimates that an annual saving of more than a million dollars would be possible by the restoration of civil service rules. Heads of departments managed in some instances to retain a few positions for their personal disposal, and it was absolutely necessary to keep some of the old employees, but "there was an agreement that the great bulk of the county positions should be pooled in the hands of the County Committee." This Committee proceeded to allot the places to party leaders, according to the vote polled in their districts. Thirty of the resulting appointees are "pluralists," being on the pay-rolls of the State, city, and park districts. Nine of these are members of the Legislature! Not only is incompetence the rule in offices so filled, but the only limit to the number of employees "needed" is the tax limit.

The familiar habit of staying at home and letting somebody else do the voting was conspicuous in an election in San Francisco the other day, in which 51,000 ballots were cast in favor of a bond issue of $3,500,000 for the extension of the municipal railway system, and 13,000 were cast against it. The total vote was less than half of the registration. Yet the issue cannot be called an unimportant one. Nor were the voters without a basis for deciding it. For a year the city has operated a short stretch of road. Had it been sufficiently successful with it to be entrusted with more? All that the election settled was that a large majority of a considerable minority of the voters thought that it had. To the country at large this experiment in municipal ownership will be of great interest, owing to its scale. It is to be tried, too, under conditions which ought to make it comparatively easy for the citizens to judge of its success, for the city will be a competitor with the present private system. The duplication of tracks involved is unfortunate, but is an incident in the failure of the city and the company to effect an agreement regarding extension of the latter's franchises.

Among the sweet uses found in the agricultural adversity of Kansas is the impulse it has given to the employment of county advisers. This new profession, in the words of a Topeka official, offers a golden opportunity to country lads who now "go in for business and professional clerkships at pay that rarely reaches an appreciable figure." Five Illinois counties, with the assistance of Chicago firms, have already hired graduates in agriculture to give their farmers counsel in planting, reaping, and maintaining the fertility of their land. For $3,000 they can have a soil analyst and crop and stock expert who, when duties crowd upon him, commands the aid of the whole State University corps. It seems likely that in time only the number of counties will limit the profession. As one way of making the agricultural college come to the people, and overcoming the handicap under which untrained farmers labor, the innovation is said to appeal even to those who think illiberally of higher education. In Illinois, to see your schooled neighbor getting ahead of you; in Kansas, to watch the inroads of the drought—is a potent argument for procuring the public services of a "demonstrator" of advanced farming ideas.

The acclamation of Harry K. Thaw

by the people of Sherbrooke may be explained more precisely than by saying that human nature is queer. The latest Thaw episode shows that human nature is amazingly persistent. After several thousand years of civilization the primitive instincts reassert themselves. There is the primitive hostility to law, and there is the primitive hostility to fact. The crowd pays respect to law in the abstract, but is inclined to make an exception of every specific violation of the law. The crowd acknowledges the authority of fact in the abstract, but, in the specific instance, is too often tempted to assert that what is so is really not so. The Tichborne claimant was proved to be an impostor; therefore he was the rightful heir. Dr. Cook has been shown to be a liar; therefore a good many people shake their heads profoundly and assert that there must be something behind it all, the apparent conclusion being that behind Cook the liar is Cook the man who told the truth. Harry K. Thaw killed Stanford White; but he is not a murderer. He has been an inmate of a lunatic asylum; therefore he is not insane. He is a fugitive from justice; therefore he ought not to be handed back into custody. To an extraordinary extent human nature rejects the work of human progress. We have built up society and retain the anti-social habits. We have celebrated the triumph of science and retain the superstitious frame of mind which rejects evidence and fact.

Little by little they are taking the schoolboy's long vacation from him. The time when the schoolhouse and yard were let severely alone for three full months, except for occasional visits from the conscientious janitor, has passed away in many communities, and is rapidly passing in most of the rest. If this development adds a new touch of bitterness to the coming of the fateful month of September, the same stoicism that has stood the pupil in good stead heretofore must sustain him still. In many instances, however, the work that is invading his former period of leisure has a novelty that cannot fail to commend it. There is agriculture, for example. Even boys and girls with a keen appreciation of unmortgaged time will be reluctant to hand over to the tender mercies of weeds and parasites the acre of corn and potatoes which they have planted and tended in accordance with the latest principles of scientific farming. To stiffen this interest, an inspector will appear at intervals during the summer, with words of praise or censure for the way in which the crop has been looked after.

In an article in the London Economist, entitled "The Revival of the Piano Trade," President Wilson might find interesting confirmation of his favorite view on the wholesomeness of vigorous competition. It appears that some fifteen or twenty years ago British makers of pianos allowed themselves to be completely outdistanced by their German competitors. The Germans had been quicker than the British in adopting a number of improvements in piano construction, "with the natural result," says the Economist, "that they steadily gained ground while we lost it, and even our home market ultimately was flooded with the German article." In this country, under the good old protectionist rule which we are now shaking off, a flood of this nature would, as a matter of course, have called for the building up of a higher tariff dike to keep it out; but in free-trade England no such thing was possible. Well, what happened? Was the British piano industry ruined? Not at all. The pessimists who thought it would be, says the Economist, "reasoned without an adequate knowledge of the grit and doggedness which characterizes the captains of most British industries." The British piano-makers had a hard task in making head against the prestige which, through their want of quickness, they had allowed the Germans to obtain; but they stuck to the job and have now fully turned the tide. They have stopped the German inroad on the home market, and have regained in large measure their old place in foreign markets. The number of foreign pianos imported is less now than it was eight years ago, while the number of British pianos exported has more than doubled in the same time. The affair is not one of world-shaking importance, but it is an excellent object-lesson on the basic elements of wholesome economic policy.

Since Theodor Herzl first brought forward the idea of a Jewish autonomous state in Palestine under Turkish suzerainty, the Zionist movement has grown in strength, but the drift has been steadily away from Herzl's ambitious plan. The overthrow of Abdul Hamid II and the advent of the Young Turks were serious checks to Zionist aspirations. The new régime at Constantinople aimed at bringing the various provinces of the Turkish Empire into closer coordination. A self-governing Jewish state in Palestine was necessarily at variance with the new ideas of Turkish nationalism. The recent crushing defeat of the Turks raises an additional obstacle. With five-sixths of its European possessions lost, the Porte is less likely than ever to consent to a scheme which would threaten the dismemberment of its territory in Asia. The leaders of the Zionist movement have recognized the logic of facts. The political phase of the movement has fallen into the background, and greater stress has been laid upon the economic conquest of Palestine through the establishment of a large Jewish agricultural population. The break with the original idea of Zionism is marked at the congress meeting by the formal secession of Max Nordau, the foremost supporter of Theodor Herzl's views.

Either the loyalty and discipline of the Japanese people have been exaggerated or else the population of Tokio is not typical of Japan. The frequent recurrence of rioting in the Mikado's capital certainly betrays no inclination on the part of a considerable number of his subjects to accept without protest whatever governmental policy is imposed upon them in the Mikado's name. It is a changing Japan, with Parliament defying the Elder Statesmen and women haranguing the crowds. It is a Japan experiencing the growing pains of a mere nation that is becoming a Power. The country is torn between imperialistic dreams and a crying need for peace and retrenchment. Those intimately acquainted with present conditions in Japan declare that we have no conception of how crushing is the burden of taxation upon the people, and how fierce is the struggle for economic existence. Poverty brings discontent, and the people of Tokio riot. That they should be rioting in favor of a stronger foreign policy, more soldiers, more battleships, in other words, more poverty, is not an unknown phase of crowd psychology.

Burlington Public Lib

THE LOPSIDED INCOME TAX.

Senator Root was in a strong position to make his speech in the Senate last week, in protest against excessive discrimination in the levying of the income tax. Just where he would draw the line, he did not say; like many of Mr. Root's utterances, his speech dealt with the broad principles of the question rather than with details. And he was in a strong position to say what he did, first because he had firmly advocated the approval of the income-tax amendment by the State of New York, and secondly because he admits the propriety of a graded tax. There are objections to a Federal income tax, and there are objections to a graded income tax; but in the face of these objections, Mr. Root, like many others, is convinced that the argument in favor of these things outweighs the argument against them. He falls back, as thoughtful men in general fall back, upon the hope that the representatives of the people will exercise their powers in these matters with sobriety, and in a spirit of fairness and good will.

The bill as originally reported exempted all incomes up to $4,000. The modifications since made in this regard have not altered the character of this exemption, indeed they have rather intensified it; for the $3,000 limit applies only to men without wife or child, while a married man with two children has an exemption of $5,000. The effect of an exemption of this sort is to give to all but a small fraction of the people of the country the feeling that their only personal interest in the tax is that of getting its benefits while bearing no share in its burdens. That this is a most undesirable condition, in a democratic republic, ought to require no insistence. With the exception of those who have a hard struggle for the necessities of bare subsistence, every citizen ought to feel that in the contributions towards the maintenance of the government he bears his share, however modest, in some sort of fair proportion, along with the wealthiest. What that fair proportion ought to be, there is no scientific rule for determining, but at least it is not zero. And a like consideration applies to the question of graded rates. The signal advantage of a tax at a uniform percentage of income is that it does not open the door to exploitation that is limited by no principle, and is dependent for its reasonableness solely upon the good sense and good will of the majority. The best thought of the time undoubtedly approves the levying of taxes on those who have a great superfluity at higher rates than on those in moderate circumstances; but the process is not without grave dangers in a democracy. Combining the total exemption of all but a small fraction of the people with the levying of discriminatory rates within that fraction, we have a situation calculated to put the temper of the nation to a severe and critical test.

Now what Mr. Root's speech brings to the fore is a consideration over and above all this, a consideration peculiar to our own system of States united into a nation. Over and above the personal discrimination is the fact that the sectional distribution will be even more lopsided, and that, consequently, many of our States, as States, will be tempted to look upon the tax as solely a thing to be got, and not a thing to be paid. And, since it happens that, through the equal representation of all the States in the Senate, those States which will do nearly all the paying are grossly under-represented in the upper branch of the national Legislature, it is plain that all the danger inherent in a system of high exemption and graded rates is most seriously aggravated under our system of government.

It is plain enough, therefore, that Mr. Root's appeal to what may be called the national conscience of the Senators who represent the more thinly settled and less wealthy States is fully needed. The idea of many of them is evidently that the inequality with which the tax will bear on the various States is not only no objection to it, but a positive recommendation. In point of fact, such inequality, in so far as it fairly corresponds to the ability of the various States to pay, cannot justly be urged as an objection; but there is a point to which the one-sidedness of a scheme of this kind can be carried which offends not only the instinct of equity, but the instinct of sound politics. An object lesson in the exploitation of the wealthy States, light-heartedly given at the very inception of the income-tax régime, and given with many indications of special pleasure in the performance, is calculated to stimulate a spirit which it is not pleasant to see introduced into our national legislation. The Constitutional prohibition of direct taxes except on the basis of apportionment by population was designed as a defence against the possible manifestation of such a spirit. That defence, so far as income taxes are concerned, has been removed; and it will not be a gratifying spectacle to find in the first fruits of that removal an emphatic argument for those who believed in the need of the Constitutional protection.

PATIENT WITH MEXICO.

In quarters where President Wilson's Mexican policy has been regarded with disfavor from the beginning, the attempt is now made to stigmatize that policy as one of failure and humiliation From Vera Cruz we have had dispatches recounting the indignities to which those Americans have been subjected who have made up their minds to comply with the Administration's advice to leave the country. American residents in Mexico City are described as growing restless under the taunts of foreigners—Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans—who say, "What, still here?" There is pungent criticism of Mr. Bryan, upon whom responsibility has presumably been laid for the "weak" features of Washington's diplomacy. On reading these dispatches we at home are expected to share with Americans in Mexico the sense of shame and resentment at a policy of abandonment and scuttle. Whatever may be the original merits of President Wilson's case, we are asked to concur in the simple proposition that no reasons of state and no moral considerations will excuse the sacrifice of this nation's prestige and dignity.

This summary is so clearly false to the sober truth of the Mexican situation, that it would scarcely deserve consideration if it were not for the fact that when argument touches upon the question of national pride some men are apt to grow insensitive both to logic and to facts. Too much stress, therefore, cannot be laid on the truth, plain to all thinking men, that if the prestige and dignity of this Government have indeed been affected, it is an injury which the Government has voluntarily and with open eyes inflicted on itself. It is not fear that has forced us into a policy which its opponents are at liberty to characterize as cowardly, but a rigorous limitation which we have imposed upon ourselves. With regard to Mexico our Government has been acting under a self-denying ordinance. President Taft began the policy of forbearance, and President Wilson has continued it. We have been on guard not so much against Mexico as against ourselves. We have risked a possible temporary impairment of our national prestige out of consideration for that true national honor and dignity which demands that this great nation shall be faithful to its own permanent democratic traditions, to its own fair name, and to the dictates of international justice and peace.

Critics of President Wilson's policy may cry scuttle if they will. But they must forbear from sneering at the same time, as they have been doing, at the idea of a foreign policy based on purely ethical considerations. They have been arguing that it is no concern of ours by what reprehensible means Huerta has made himself the ruler of Mexico. This Government is not called upon to play the rôle of international censor of morals. Possibly we are not. But it is plain that the Administration at Washington cannot be accused at the same time of being cowardly and of being unduly sensitive to ethical considerations. The second accusation kills the first. It may be an unwise policy, but it is not a cowardly policy. Don Quixote was hardly a poltroon. A powerful nation confronted by a nation much weaker than itself can afford to be accused of a policy of scuttle. What it cannot afford is to be accused of playing the bully. How long is it since the outside world was grumbling at our Big Stick diplomacy and our shirt-sleeve diplomacy with regard to Latin America? It is possible to imagine an American citizen in Mexico feeling vexed under the taunts of his European fellow-residents. It is not so easy to imagine him feeling ashamed.

Once for all, then, it is well to put aside all discussion of President Wilson's tactics from the point of view that Mr. Hearst likes to assume. We are making temporary sacrifices in Mexico; but we are doing it out of consideration for our own best interests in the final result and the best interests of the Mexican people. Whether our efforts have been tending in that direction is the real question to be answered. It is the belief of the Administration that its work has not failed, and public opinion in this country is predominantly with the Administration in this belief. It is all very well to argue that the first result of the Lind mission has been to strengthen Huerta's position in the country. We still await evidence on this point. As a result of our intervention Huerta may be a little more liked by the kind of people who liked Huerta before. The Constitutionalists have not rallied to him; and they are all the less likely to submit because of the assurance that armed intervention by this country is not forthcoming. It is the opponents of Mr. Wilson's "weak-kneed" policy who would have united Mexico against us by this time.

THIRTY YEARS OF AN EMPIRE.

Thirty years ago there was driven the last spike of the Northern Pacific Railroad, a simple rusty iron nail, which had also been the first used. With that act there was thrown open to rapid settlement the great Northwestern Empire of this country, for the Northern Pacific was the first rail connection between Oregon, Washington, Montana, and the East. The ceremony took place in the open country in western Montana, and the presence, among hundreds of distinguished visitors from abroad and the United States, of a number of Indian chiefs was particularly significant. The day before, the excursionists had passed a Sioux encampment of more than 2,000 persons, among them many warriors who were present seven years before when Custer was killed and his battalion of cavalry exterminated on the Little Big Horn. Almost up to the last year of construction the advance workers on the Northern Pacific had to be protected by United States troops; but after the opening of this railway there was only one more serious Indian outbreak in the Northwest. The driving of the last spike momentously affected seven great States and Territories, but none so much as the original owners of the land, for it marked the beginning of the end of the old frontier, as it marked the disappearance of the transcontinental mail-coach.

The speeches at the opening of the railway, and at the great celebrations held all along the line from St. Paul to Portland, were not lacking in glowing visions of the future. Here was a stretch of three thousand miles suddenly brought into touch with the outside world. Its broad acres contained untold mineral wealth, and its prairie crops were to feed the entire globe. One had only to scratch the surface to reap the golden harvest, and as for its water powers and forests, why, in them alone were wealth and happiness for millions of the unborn. The gigantic task just completed of running a railway across a little-charted Continent, through hundreds of miles of prairie, desert, "bad lands," and almost primeval forest, stirred men not a little, but it was the future that thrilled them more. Lust for the conquest of nature was strong upon them, and their great victory against seemingly insuperable natural obstacles, which they were celebrating September 3, 1883, was merely to be the prelude to vastly greater conquests. Not Pizarro nor Balboa, nor Lewis and Clarke themselves at the climax of their adventures, were more elated by the new worlds they discovered than were the men of the Northwest when the Northern Pacific's iron rails bound them to the East and gave them access to the markets of England and Europe.

As we look back now it is easy to see that these visions and prophetic forecasts were warranted enough at the time. But the first few years brought only disappointments. The expectations of immediate prosperity were utterly dispelled by the world-wide depression of 1883-1886, which checked the looked-for immigration. Thus, the railway, which had earned $12,603,575 gross in 1884, was earning $900,000 less in 1886, with 250 additional miles of track. The farm products of Montana increased in value by only four million dollars between 1880 and 1890, and in Minnesota the increase was only 22 millions in that decade, as contrasted with no less than 90 millions of dollars in the next. But the time came when the expected prosperity did not come about. The three Northern Pacific Territories, Dakota, Montana, and Washington, were admitted as States in 1889, and their total population of 250,000 in 1880 had become in 1910 2,095,000, while Minnesota grew in the same period from 780,773 souls to 2,075,708. The Northern Pacific itself earned $72,676,138 in 1912 on a mileage of 6,313, and its net profits were $24,312,632. Who shall say what the next thirty years will bring forth in the same section of the United States?

But these material changes are not the only ones that have taken place. Even the disappearance of the buffalo and other big game, the passing of the redskins and the many little army posts whose soldiers kept them in bounds or pursued them when the rapacity of the whites drove them to the warpath—in short, the almost complete transformation of that West which Theodore Roosevelt, the ranchman, described in the eighties is no more striking than the absolute change in the attitude of this Western empire towards the railways themselves. In 1883 the railway builder was the greatest benefactor in the community; to-day he is forgotten, and his successors are too often regarded merely as enemies of society, to be controlled, taxed, and regulated within an inch of their lives. In place of being the greatest asset of the States along its lines, the railway is made an object of suspicion and of hatred—the oppressor of communities, instead of the advance agent of prosperity. In 1870 the States and the Federal Government were ready to make any sacrifice to obtain a Pacific railway. It could have all the land it wanted. Was there not abundance? To-day it is the habit to refer to the land grant of such a line as the Northern Pacific as a "theft of the people's property," without stopping to ask if without it such a road could have maintained itself in its early days, or if its originators, like Jay Cooke, could have been induced to undertake what seemed the impossible task of penetrating the wilderness. With the passing of the pioneer has thus gone a clear understanding of the pioneer's problems.

That this great change in the relations of the railway corporation to the community it serves is in part due to the mistakes or actual wrongdoing of railway managers no one can deny. All the more is it a pity that out of that old feeling of enthusiastic acclaim which marked the running of the first train from St. Paul to Portland there has come the present state of tension and mutual misunderstanding. That was one thing which the orators at the opening of the Northern Pacific did not see in their justified visions of the coming grandeur of their Northwestern empire—just as they did not know that the finding of gold in Alaska would enormously hasten the development of such cities as Tacoma and Seattle. The greater part that was proposed then divine Providence has disposed as they wished. Towns, cities, commonwealths flourish to greatness, as their agricultural lands blossom into riches, and their mines and forests yield up their treasure. It is the human element itself which has proved incalculable.

CHANGING JOURNALISM.

From the point of view of the reading public, the newer journalism is preferable to the old. There has, on the whole, been a general improvement in the daily press in the last twenty years—an all-round speeding up. Newspapers of all classes are better written, more readable, more entertaining, and more attractive than ever they were, and are quite as well informed. Even the greatest of them all, the Times, has been touched with the spirit of modern enterprise at every point, and never reached a higher level of journalistic excellence.

These are the words of Mr. Robert Donald, the president of the British Institute of Journalists, in his recent address at the annual conference of that organization. Himself managing editor of the Daily Chronicle, he speaks with the intimate knowledge of the working journalist, and sketches with vivid pen the many startling changes in the British press. But if he records what he chiefly and sanguinely regards as progress, he also admits the growth of far-reaching changes of a less desirable kind, akin to those that have taken place in journalism on this side of the water. He does not, for instance, deny that commercialization has gone on apace. The "proprietorial system" has almost disappeared, the corporation having taken the place of the individual owner, to the extent that nine-tenths of the leading daily newspapers "belong to limited companies"; twelve such, listed on the Stock Exchange, figure in its daily quotations. Naturally, he finds that under this corporate ownership "the main concern of shareholders, who are investors and not journalists, is their dividends, and dividends must be earned even if principle has to suffer in the process."

Side by side with this development has come a distinct check to the increase of the number of newspapers in England. That increase has been only 6 per cent. in the morning and evening field for the past twenty years, in which the population has grown 24 per cent., and the reading public at an even faster rate. The explanation of this is not far to seek. It costs large sums nowadays to found newspapers, and the aggressive reaching out into the provinces of the London dailies makes the lot of the small-town newspaper less and less secure and inviting. This competition is accentuated by the simultaneous publication of several newspapers in two centres. If this has stimulated the provincial press to greater efforts, it has damaged the advertising of the press as a whole, the advertiser feeling that the newspapers of great metropolitan and provincial circulation fill all his needs. The more or less sensational methods of the successful London half-penny papers "make it impossible," Mr. Donald declares, "for papers run on old-fashioned lines to survive." He is sure that the immediate future will see this fierce competition intensified, and more and more of the old-fashioned kind of journals go to the wall. It is the day of the newspaper with tremendous means for special trains, motor-car delivery services, publicity campaigns, and endless billboard and poster advertising, and Mr. Donald prophesies that twenty years hence an English newspaper which has not at least a half-million readers "will not be seriously considered as an organ of the people."

The political and social power of these journalistic Dreadnoughts will not be any less, Mr. Donald feels; and then, to console the small journalist who may see himself finally put out of business by the coming use of the aeroplane, airship, "motorplanes running on special tracks," the merging of morning and evening newspapers, with hourly editions by day or by night, which our authority foresees, he adds that there will be a revival of the purely local country newspapers, "much improved in form and style." But all newspapers, it appears, will have to fear not so much competition from one another as from new methods of delivering news by cinematograph, telephone, or phonograph. This is indubitably looking a little far into the future. But what we do not get from Mr. Donald is some assurance that under the wonderful new conditions the character of newspapers will continue as high and their sense of respectability to the public as keen. That is the question which deeply concerns everybody.

We wish the omen were more favorable on this side of the water, or at least clearer. Our worst specimens of the yellow type combine all the bad features of unscrupulous, irresponsible proprietorship and of corporation management. The only thing certain is that the day of the old-fashioned type of newspaper is rendered more difficult by the journal which is the counterpart of the British halfpenny shrieker. There is striking proof of this in a remarkable editorial article that has just appeared in the Chicago Inter Ocean, which that veteran journalist, Mr. H. H. Kohlsaat, purchased about a year ago. He declares that "from being the purveyors of news and opinions in due perspective for the public, the daily and periodical press have become very largely the muckrakers of the universe, the distorters of facts, and the debauchers of thought for the masses, in whom eventually abides the fate of the republic." In his crusade to combat this he has been producing in the Inter Ocean a newspaper according to the ideals of St. Paul in his epistle to the Philippians. He has made gratifying progress, but here is the warning which is the real keynote of the editorial:

> So long as its present editor retains control of the Inter Ocean it will continue faithful to Chicago, true to the higher traditions of journalism, alert and fair in printing the decent news of each day, sane and fearless in discussing the questions of the hour as they arise. But if the business men of Chicago, who have more at stake than the Inter Ocean, fail to accord it steady and generous support, the temptation to stand from under may prove irresistible. And then journalism of the "itching palm and wanton eyes" will have its way.

It is the problem of every sane journalist which Mr. Kohlsaat confronts, but it is still more the problem of the intelligent public. Over decent and indecent journalism alike the public has the power of life and death. The question is simply how far it will utilize this power—whether it will guide towards good ends the rapidly changing currents of journalistic activity, or let them be directed solely by the will-o'-the-wisp of individual or corporation gain.

FASHIONS IN SMILES.
